HILDA'S HOME.

A STORY OF WOMAN'S EMANCIPATION.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

With Macaulay, Rosa Graul would say: "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman would be less loving and lovable, or that man would be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish.

KAREZZA.

SCIENCE OF MARRIAGE.

A godsend to every wife—a joy to every husband.

This work brings peace into homes disrupted by inharmony in the sexual relation. Dr. A. B. Stockham advises a practice which leads to individual liberty and to deeper love between husband and wife.

Dr. F. G. Welch: "After a personal trial of its teachings, I want to thank you for a great service to humanity."

Rev. George R. Stanshaw: "Out of a beautiful and ennobling experience, I can say, I KNOW."

Gives a high ideal of the marital relation and teaches control of the Fecundating Power.

J. A. Smalley, M. D.: "I have received more actual benefit from the practice of KAREZZA teachings than from all other books on Sexual Science."

MUST ECONOMIC FREEDOM PRECEDE SEX FREEDOM?

It is often said that it is useless to hope for freedom in matters of sex until the advent of economic changes which will make women financially independent. In order that we may find out just what amount of truth there is in this statement, let us consider one by one the various reforms which taken together constitute sexual freedom.

In the first place there must be general knowledge of suitable preventive checks, in order that undesired motherhood may be abolished. What economic changes are needed in order to reach this consummation? None whatever. All that is needed is to spread knowledge, overcome prejudice, and get rid of meddlesome laws.

Then we must do away with enforced celibacy, which is perhaps the greatest of all sexual evils. Sir Benjamin Brodie, one of the most eminent physicians of the nineteenth century, once said: "The evils of celibacy are so great I will not mention them, but they at least equal those of prostitution." Under this heading we have, first, the celibacy imposed on young persons of both sexes, before they are married, or ought to be married, but not before they are old enough to suffer dreadfully in body and mind from an unnatural continence. Then we have the deplorable evils inflicted on women who never get married, or at least have to wait a long time before marriage. With these we must reckon widows, divorced women, and others who are compelled for one reason or another to live without husbands. We must also remember that many men suffer more or less from celibacy under certain conditions.

Is any economic change needed to redress the evils of celibacy? Not the slightest. Celibacy can be cured by the same cure as undesired motherhood. All we need is cheap and plentiful preventive checks, together with the downfall of Mrs. Grundy, and enforced celibacy will be a thing of the past.

But we must get rid of prostitution. How? Preventive checks will do it. When it is made easy for women to give their love, those who wish to sell it will not have many customers.

But how are we to get rid of unnatural vice? Preventive checks will do that, too. Make it easy to get natural satisfaction whenever it is wanted, and few will get into the habit of seeking unnatural satisfaction.

We are now half through the subject, and thus far the whole thing is very simple. Kill Mrs. Grundy, and make preventive checks cheap, efficient, generally known, and easily obtained.

Now, however, we come to the question of children, and it is confidently asserted that here at least nothing can be done until there is economic freedom.

That also I deny. In the first place, many women are economically independent, and there is nothing but Mrs. Grundy to prevent them being free mothers. It is safe to say that under any circumstances women of the educated and now well to do class will take the lead in emancipating their sex. They have done the fighting for woman suffrage and everything else that women have got or are getting. Therefore those of them who can afford it had better get to work at once, and lead the campaign for free motherhood.

But I do not even admit that poor women are unable to be mothers without becoming sex slaves. I do admit that the necessary number of children to keep up the population could not at present be conveniently produced under free motherhood. But there is no reason why many a healthy woman should not have one child at least, and at the same time work for her living. Let the American woman have one child, or possibly two, for her own pleasure; and let the Swedes, Finns, and Hungarians populate the country. Their children make as good American citizens as the descendants of those who came over on the Mayflower.

Another very important reform is that women should be made the legal guardians of their children. It is not desirable that mothers should any longer be sent to jail for stealing their own children from drunken fathers. It would be well to avoid a repetition of the recent incident in New York state, when an infant was torn from the breast of its American mother to be sent to China to be educated, because its dead father had willed it so. But no economic change is needed to accomplish this. Twelve states of the Union have already given mothers equal rights with fathers in the guardianship of their children, and there is not the slightest reason why all the states should not give the sole guardianship to the mother, without waiting for any economic change.

It is also essential that husbands should be deprived of all legal rights over the persons of their wives. Here again, however, it is needless to wait for any economic change.

No one wants economic change more than I do. But it is sheer humbug to say that everything must wait for it. Let us strive for sexual freedom without waiting for anything, and every gain in sexual freedom will make us the more able and willing to fight for economic freedom.

SUN-BATHING.

Sun-bathing increases the vitality, and promotes the renewal of the body. The nature of the sun-bath depends upon individual conditions. Some people are so fortunately situated as to be able to take a complete sun-bath in their ordinary rooms. In such a case, all the clothing should be removed, so that the entire body may receive the direct rays of the sun. One should have a private garden where he may luxuriate occasionally in nature's garments. The green fields and the fresh air of the country constitute the ideal conditions for a sun-bath.

Conveniences for sun-bathing are essential to a well appointed home, and a porch on the sunny side of a house may often be modified for this purpose. Where an upper porch is available, screen it off with muslin curtains which readily admit the actinic rays. Where climatic conditions would not permit this simple arrangement, a window may be fitted. Excellent solariums are sometimes built upon the roofs of houses, where there is nothing to obstruct the sunlight.

Few people realize how much vitality can be gained in the sun-bath. It gives new energy to the system, as the rays of the sun penetrate every part of the body, similarly to the X-rays. The energizing influence is imparted to every organ, and not merely to the surface of the body. This vitality enables nature more perfectly to discard the worn-out particles and to receive new and vital elements. The radiant influence of the sun is nature's own tonic, and would be eagerly sought by all if its rejuvenative powers were realized.—Harry Gaze, in How to Live Forever.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

J. Warner Mills, Denver, Col.: "I have noted with a good deal of solicitude the trouble which 'Lucifer' has been having during the last few months. I have resolved several times to write you, but have been kept so continuously in the grind of an active professional life that I found it easier to resolve and procrastinate than to execute.

"In my judgment, it is not the name of your paper so much as the matter you insert that enrages the enemy. By all means keep the propaganda going, if it is within your power, and retain it as a weekly, if you can, with a popular annual subscription of $1.00. Taken as a whole, I think the advice of R. B. Kerr in No. 1015, is timely and excellent.

"I enclose you my check herewith for $10.00. I had always hoped to help you liberally as soon as I could feel I was a little nearer 'easy street.' One thing or another has thus far continued to intervene, but I shall always be glad to help you at any time, as my means will permit, in sums of five or ten dollars.

"I am glad you found your trip to California so enjoyable. Am sorry you could not have taken in Denver on the way.

"The outrage of the postal authorities in your case is equaled only by the outrages that we are becoming familiar with on the part of those high in authority in many official stations, both in state and nation. For instance, the method of using the military in this state, which has resulted in a high tension of feeling between our citizens, dividing them into camps of hostility and hatred.

"Perhaps you will be interested in the December number of the 'Direct Legislation Record,' which I enclose herewith, giving a brief account of my humble part in some of the reforms of the day."

Dr. Titus M. Coan, New York City: "Lucifer is a good name, but this country is not yet ready for much radical doctrine in sociological matters, however true the doctrine may be. In England such doctrines may be published in the best magazines—'The Nineteenth Century,' 'The Fortnightly'—here it is impossible. As to continuing your publication it is mainly a question of capital—how much can you afford to risk, or lose on it."

E. Hayden, Red Bluff, Cal.: "In re your questions in 1013 my voice is: 1—By all means Lucifer—the best of all the radical papers, the highest, the purest, should be continued. We should miss it sadly otherwise. 2—It should be published in the United States if possible. The U. S. leads the van in the world's progress to-day, and is the strategical point from which to operate for all true reform. 3—Let the name be curtailed to The Light Bearer. That is familiar—it is appropriate; everyone recognizes its meaning and its fitness. It awakens no question. 4—Let the editor determine its price according to his experience, $2 is none too much for a weekly. 5—Let it come weekly if possible. Most would rather pay $2 per year for a weekly than $1 for a bi-weekly. Personally I am unable to do much, just at this writing but will be as loyal to the paper as possible, and hope to help some in the near future."

Catharine S. Fry, Los Angeles, Cal.: I shall always do what I can to aid the cause you have labored for so long and so faithfully. The recent straits of Lucifer are very saddening. I hasten to add my mite to relieve the tension. My answers to the questions are briefly: 1—By all means should the paper continue to let its light shine, if it can do so without too great cost to all concerned. 2—Preferably in the United States, but if the conditions are more favorable elsewhere, why let those at the helm decide where it shall be located. 3—"The Light Bearer" impresses me as serving all purposes and avoiding perplexity in the minds of the majority. 4—$1 per year seems to be favored more generally—if compatible with expense of issue. 5—Fortnightly would suffice, but if a monthly were chosen then it might be feasible to change the form and size and increase the amount of reading matter in each issue. The exact details I leave to those more skilled in the business. The last question I cannot answer definitely, but will seek to spread its circulation as I see ways to do so. Although I have read many progressive magazines on this line of thought none has afforded me more satisfaction than has Lucifer. Would I could put it in the hand and heart of every mother in the land and could know that they would heed its vital information. But alas! the great majority are not yet ready to grasp its import and must suffer more ere they recognize what a 'light shineth in darkness,' and that they have comprehended it not in the past."

Allen Haddock, editor of Human Nature, San Francisco, an old and well established journal of Human Culture, writing on business to this office, adds this friendly salutation:

"It is gratifying to see the 'Morning Star' again. Why the devil it is you stick to the 'Lucifer' appellation I do not know. The name always reminds me of Satan and sulphur. I suppose with me it is an hereditary taint like that which afflicts Lombroso's cat."

Yes, Bro. Haddock; I think it must be an hereditary superstition that causes the ancient name of the pure and beautiful "Herald of the Dawn" to be repulsive to so many minds.

W. G. Scott, Cincinnati, O.: "Have delayed writing you on the subject of continuance of the paper longer than I intended. Hope you will be able to keep it going on a better basis than ever, from this time on. I think well of Dr. Foote's plan, and intend to contribute to that fund.

"Some one asked, in a late issue, what had become of several of the old time writers for Lucifer, naming E. C. Walker as one. Well, Walker was turned down for C. L. James. But James had his day and turned himself down by having plenty of rope. That was the best way. Walker is the most logical writer that ever penned an article for Lucifer and I am aware that some of its readers could not catch on and so were just a little bit pleased when he was dropped. But I believe it was a bad mistake. A master in logic is needed on your staff, to educate those who are not thoroughly logical and are too emotional. I hope Walker will be to the front again.

"It is always either laughable or pitiable to read the illogical arguments of your socialist correspondents. If they only knew that they give themselves away when ever they try to explain what Anarchism means or what Anarchists are working for, they would keep still. I contend that no man can read the best writers on Anarchy with an honest intention to find out and know the real philosophy of that school, and not become one himself. The trouble with the socialist regarding Anarchy is that he reads what socialists say it is and do not read the writers on the philosophy itself."

[Bro. Scott is one of Lucifer's oldest and most faithful helpers, but he is in error when he says E. C. Walker was turned down, as a writer for Lucifer's columns. A recent letter from him on business contains this paragraph]:

"I see Kerr is calling some of us 'lazy' for not writing, but each heart knows best its own bitterness, and I have had no time to write for anything. 'Should Radicals Colonize?' which appeared in Free Society, was not written for that paper but was a short address delivered at the Radical Club last spring. If I had time to write I should do most of my work for the daily papers, for there one reaches audiences not familiar with any form of radical thought, and out of the multitude so reached there surely will be some whose brains are fertile soil for the seed."

Replying to questions in No. 1013 Bro. Scott says: "1, Yes; 2, In the United States; 3, either Lucifer or the Light Bearer—never strike your colors; 4, one dollar, or more if necessary; 5, weekly or fortnightly,—not more seldom. I will be responsible for two annual subscriptions."

Answers similar to these continue to come, some of them from British America and from "lands beyond the sea," showing that Lucifer and its work find well wishers in many lands and climes.

Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., of 120 Lexington avenue, New York City, treasurer of the Free Speech League, informs us that he has a number of copies of Darrow's Brief on the Turner case, for sale at 50 cents each, and postage, 10c. It is a strong and instructive book, although it failed to influence the Supreme Court. No doubt there are many among Lucifer readers who would value this book and utilize its historical research. The proceeds of sale of this work will, presumably, be applied to helping pay the expenses of the Free Speech League.

LUCIFER'S HELPERS.

A large portion of these names are of those who have subscribed for an extra copy to be used in missionary work. By some a name or names are given to whom the paper is to be sent regularly for one year or less.

While due effort has been made not to slight any who have sent money not intended to be credited on the subscription of the sender there is good reason to think that some names have been omitted, and therefore the request is now made that all who have helped by donation or by subscribing for others, and whose names have not appeared among "Lucifer's Helpers," will send us a line calling attention to such omission.

Again thanks from the workers inside to the workers outside Lucifer's office, for the generous sympathy that caused them to help carry the extra burden that must be borne by some one, if the educational work of Lucifer is to be pushed forward effectively, or even if the paper is to be kept alive.

THE COLORADO SITUATION.

[An old friend and subscriber writing from Cripple Creek, thus describes the situation in what is now "Bleeding Colorado." Having been a near neighbor to the horrors of the "border war" in the early settlement of Kansas I can bear testimony that those horrors pale into insignificance when compared to the deeds now enacted in the "Centennial State."—M. H.]

You have doubtless wondered why I have not written you something concerning the outrages that have recently occurred in Cripple Creek and vicinity. But you can have but a faint conception of the danger a citizen of this community would be subjected to if a letter from him expressing adverse views to that of the military rule were to fall into the hands of the enemy. I enclose under another cover a copy of the Appeal to Reason which gives a graphic and truthful account of what has transpired here since the 6th of this month.

The suppression of free speech in other parts of the world in modern times is tame compared to what we are grinning and enduring in the Cripple Creek district. The accounts given to the Appeal to Reason by men who were on the ground are not overdrawn or exaggerated, incredible as they may seem to the outside world I can personally vouch for much of it, as I have been an eye witness to the main facts, and am fully prepared to believe the rest of it. I witnessed the firing on the Union Hall in Victor, and know that not a single shot came from the hall. I witnessed the brutal treatment of the strikers after they surrendered and am credibly informed of many other brutalities, and personally know that to dissent from the views of the mob—which consists of the Mine Owners' Association, Citizens' Alliance and the scab miners—is sure to land one in the bull pen or to subject him to deportation.

The Appeal's correspondents are reputable socialists of superior mental attributes, who have stated the inside facts as they have occurred. I am usually in accord with socialist speakers and writers in their statements of facts relating to conditions in the industrial world. It is only when it comes to the remedy they propose as a relief from economic ills that I differ from them. I had just as soon be herded and prodded to the bull pen by Democratic or Republican militia as by a socialist soldiery. It is astonishing to me that socialists of intelligence fail to grasp the fundamental truth that authority vested in any party, no matter by what name it may be called will inevitably degenerate into brutality and tyranny.

I dare not allow this to appear over my own signature for various reasons sufficiently obvious. Many of Lucifer's readers, however, will know from whom these lines come; and that this history exemplifies my contention that all forms of force are to be shunned as wrong in principle, inexpedient in action, and always subversive of the ends aimed at, no matter what may be the issue.

When the unions were in the saddle there was tyranny, and now that the mine owners, non-union men, and the Citizens' Alliance are on top neither man nor woman dare even criticise their inhuman acts.

A Comrade on the Field of Battle.

INJUNCTION RESTRAINING POSTOFFICE.

The Boston Traveler, under 10 lines of big heading, says the postmaster-general issued a "fraud order" against the Preferred Mercantile Co., Winthrop Building, Boston, and that the company promptly retaliated in less than a week by procuring an injunction from Judge Colt in the U. S. Circuit Court, prohibiting Postmaster Hibbard of Boston from obeying the order. Mr. Hibbard wrote to Washington for instructions and after a long wait received none. Perhaps the department will have to open its eyes.

In the meantime, people throughout New England, who had written the company, are worked up to wrath because of the non-delivery of their letters. They simply being held in the meantime. These people will, undoubtedly, incline toward joining forces with thousands of others in every walk of life who have of late been victims of the Postoffice Department's folly and tyranny, and, with them, they will demand that private capitalists be called in to buy out the postoffice and run it as the express companies are run, divested also of the legal restraints imposed upon them.

To the capitalist we would pay one postage and get value received, without the possible infliction of a "fraud order," a fine or a jail or a penitentiary sentence.

The fact is, mails should be "free" for everything save those things physically damaging to them, and the laws of the land should be amply sufficient to cover any genuine misdemeanors assisted or transmitted by the mails, without having the mail system itself play the parts of sleuth, policeman, judge and jailer. These are entirely aside from its proper business.

Those capitalists, therefore, who recently laid before the people the details by which they would run the postoffice, can now confidently come forward and find many editors, writers and speakers ready to assist them in attaining their end.

Sykesville, Maryland. Francis B. Livesey.

Woman has precisely the same title and right to independence and equality before the law that man has. Both hold title from the same source. She has just as much right to sit in judgment on man, and limit his sphere and his actions, as he has to limit hers. Therefore any attempt by man to deny woman independence or equality of rights is simply the assertion of brute force. Brute force degrades those who successfully use it. Every time it is resorted to there is a reaction toward the brute creation.

The man who eats bread that is earned by others is a parasite; in the social economy he is but a sack with a sucking mouth. Not being compelled to exert his other organs or faculties, they cease to grow. Astonishing as it may seem, there is an almost universal desire among men to become a parasite; that is, a desire to get into a position where they can gratify their appetites and tastes without labor, a desire to take things rather than to make things,—a desire to get something for nothing.—John P. Altgeld, in "The Cost of Something for Nothing."

I believe in the sacredness of motherhood under any and all circumstance and conditions, without a single, solitary exception; that illegitimacy of birth is an impossibility, the very fact that a human being is born entitling him or her to all the rights of a human being.

I believe that the family will never cease to exist. Greater liberty of thought and action in sex matters will not debase or extinguish it. On the contrary, as man's mind and soul expand, as his intelligence develops, as his impulses become higher, as his actions grow grander, the meaning of the word "family" will broaden with the institution, until, in the day of man's real or approximate perfection, there will be—not countless circles or groups, each for itself, and one against the other—but one vast, universal family—all for one, one for all—in which the true brotherhood of man will be realized, and all men will be brothers and all women sisters, in fact, as well as in name.—A Sexual Creed, by L. J. Livingston.

LUCIFER: ITS MEANING AND PURPOSE.

LUCIFER—The planet Venus; so called from its brightness.—Webster's Dictionary.

LUCIFEROUS—Giving light; affording light or the means of discovery.—Same.

LUCIFIC—Producing light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing, and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

THIRD SERIES. VOL. VIII. NO. 16.

After a stay of two weeks in Chicago, during which time he delivered four or five public lectures, James F. Morton, Jr., departed Monday, July 4, for New York City, from which place he goes to spend the summer with his parents in New Hampshire. In December next he expects to return to Chicago on his way to Home Washington, and will remain here a month or more, provided conditions seem favorable for work on lines in which he is specially interested. The impression made by Mr. Morton upon the liberal element of Chicago is decidedly favorable.

A great calamity has befallen Lucifer's old friend and helper, Etta Semple of Ottawa, Kansas, editor of the now discontinued Freethought Ideal. The recent unprecedented flood in the Marais de Cygnes completely destroyed her exceptionally fine library, besides much other valuable household property. A movement has been started by a well-known author and publisher in New York city, to duplicate, in part at least, Mrs. Semple's loss. Lucifer's office will send five dollars' worth, or more, of books and magazines. So long and so faithful has been the service of this tireless worker in the cause of human emancipation from ignorance and inherited superstitions, that it is sincerely hoped many of those who know of her labors of love will come to her aid and help to replace the lost library.

FREEDOM IN LOVE—THE BURNING QUESTION.

Clara Bewick Colby, editor of Woman's Tribune, Washington, D. C., an old and well established journal of reform, in her issue of June 25, under the head, "Lucifer or Lightbearer," has this to say:

"Lucifer, Mr. Moses Harman's paper, starting up after some weeks vacation, is asking its subscribers' opinion as to its future name, price, place of publication and scope. An editor who tries to take the advice of everybody usually finds himself like the traveler with his son and his donkey who succeeded in satisfying nobody.

"Lucifer stands for the rights of the child to be well born, and especially to be born of a mother who controls the conditions of her maternity. Mr. Harman has carried almost to the point of martyrdom his devotion to a propagandum which is so far ahead of public sentiment that few dare even to commend him lest it might bring opprobrium upon them. Judicial ignorance and that misguided zeal for purity which sees only obscenity in a plain statement of fact regarding sex matters consigned Mr. Harman to a pentitentiary for more than a year because he did not eliminate a scientific physiological name from a communication from one of his contributors who denounced an injury to a wife in unsparing terms. Having exchanged with Lucifer for twenty years I do not remember noticing in Mr. Harman's editorials anything subversive of the purity and continuity of the home, but in his willingness to give others a chance to express their views, and possibly despairing of righting the wrongs of woman in marriage under its present status, he has allowed some of his contributors to advocate the various forms of experimental nastiness which may be summed up under the name 'free love.' It is this which Mr. Harman must avoid if he would have his paper appeal to readers who do not wish the foundations of the home and of society and the state overturned.

"There is need of a paper such as Lucifer might be and such as it is in its essential thought. The relations of the sexes present problems that are most vital and pressing. The fact that a very small proportion of marriages bring complete or growing happiness; that divorce is increasing so rapidly that it threatens to make the marriage bond less sacred and enduring than the ordinary business compact; that countless vices, scandals and moral obliquities growing out of sex relations crush humanity with their unutterable woe; all these call for wise and energetic treatment if our civilization is to be saved.

"But those who are to take up this subject should bring to it not only the clean heart and chaste purpose but a scientific study of the development of life through all its forms. They must build upon the past instead of knocking the foundations from under their feet. They must know that the persistent ideal which has caused the evolution of animal life has been the struggle towards monogamic relations of the sexes. According to the completeness of development along this line scientists have classified life into lower or higher orders. Man has carried it further than any other created being, hence the love which tends to differentiate his pursuit of his mate from the lust of the brute. How to carry the process of evolution to the point of a perfected monogamy with its promise of enduring happiness and immortal love and yet win for woman her freedom as an equal partner in this relation is the burning question of civilization.

"Our readers who wish to judge whether Lucifer is handling this problem wisely should send 25 cents for a three months trial subscription to 500 Fulton street, Chicago."

It is nearly twenty years since I heard Mrs. Colby address an "Equal Suffrage" convention at Topeka, Kansas, at which convention there were several speakers of national if not international reputation, but among them all there were none that went so nearly to the core of the question of woman's political, social and economic enslavement as did Clara Bewick Colby. So radical and unconventional were some of her utterances that I was simply amazed as well as delighted to hear the applause with which these utterances were greeted by the large audience.

Since that time I have watched with some care the course of the Woman's Tribune and its editor, and while I have found much to commend I confess to a feeling of disappointment; a feeling that Mrs. Colby's subsequent career has not fulfilled the prophecy of what I considered by far the most important speech made at the convention aforesaid.

Like Henry Ward Beecher Mrs. Colby appears to me to be a "Kingdom divided against itself." While her logical intellect clearly sees that "Love in Freedom," "motherhood in freedom," must be the savior of mankind if ever saved—saved from the hells of ignorance and perversion—her emotional nature is still "under bondage to fear," her inherited fear that love cannot be trusted in freedom; that the sex instinct, sex attraction, is a wild beast that must be kept in a strait jacket and allowed expression only when church or state, or both, give their sanction.

Hence the lack of coherence, as I see it, in the published utterances of Mrs. Colby on the question of woman's emancipation from her inherited slaveries. Hence such expressions as "the various forms of experimental nastiness which may be summed up under the name 'free love.'"

Not wishing to make a long article in reply to the foregoing editorial notice, whose author I regard as one of the foremost women of our time, and while sincerely thanking her for her brave defense of myself and of Lucifer during the long years of conflict in Kansas, when friends were few and far between, I must correct her impressions in regard to the "editorials" of which she seems to hold a good opinion. If I have not made it clear, during the twenty years of "exchange" with the Tribune, that I advocate "love in freedom," commonly called "free love," then I wish to do so now.

With Julie Vom Berg, "president of the convention of German women in Frauenstadt," as reported by Karl Heinzen, I say here, as I have often said before in many ways,

"I begin with the declaration that I advocate 'free love' completely and decidedly. But the expression is incorrect and should be 'freedom in love.' Indeed, can any other kind of love exist except free love? Can love be commanded or forced?

"Something of this sort seems hitherto to have been in the minds of philosophers of love, who have learned their philosophy in Constantinople or Utah apparently, and who can let a slave pass as their beloved.

"Among all the daughters of the goddess Liberty there is none, who, according to her nature, must possess the properties of her mother in a higher degree than Love.

"Love and free love are therefore synonymous. It ought not to be necessary to talk of free love any more than of wet water, or hot fire.

"I might, however, conceive of love as not free in the sense that the feeling, the necessity that unites two beings, binds them completely, destroys their free will, turns them irresistibly away from everything else.

"But just because true love has this effect, exerts this power, creates this necessity, it ought no more to be hindered in its choice by external force, than it will require external bonds to insure its permanence.

"A man and woman who do not love each other ought not to be united, or where they are united they ought again to be separated.

"A man and woman who love each other ought not to be kept apart, and they need no external force to remain together.

"This is the simple statement of what I understand by freedom in love, which is the only means of securing what has now become so rare—a true marriage and a true family life.

"Let him who does not agree with me have the courage to postulate the opposite and declare, that those who do not love each other ought to be united and to be kept together by force, those who love each other ought to be separated and to be kept apart by force—both in the interest of humanity and human happiness!"

This quotation from Heinzen's "Rights of Woman and the Sexual Relations" is longer than I could have wished, but could not be shortened without weakening its force. And now, in all kindness and candor I would ask Mrs. Colby which horn of the dilemma she prefers to take; for, as I see it, there is no middle or neutral ground.

If she takes the first—that those who love each other should be united, and that those who do not love should be separate, and that no outside force is needed in either case, then she is a "free lover," in the true and logical meaning of that much abused and ill-quoted phrase.

If Mrs. Colby refuses to take this position, then of necessity she must take the ground that those who love each other should be kept apart by outside force, and those who do not love each other should be held together—"in the interest of humanity and human happiness!"

As Julie Vom Berg says, although no one of sound mind dares to take this second attitude in just so many words, "it seems, in practice to be the guiding principle almost everywhere," and adds, "For married people and their progeny the existing relationships of force and prostitution are truly appalling. But this same society [this respectable, conventional society] never wearies of pronouncing their anathemas on freedom in love. 'Free love' is a word of terror, but free prostitution has become a social institution which is approved inside and outside of marriage by a legal license."

That is to say, the legal license is simply legal authority to "commit adultery"—prostitution—within the marriage pale, since if left to nature's attractions and repulsions, as Madame Vom Berg clearly intimates, there would be no prostitution, no adulteration, no defilement of sex—provided always that the element of economic dependence, or that of hypnotic obsession, or of religious fanaticism, does not supervene.

A WORD OF WARNING.

Let no one reading Lucifer for the first time, jump to the conclusion that because its editor would have no outside force to control the sex attractions and repulsions of human beings that therefore he opposes all control of sex appetite, sex passion. On the contrary I constantly and most earnestly preach the doctrine of control, self-control, of sex appetite for the same reason that I preach self-control of any other natural appetite or passion; and still more do I insist upon self-control of sex appetite because the consequences of lack of control in the department of creative passion may be far more serious to all concerned, and especially to the coming generation, than are the consequences of failure to control the appetite for food or drink, for power or for pelf, or any other human passion.

But in order to have real self-control it is necessary to have knowledge, "knowledge of good and evil," and many of us are so constituted that we cannot or will not take our knowledge second hand, and therefore I do not denounce "experimental," or experiential knowledge as Mrs. Colby seems to do when she speaks of "experimental nastiness." "Judge not, that ye be not judged," is a good motto; and "evil to him who evil thinks."

As to the "struggle towards monogamic relations of the sexes," some highly developed species of the so-called lower animals are monogamous and some are not, and so also of human beings, and the attempt to compel women and men to be monogamous by statute or canon law has always proved a disastrous failure.

Admitting for the argument, if for nothing more, that monogamy is the highest and best form of human association I maintain that the final triumph of monogamy over other forms is impeded and prevented rather than helped, by all attempts at compulsory observance of the monogamic code.

Yes, Mrs. Colby, Lucifer's editor "has allowed some of his contributors to advocate" many kinds of sex association. He does not know any other way of getting at the truth than by honest comparison of ideas and experiences. It was Wendell Philipps I think who said, "In order to get the whole of truth we must hear all sides." "Let truth and error grapple," said Milton.

Presumably our good critic considers as unspeakably "nasty" the article of R. B. Kerr in this issue of Lucifer, but that our British Columbian contributor has studied the question relating to sex morality quite as carefully and quite as successfully as has Mrs. Colby I am strongly inclined to believe.

Having written much more than at first intended I close by thanking once more the editor of Woman's Tribune for her evidently candid and honest as well as kindly reference to Lucifer and its editor, and would freely reciprocate by recommending our readers to send ten cents for five sample copies of Woman's Tribune, Washington, D. C., or $1 for a year's subscription of 26 numbers.

THE OUTLOOK.

Elsewhere in this issue is given a letter from an old subscriber, at Cripple Creek, a man who knows Colorado well, from long residence therein, and from thorough acquaintance with causes that have preceded and led up to the present frightful condition of things in that state.

Our correspondent does not write as a partisan. He does not excuse the "unions." He does not throw all the blame on the capitalists and their partisans, the state officials, the courts and the non-union miners. He puts the blame where many others have long since put it, on the land system, the money system and the labor system that gives it into the power of the men who control the money to control also the land, the mines, the railways and the workingmen who have nothing to sell but their labor, and all else between the earth and sky.

This land and money system is part of our inheritance from colonial times and from the barbarous feudal systems of Europe, just as chattel slavery was part of our inheritance from the barbarous economic and social systems of Europe.

To get rid of the chattel slave system required a great civil war—one of the bloodiest and bitterest known to human history, simply because the owners of human chattels would not submit to the decision of the ballot, which decision showed that sooner or later, chattel slavery must go. Trade unionism and its twin brother socialism, say that private ownership of the land, the mines, the tools and the railways by a few men, must go. The history of the Colorado conflict shows with almost unerring certainty that the millionaire mine-owners will not submit to the decision of the ballot when the socialists and their friends capture the state government by voting. They will either defeat the count by fraud or force, or they will organize their armies on a large scale as they have already done on a small scale, and fight for their time-honored right to own the earth, just as their brethren, the slave owners organized their armies on a large scale to fight for their right to own the bodies of their black chattels. The land-owners, the mine-owners, the bankers and the transportation owners everywhere, will make common cause, and as these own the government at Washington it will mean another French Revolution to break up the feudal system of the falsely called American Republic.

The following statement from what seems a very reliable source tells the tale in brief of the methods adopted by the Colorado mine-owners:

"A few days before the mob of thieves, soldiers and deputies took control, acting under the instructions of their leader, Governor James H. Peabody, City Marshal Wm. Graham was approached by A. E. Carlton, president of the First National Bank of Cripple Creek, who said: 'Billy, you are a friend of mine. I come to you as a friend of yours to tell you to resign at once. I know you have been neutral all through this trouble, and have favored neither side, and that this is a gross injustice to you, but we, the Mine Owners' Association and Citizens' Alliance, will not have a neutral man as city marshal. Our people would not stand for you a minute. The new city marshal must be with us, wholly, for we have cut work out for him that would not do for you or any man save the kind we will appoint. Owing to my personal appreciation of you and your ability, I wish you to take this $100 and this ticket to Kansas City. Go down there and stay there until this thing blows over, for, from now on, we will do many hard things. Take my advice and get out."

City Marshal Graham was forced to resign, and a few days after the Independence explosion occurred, under circumstances that go very far to show that this wholesale murder was part of the "many hard things" spoken of by the president of the First National Bank of Cripple Creek.

The following paragraphs clipped from a late issue of the Alliance of the Rockies, edited by R. A. Southworth, personally known to the writer of these lines as able, earnest and honest worker in behalf of truth and justice, show what is believed by many thoughtful persons to be among the proximate causes of the present trouble:

The real secret or cause of the present trouble in the state of Colorado is that the corporations have assumed the function and powers of government and some of the people are not willing to submit to the wrongs and outrages perpetrated in the name of government.

The dastardly and outrageous methods employed by the Peabody administration are in harmony with the spirit of the age perhaps and that of the two old parties, but they are an abomination and a disgrace to the people. They belong to the dark and bloody days of the past.

The wretched and damnable policy of the Federal government of arming one class of its citizens, the most useless, to kill and destroy its most useful citizens is atrocious in the extreme. A government that will pursue such a villainous policy is not entitled to much respect or veneration. A government that has to rely on the Gatling gun and the bayonet for support deserves the execration of all mankind. BEN HUMD.

We never will have a decent or honest government or one fit for a freeman to live under till governments are constructed on a different basis or principle. This plan of making money or wealth the paramount idea or consideration is wrong. The creature is not greater than the Creator and must be made subordinate. Every interest must give way to manhood and womanhood. They must rule and they alone. When it comes to making watered stocks and bonds the highest consideration and compelling humanity to fall down and worship a few plutocratic stiffs, it is about time to kick or revolt.

That this state of things, in theory at least, is nothing new, is well known to all students of history. The framers of the constitution of the United States said in so many words that "Property, not liberty is the main object of society."—Gouverneur Morris. "Property is the primary object of society and in fixing a ratio should not be excluded from the estimate."—King.

While it is demonstrably true that all governments of man by man are based upon this principle—that property and not personal liberty is the object of organized society, the chief owners of wealth in this country have not felt themselves in position to reduce their principles to practice and to openly avow these principles so brazenly as they are now doing in Colorado and in Pennsylvania.

Altogether the outlook for peace in this country, and for human brotherhood, is not by any means reassuring. Looking for causes, however, it is quite as good and as hopeful as we have any reason to expect. To remove the social, political and economic ills that afflict us as a people we must remove the causes thereof. And this brings us back to the fundamental axiom that the institutions of any country are as good and as bad as the people who make and who passively endure them. As one of the writers in this issue says, "With virility humanity will thrive under any conditions." If this be true then the first thing to be done is to demand that the mothers of the next generation awake to their responsibility in creating a race of men that will not be lacking in virility. M. H.

DON'T FORGET, good friends all, to send us names of independent thinkers—New Thought people, Rationalists, Agnostics, Spiritualists, Materialists, Free Religionists, Theosophists—to whom we may send sample copies of Lucifer, "Son of the Morning," "Herald of the Dawn," "Harbinger of the Good Time Coming"! We have some hundreds of copies printed extra each issue for the express purpose of sending them out as samples, and, if possible, we want several hundred new names each week, or each fortnight. And if with the names a few postage stamps can be sent to help pay the cost of wrappers and of mailing, all the better, but send the names!

VARIOUS VOICES.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

B. M., Garrison, N. Y.: "Who is Karl Heinzen, and has he written anything in book form I can get?"

[Karl Heinzen was a German writer on political and sociologic subjects, who died in 1880. His most noted work is entitled "Woman and the Sexual Relations." This book was translated into English by Emma Heller Schumm, and had a wide circulation, but is now out of print, if I mistake not. If any of our readers know where it can be obtained they will confer a favor by letting the fact be known. Among Heinzen's characteristic sayings are these:

"Learn to endure everything, only not slavery; learn to dispense with everything, only not with your self-respect; learn to lose everything, only not yourself. All else in life is worthless, delusive and fickle."]

H. Mendelsohn, N. Y.: "Do you keep bound volumes of Lucifer?" A.—Yes; $1.50 per volume, postage 25c. Per volume unbound, $1; postage 15c.

F. E. Leonard, Okla.: "Enclosed find one dollar to help out on Lucifer's sustaining fund. One dollar is not much, but it will help a little."

H. M. Addison, Adelaide, S. Australia: "Again I have not received my Lucifers. My subscription is paid up to about the end of 1907. I have kept all the copies I have received and am disappointed when I do not get them. They are full of common sense. I trust you are well and hearty at your great age, and that you may live as long as you want to live."

A. A. Caswell, Long Beach, Cal.: "I consider that Lucifer has done its work to that extent that it cannot be stopped now."

John Ostrom, Enterprise, Kan.: "Enclosed find $2 money order and two names to send Lucifer to, for one year, to commence on May 12th, 304, if you have the back numbers. This for Lucifer and its cause."

[Yes, we have the back numbers and will send as requested. This, as we think, is the very best way to help Lucifer. A letter will be sent to each of the persons subscribed by others, so that no one need hesitate to take the paper from the office lest a bill should be presented at some future time for payment. If, through oversight, this should not be done, any one receiving the paper regularly can tell, by noticing the numbers on the wrapper, how far ahead the paper to their address has been paid.]

F. S. Weaver, Coe, Ind.: "Sample copy received. It is the first Lucifer I have seen in 5 years, glad it lives. Start it this way. Medical Journals are run in the interests of doctors, and not for the health of the people. Political ax grinders should turn their own cranks. Sexism is the most popular subject on earth; let Lucifer stick to it. With virility, mankind will thrive under any political condition.

"On page 117, (No. 1016) you show that the clergy manage to secure the kind of soil that is suited to their needs; by this means creating public sentiment which enables them to steer politics their way, also. Why not try their methods, Bible methods, and speak in the name, and by the authority of 'God,' 'Our heavenly Father?' The subconscious mind, that believes everything it is told, that blindly sends our blood to vital centers on demand; that vitality through which the five senses have been developed, through which reason is obtained, this is the Father of our internal heaven and personal life. Logos, or reason is our savior."

[Bro. Weaver seems skilled in philology. He asks a hearing on "grammatical gender," but just now space is too precious for mysticism or for metaphysics.]

Laura S. Wood, Portland, Ore.: "Your position as a reformer is, from an intellectual standpoint, unassailable. Every creating and reforming power begins with the mother. The mother must be the unit in society, the central, the basic point around which all else revolves. The woman must be free, must be equal, must be self-poised and must be given homage, help and power. But this is inner, a spiritual fact, which only a mind blessed with intuitive feminine Love can see. It is, however, a fact which any man with intelligence ought to see. It is a brainy fact, but it takes men with heart along with brain to give their lives to it.

"The men who are working along the lines of socialism per se, of Single Tax per se, of all sorts of isms and creeds, leaving out sex and its mighty underlying force, are good men, earnest in their way, but not gifted with great discernment. You seem to stand almost alone in your strict adherence to a real live truth; why is it so? All hail to your work. Yours for the liberation of woman."

E. P. Foster, editor Cincinnatian, Cincinnati: "I wish to thank you for what you published about the Mercantile Exchange. It is my pet solution of the economic problem and the question of financial support if we could only get the people to agree in voluntary co-operation along those or like lines. I am still pushing at it with all my strength. I have lately secured from the State of Ohio a charter for 'The Golden Rule Society,' a sort of co-operative society incorporated so as to own houses, farms, manufacturing plants, etc., on a 'Golden Rule' or non-profit basis, instead of on the basis of individual 'profits.' I am now on the lookout for trustees, broad-minded enough to comprehend the idea. Can Chicago furnish one?"

S. O. Bishop, Brodhead, Wis.: "I have at Wichita, Kan., a small collection of 'curios,' which I must move, for my brother, at whose place they are stored, has sold his home. As I have grown too poor to have them shipped here, I will sell them or let you sell them, the proceeds to go to Lucifer. I wish to bring them before the public so that they will fetch the most money. There are about 800 stone arrow heads, 15 or 20 stone axes and mauls, three copper arrows and spears, some minerals, Lake Superior agates, etc., etc. In alcohol there are an octopus, snakes, lizards, etc. There is also a complete skeleton dug from a mound in Dodge county, Wis.

"They are all of my own collecting in Iowa, Wisconsin and Louisiana, and have cost me many years' labor at spare moments. But my business here has reduced me to such a state that I must sacrifice them."

[The above letter speaks for itself. I have known S. O. Bishop for many years, have found him a generous helper and faithful friend and have full confidence that whatever he says of his collection of curios will be found truthful. An unlucky venture as a manufacturer has reduced him in his old age from comparative wealth to poverty.—M. H.]

Susan Reicherter, Silver Lake, Kan.: "Am sorry to note that dear old Lucifer is in a strait. I am not in arrears, and never will be as long as I live, which may not be for long—I am seventy-seven years old. Do the best you can with Lucifer. I will stay a subscriber at any price you may have to charge per annum; let Lucifer appear but once or twice per month if need be. Enclosed find my mite—$3—towards the paper, whether it be called Lucifer or any other name. With love and good wishes to you and to Lillian."

[Susan Reicherter was one of Lucifer's original founders, twenty-four years ago this present summer, at Valley Falls, Kansas, and was for a time its chief financial agent or organizer. It is not too much to say that without the active, fearless and tireless co-operation of Susan and John Reicherter Lucifer would in all probability have died in the borning. After a long and useful life of earnest, honest toil as a pioneer farmer, John Reicherter has now "joined the majority"; Susan still remains to give aid and encouragement to all good and helpful reforms. May she live to see the triumph of the principles for which she has so long contended against opposition that would have appalled a less courageous heart and a less logical brain.]

R. B. Kerr, Phenix, B. C.: "I have again been considering your suggestion of two years ago that I should have all my allegories published together. There are eight of them, viz., 'The Greatest Sin,' 'A Tale of the Strassburg Geese,' 'A Traveler's Tale,' 'The Emancipated Horses,' 'The Wanderings of a Spirit,' 'A Strange Custom,' 'The Wells of the Amazons' and Mrs.

Grundy's 'Two Boarding Schools.' I estimate that altogether they contain 8,700 words. What would be the cost of republishing them?"

[Who will answer this question? No better missionary documents were ever written or put into print, in reference to the superstitions that hover round the subject of sex, than are these allegories by R. B. Kerr, most of which were originally written for Lucifer's columns. Some of them have been printed in booklet form, as monthly numbers of the Light Bearer Library, and sold at the merely nominal price of 5c each. Others were contributed to the quarterly magazine called "Our New Humanity," which sells at 25 cents per number.]

W. F., S. D.: "A few suggestions: 'Cease antagonism and rebellion, to a considerable extent, and proceed on lines of instruction and entertainment, and thus make Lucifer a hummer of success!

"'Boom the American Press Writers' Association, and especially as a means of forming acquaintances.

"'Post yourself upon the customs of Japan, Cuba, the Philippines, and of all countries, and especially in regard to matters of health. For instance, I undestand that the Japan home is nearly destitute of furniture. People sleep on rugs and live in a very simple and healthful manner. Women economically independent and equal with men. In portions of Cuba it is said the natives go nude, or nearly so.'"

HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

With Macaulay, Rosa Graul would say: "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman would be less loving and lovable, or that man would be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish.

SEX RADICALISM.

I. WHO ARE OUR TEACHERS?

The movement for sex radicalism is still so young that I believe it may be useful to outline briefly the ground which the sex reformer must cover, suggesting our sources of knowledge, and pointing out the largest of the lies with which we must do battle and who are the champions of these lies by choice or necessity.

1. The Physiology of Sex. Here, of course, medical men are those who keep the key of knowledge, being the only people who have access to facts and statistics on which to base any science of this part of our subject. But it should at once be noted that this hard-worked profession is paid (grudgingly and stingily paid) by the public not to instruct them in health, but to cure them of diseases. Moreover, medical men are by social laws bound over to silence as to the health-needs of sex, and would incur serious detriment to their worldly prospects if they rashly told the truth to their female patients, though the "double standard" enables them to speak more plainly to men. This influence causes even such scientific men as Kraft-Ebing and Westermarck to pander to popular prejudice in some of their statements regarding the sex-life of women—veiling the truth for a public which loves to be bamboozled.

Yet the public is served far better and more faithfully than it deserves by its medical doctors; and I am here impelled to make something like a digression to point out the effects of the almost unique training of the medical profession. With the exception of a few who have been fully trained in teaching (a profession still in its infancy), doctors are the only important class of men who are trained in both science and sympathy (those keynotes of the future). The result is very encouraging for believers in education, and is a complete answer to those who hold that the scientific study of human nature is demoralizing. Though I am far from supposing that education (environment) is as important as heredity, there is no doubt that a training in science, where the use of the powers of sympathy is also involved, produces great results. To some slight extent, perhaps, medical men are "picked," and the worst material clears out of the profession; but we find even rough medical students turned into as hard-working, kindly, self-sacrificing a set of men as can be found in history. If the moralizing power of science is so great, what may not be hoped for when all human beings have some training in science, to take the place of a training in religious superstition?

To return: In spite of the bribes to falsehood offered by the great stupid public, and the very possible penalties attached to truth-speaking, I believe it would be hard to find even among the humblest medical practitioners a man who will deliberately lie about the laws of sex as far as these are known.

2. The Chronology of Sex. It has been remarked that each age writes history from its own standpoint. Certainly the standpoint of the sex-reformer is not yet in sight. Even Lucifer, the Light-bearer, has as yet only the position that a warm supporter lately disclaimed for it as too humble—a torch-bearer, for daylight is not yet. We have no teachers as yet, in sociology in relation to sex. What is the one answer given to all the intricate problems of sex? Marriage. And what institution supports the marriage system as an integral part? "That great lying church," as Carlyle first, and Morrison Davidson since, have called it; and the churches its predecessors and successors. That church which has always set itself like a wall to stop every movement for reform, whether in the name of mercy or science, still keeps us from seeking the truth by its traditions and its representatives.

The lesson that I would fain suggest is that sex radicals must study their subject for themselves. (1) On the physiological side of the sex problem. I believe medical men can and will be our friends as soon as we encourage them to be so. The public will have health-doctors, instead of, or as well as, disease-doctors, just as soon as it genuinely desires them; and those who want sex-science will get it.

(2) In founding noble social ideals of sex there is much to study, and each one must help think. But one thing is clear: there must be no compromise with the powers of darkness. With church influence it must be, metaphorically speaking, "war to the knife." Not war with individuals in the church, for some within the church may attain to a happy kind of right-mindedness, in spite of their bad surroundings; and some puritans have fought—albeit fought blindfold—against the slavery of women. But we must fully recognize that a church which declares with the ancient Hebrew Scriptures in their opening pages that woman was made for man, and that human nature is radically evil, must fall by these demoralizing doctrines; and the sooner it falls the better.

The various movements which are supplanting the old church in the affections of the people, on the American continent, are all helpful to sex-radicalism, though their work is not our work and must be kept separate. These are: Secularism, spiritualism, and economic reform (socialism and anarchism); all three are useful, though I am far from giving equal weight to each, either historically or intrinsically considered. They are helpful to us as clearing obstructions, not in constructive work of our special kind.

With the editor's permission, I will follow these remarks on our teachers by some on "What must we learn?"

DORA FORSTER.

THE HEALINC POWER OF THE SUN.

Man is naturally an outdoor animal. The tropics being his natural home, he lives in cold countries only at the expense of an enormous outlay of labor, and probably also with a very considerable shortening of his life.

The value of outdoor life is best appreciated by those accustomed to sedentary life when opportunity is afforded for them to spend a few days in the open air. It needs no lengthy argument to demonstrate to such a person the value of continuous outdoor life as a health promoter. The value of such a life does not consist wholly in the purity of the air and the exercise, matters of great importance, but also in the cooling effect of the air in motion, and especially in the vitalizing influence of the sunshine.

The rays of the sun, says Dr. J. H. Kellog, contain heat and chemical rays as well as light rays. The heat acts powerfully upon the glands and vessels of the skin, while the chemical rays influence the nervous system in a remarkable way. It is the chemical rays which cause so-called sunburn.

The marvelous energy manifested in plant life is derived from the sun acting upon the green parts to organize and vitalize the elements of the earth and air into living substances.

The same energy of the sunlight is essential to animal life. The sun bath is now a well recognized and much valued therapeutic agent.

In this form of treatment the whole body is exposed to the direct action of the sun's rays. Persons who are not accustomed to expose to the sun, and individuals who have light hair and light skins, should make the first exposure to the sun of short duration; ten or fifteen minutes. Longer exposures are likely to produce sunburn. No particular harm is done by sunburn, excepting the inconvenience occasioned by it. The pigmentation of the skin induced by sunburn protects the skin from further injury.

The body may be exposed either in the open air or before a window. When the sun's rays are so intense that the heat is depressing, the heat rays may be filtered out by means of a blue screen placed between the patient and the sun.

After the sun bath, a cold plunge, a cold shower, a cold towel rub, or a wet-sheet rub should be administered to tone the skin and the nerves.

In the summer time in a hot climate the sun bath may be very conveniently taken in an outdoor gymnasium. A sand pile furnishes a most appropriate couch, as the heat which it accumulates may be utilized as an aid to induce perspiration when this is desired.

Every home should be provided with a convenient place for taking the outdoor sun bath in the summer time, and sun bath indoors during the cold season. Civilized human beings suffer greatly because of the seclusion from the sun occasioned by modern modes of life. Those who reside in cities, like the cave dwellers of the olden time, are by their opaque walls and shaded windows, almost excluded from the sun. The results are shown in the pale faces of old and young, the rickety children, the growing prevalence of consumption and other constitutional maladies, the increase in deformities and degenerations, and other evidences of race deterioration. Out-of-door life and a return of the simple habits of our ancestors is the only way in which the race extinction to which we are at present rapidly hastening can possibly be averted.

The sun bath is useful in almost every form of disease in which an acute febrile process is not present. It is especially valuable in neurathenia, all forms of dyspepsia, rheumatism, diabetes, gout, skin disease, and chronic maladies of every sort.—Health Culture.

MORE ABOUT WOMEN AND ECONOMICS.

I am made glad to read B. Kerr's article upon this subject in a recent Lucifer number. I regard this matter of economic independence for every individual woman, child and man, as of paramount importance in the evolution from a condition of slavery to a condition of freedom.

Yet this seems to be a much misunderstood proposition. Hence a few words in the way of explanation from the writer's standpoint, may not be out of place.

We will suppose that with prehistoric man, before the time of individual ownership of wife, husband, child and property, when each gathered their own food, same as the wild birds now do, that all were economically independent. The important question at this time is: How, under our present conditions of law and custom, can woman and grown children maintain a feeling of economic independence and freedom and also maintain the family relations?

An interesting story has been published in a leading magazine touching upon this subject, which runs about like this:

He—a commercial traveler at a salary of $600.

She—a teacher at same salary.

At marriage they united their savings, started a systematic set of books consisting of day-book, cash-book and ledger.

Each was credited on the books with their respective investments in the business, same as two men would be, entering into a business partnership. She was made the book-keeper.

The home being established she took charge of it, and by the cultivation of a garden, care of poultry, etc., made what she could.

There is a long story reciting further increase of his salary, successful investments, accumulation of wealth, children born and matured to manhood and womanhood and a happy, prosperous life, and all seeming to hinge upon the fortunate introduction of that simple set of books, or book-keeping. The book-keeping always told the true story of their lives in point of economics. Told how each stood with the firm each day; made each feel they were somebody; made each think and feel they were an important factor in the conduct of the business. The faculties of each were developed.

More can be said, but this perhaps is sufficient for the present article. Hope others will take up this subject, as it surely is a very important factor in the evolution upward to better human conditions.

INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITY.

In the Chicago American of Sunday, July 17, Ella Wheeler Wilcox has an editorial on Individual Responsibility, the closing paragraphs of which read as follows:

Are you a young man thinking of marriage?

If so, what sort of a life are you living? Are you preparing to take a clean heart and body to your bride, or are you indulging every vicious impulse and appetite? How are you showing your idea of responsibility toward your unborn children? What sort of an inheritance are you preparing for them? Few men consider their vast responsibility toward the unborn. See to it that you are not making ready the way to give your offspring a heritage of disease, vice and crime.

And you, too, miss and madam, remember there is something due the children you may bring into life.

If you are destroying your health by wrong methods of life, or ruining your mind by wrong thoughts, you, too, are forgetting individual responsibility.

Many a young woman who has prided herself upon being a paragon of virtue has given full rein to quick temper and boasted of her ability to "get even" with people who wronged her. And when her son, later in life, developed murderous or insane proclivities she posed as a martyr to cruel fate and wondered why her life had been so blighted.

Uncontrolled temper in a mother frequently becomes crime in a child. Many a fallen woman can trace her inheritance to a father who believed he had the right to enjoy "the privileges of his sex" irrespective of law or church. He ignored the individual responsibility imposed upon each of us, and he paid the penalty through his daughter.

You, madam, are the mother of a little babe, and you wonder how any man, or body of men, could neglect looking after the safety of helpless children.

But are you always protecting your child and looking after its welfare?

Do you let a thoughtless nurse girl take the baby under the very drumsticks of the band in the park where its sensitive ears may be ruined for life by the deafening music?

More than one parent questions why its child is so afflicted, and poor fate or "God's will" bears the blame.

Perhaps you are your own nurse girl, and if so, do you ever expose your child to dangers? Is your duty to your offspring always foremost in your mind?

Or are you watching the shop windows as you trundle the baby in your care over the crowded thoroughfare?

Do you ever leave he child by a curbstone while you make a purchase or gossip with a friend?

Do you let the blazing sun pour down upon its delicate face and weaken its sight, perhaps for life?

Is your own individual responsibility always to be relied upon?

Better stop and think about this awhile.

Not one mother in one thousand has a sense of individual responsibility. As you, sir, read these words you nod your head and tell your wife to listen.

But how about you? Do you cuddle the delicate face of your baby against your lips and compel it to inhale a breath laden with nicotine and whisky?

Do you press living kisses on that sweet mouth with your own undisinfected one? If so, you are endangering the health of your child and exposing it to all sorts of ailments.

Your individual responsibility should at least cause you to purify yourself before you caress your helpless baby.

Whoever you are, whatever you are, wherever you are, in the highest or the lowest position, remember your own individual responsibility and live up to it.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

James Seldon Cowden, Washington, D. C.: "You have my vote: (1) to continue the publication of your invaluable sex paper; (2) to stay here in the United States; (3) to stick to your present name, unless you should, for some reason prefer to change it to 'Light Bringer;' (4) to charge $1 per year; (5) to issue it semi-monthly. I will take two copies of the 'Right to Be Well Born' when published in pamphlet form. Please extend my subscription for six months."

Edwin C. Walker, 244 West 143d street, New York City: "Referring to the query of B. M., will say I have a few copies of Mrs. Schumm's translation of Karl Heinzen's 'Woman and the Sexual Relations,' paper cover, a little contact-soiled, which are now commanding 75 cents each, delivered."

O. L. Harvey, W. Lafayette, Ind.: "As a Press Writer I gladly acknowledge the receipt of a copy of Lucifer. I saw your name in the list of the A. P. W. A. I have examined Lucifer. 'Light Bearer' would be more easily understood. I believe in universal freedom and in free expression of opinion, in charity and toleration. Have had much experience in love affairs—been married and divorced. Have often said, 'if we did not have so many infamous marriages we would not have so many infamous divorces.' The divorce is generally right, because the marriage was wrong. There ought to be some way to prevent the marriage of the dissolute, the diseased, and the incompetent. They are peopling the earth with the vicious and the criminal. I am a lover of humanity and a defender of all women, not only against others but against myself."

[I once knew a very superior man in Kansas, intellectual, moral, energetic, a leader of men, whose nine children were all imbeciles, little removed from hopeless idiocy. The mother was a superior woman, and the wonder grew, why should the children of such parents be imbecile? On the other hand I have known many cases in which comparatively superior children sprang from dissolute and apparently incompetent parents—thus seeming to invalidate the rule that like begets like. The only rational explanation is that in the first case there was a lack of temperamental adaptation and in the second cases each parent supplied elements the other lacked, enabling the creative forces to build a better child than either parent. If human beings were owned by other human beings, as cows and horses are owned by human beings, we might reasonably ask that there be established a board of expert examiners to decide who should become parents and who should not. As it is, the only just and rational hope for human improvement lies in the slow growth of knowledge and in the inculcation of a sense, or feeling, of responsibility on the part of parents, and especially on the part of mothers.—M. H.]

Louis Roser, Ky.: "As soon as you have any of the last two volumes of Lucifer bound, please let me know."

[The last two volumes will be bound as soon as there are orders enough to justify binding a few dozen; $1.50 per volume of fifty-two numbers, postage 25 cents.]

Electa Dodd, Arlington, Neb.: "Will Bro. A. H. Frank enlighten us as to his mode of living on twenty-five cents per week? Fearing my silence may be misconstrued, will say that my interest in Lucifer has never waned. Wish I were able to do more for it's maintenance than I can, but just as long as I am able to earn the subscription price just so long will I remain a subscriber."

J. C. Cameron, Soldiers' Home, Va.: "I do all that lies in my power to awaken the minds of those I come in contact with to the importance of the question of having the child well born, so as to eliminate the many that come into the world unfit to earn their own living, becoming inmates of charitable institutions and jails, patrons of drug stores, bar-rooms and houses of ill-fame; but while a very few will acknowledge that there is some truth in what I say the great majority put me down as a crank or a fool. I have a son and daughter in Florida to whom I have sent copies of Lucifer, also several other freethought papers, but lately I received a letter from a prominent business man in that state, telling me to send no more of such literature in that direction; that such reading matter would do no good but is like to do great harm. Now my son and daughter will not write to me. Nevertheless I continue to scatter the literature of reform, because I cannot see any way of bettering the race except by freeing woman from the thraldom of man-made creeds and thus making her a self-owning, self-reliant factor in human society. Send me a copy of Institutional Marriage."

Henry E. Allen, Benton Harbor, Mich.: "If any have entertained doubts as to whether Lucifer should continue or not I think the last issue should dispel any such doubts, for it was certainly a credit to any reform movement. Your splendid reply to the Woman's Tribune is worthy to be put into pamphlet form, also Comrade Kerr's article. I inclose a list of names to which I wish you to mail No. 1017. Money comes slow over here in the Michigan fruit belt, but we are heart and soul with you."

Thirza Rathbun, San Andrea, Cal.: "Accept apology for delaying my answer to your questions: (1) As to the name, Lucifer suits us very well but if the majority want it simply the Light Bearer, then count us among them. (2) Fortnightly? Yes, as we take many papers, being interested in many reforms. (3) If we see the way clear to help by taking more than one copy would certainly do so. Hope you are still enjoying the benefit of your trip to the Pacific coast. Sorry we did not see you."

L. M. Bryan, Homer, La.: "In order to reach readers presumbly much greater in numbers than the despised 'Anarchists,' why not call the paper the 'Christian Emancipator?' That name would need no 'explanation'—to some, neither does the name Lucifer. Or, why not, in the words of Emerson, 'write on the lintels of your door—Whim!' Would this save you from the necessity of explanation? No; you would still be misunderstood, but when you remember the names of some who have been misunderstood, such as Socrates, Jesus, Galileo, Newton, you might agree again with Emerson that 'to be great is to be misunderstood.' This country (Louisiana) is much in the rear on social questions, but the people are very hospitable. In addition to the quesion, 'Is marriage a failure?' which confronts us everywhere, we have here the 'Negro Problem'—a 'condition, not a theory;' a question much easier disposed of by glib writers a thousand miles away, than by the people who have it to contend with in their daily lives."

THE TURNER CASE IN ENGLAND.

From the London Daily News. Editorial May 30, 1904.

We think—indeed, we are sure—that the story of mingled stupidity and tyranny which we tell this morning in the words of the victim, Mr. John Turner, will have aroused widespread disgust and indignation in the United States, in whose name the offense was committed. We would not make a mountain of a molehill, and we lay no stress on the irksome conditions of the imprisonment which Mr. Turner suffered on Ellis Island, in the Bay of New York. By consenting to leave the country as an outcast he could at any moment have regained his liberty; but, urged by his friends in the country, he insisted on staying and fighting the matter out until released on bail. The discreditable thing is that such an arrest and such an imprisonment should be possible under any circumstances.

An instructive point for us in this country to note is that the crass ignorance which led to Mr. Turner's imprisonment was that of the Immigration Department—an institution with which we are threatened here, and which has managed to do grave harm to the national reputation of the Australian commonwealth, where there is an especially malignant organization of the kind. But this by the way. The point is that Mr. Turner, because his opinions are those of the school of political philosophy sometimes called "philosophic anarchy," and subscribed to by such men as Tolstoy and Kropotkin, has been treated as if he were an avowed conspirator against the lives of all who bear rule. The law of the United States on this subject, it seems, is such as to compel the judges to uphold this action of the Immigration Committee. This is the same jurisprudence that affords an asylum to the convicted criminal and escaped convict Lynchehaun. With Mr. Turner's opinions we have nothing to do; but we are bound to express our regret that such things should be done in the name of a people to whom liberty of thought should be especially dear.

ALTGELD AND HIS CRITICS.

The publication of the posthumous work of ex-Governor Altgeld, entitled "The Cost of Something for Nothing," seems to have caused not a little commotion in the camp of those who justify the judicial murder of the men who, on Nov. 11, 1887, gave their lives in defense of the principle of equal justice to all and special privilege to none; the men so ably defended by Altgeld in his "Reasons for Pardoning" the comrades of these Labor Martyrs. One of the critics of this lately published book, writing for the Chicago Daily News, begins thus:

"Recent laudatory reviews that have appeared on the late John P. Altgeld's 'The Cost of Something for Nothing,' in The Daily News and other newspapers call for a word of protest. Belonging to that school of literature which deliberately sets class against class; written by a dreamer who had it not been for his rugged oratory and great natural powers of persuasion had probably achieved no high distinction, the book clearly shows prejudice. Its philosophical basis is said to be founded upon the natural laws of action and reaction, particularly with regard to human conduct; but the author entirely overlooked that great natural law to which all the laws of science are subject—the law of natural selection, or the survival of the fittest.

"The book contains some good advice to young men starting out in business and political life; but, so woven is this upon a warp of class prejudice and political intolerance as to quite nullify its effect. The late governor attempts to show that there is a 'moral law,' which will exact fearful retribution from those who transgress it. But, morality, humanity (so-called) are not in nature's vocabulary. Nature has but one method—the elimination of the weak and unfit—and is preparing for the grandest of her triumphs, the reign of the strong man upon earth. As in his progress upward from the beast man has destroyed all those who have impeded his path, so must and will the greater race which is evolving from man destroy or leave to his fate his weaker brothers."

This writer heads his article "Nature's Way," and signs his name Ben Stedl, which name is probably a pseudonym. Pretty evidently Ben Stedl does not regard human sympathy, "humanity"—the desire to see all others enjoy the same rights, joys and blessings that we ourselves enjoy, as part of the "great natural law—the law of natural selection or the survival of the fittest."

To my thinking the sentiment called "humanity," human sympathy—which in its last analysis is simply a desire for justice, equity, rightness or righteousness, is quite as much a law of nature as is the so-called law of gravitation, or the law of appetite, called hunger, which causes the tiger to kill and devour the unoffending antelope or human child.

That is to say, while admitting that right and wrong are relative terms; while admitting that "might makes right," and weakness makes wrong, I maintain that the demand for an equal share of the bounties of nature for all human beings, and especially for those who do the hard work of the world, must ultimately prevail, because this demand has behind it the natural force called human sympathy; and that the robbers and murderers of men, such as the mine owning syndicate of Colorado and the coal barons of Pennsylvania, must ultimately go down in defeat and destruction, because they are fighting against this universal force, this cosmic force, known as sympathy for the oppressed, with its counterpart, hatred for the oppressor.

Clarence Darrow says of this book:

"This little volume was written just before Governor Altgeld's death, and is now published for the first time. It was given to me for examination by Mrs. Altgeld and on reading it I was convinced that it should be published just as it was left by him. Few men in this generation have been more persistently misunderstood than Governor Altgeld. This came from his fearless and relentless attacks upon injustice and wrong in places of influence and power. Since his death much of the personal bitterness has passed away, and an ever-growing number of his fellowmen are coming to recognize him as one of the most sincere and devoted friends of humanity that this country has produced. . . .

"At this time when every one is intent on getting something for nothing, these words of a statesman and a philosopher should not pass unheeded. Every thoughtful person who reads this book must realize that nothing can be had without cost, and that the accounts of the universe are adjusted and balanced so that in some way every one must, sooner or later, pay for what he gets."

The following paragraph, taken from the chapter entitled Reactionary Effect of Human Conduct may be taken as a keynote of the entire volume:

"After all that humanity has seen and has suffered, through we know not how many centuries, man does not yet fully understand the importance of the subjective or reactionary effect of human conduct, and yet this reactionary effect destroys men, dissolves fortunes and rots down families."

Besides the chapter on Reactionary Effect of Human Conduct there are chapters on Crime Regions; The Murderer and the Marauder; The Swindler and the Sneak Thief; Lying and Trickery; Railway Magnates; Local Monopolies; Certain Great Americans; Standard Oil Company; The Liquor Traffic; Newspapers; Manufacturers; Wages; Bankers; Lawyers; Do Judges Stagnate; Professional Militarism; Fighting for Liberty and Country; West Point; Currents of Destiny; "A Good Fellow."

All these subjects are treated in a philosophic and at the same time very practical manner—a truly masterful manner. Judged by the number of pages or lines the book is not a large one for the money, but judged by its intrinsic worth it is one of the best and at the same time one of the cheapest of all the books recently issued from the press. M. H.

The "Arena" for July appears in an entirely new make-up, and contains twice the amount of reading matter given in its monthly issues during recent years. It is now one of the very few magazines in the English-speaking world printed on all-rag paper and sewed. The cover is printed in colors. The frontispiece—a new portrait of Dan. Beard, the eminent artist, illustrator and author—is printed in deep sepia on India tint paper. —Light of Truth.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

The Cost of Something for Nothing. By John P. Altgeld. Cloth. Pp. 132. Price $1.00. Chicago: The Hammersmark Pub. Company.

Gov. Altgeld was a Freethinker, and his book is a fine answer from the Rationalistic viewpoint to the question, Why should we lead moral lives? He says, "The writer has tried to point out the fact that the getting of something for nothing has in it the germs of dissolution; that to receive more from our fellow men than we give in return will brand us as criminals, and put a blight upon our children; that the excuse that our fellow man consented to the bargain will not answer, for it is not only a question of wronging him, but it is also a question of violating the eternal law of equivalents, the universal law of balances." He has demonstrated that only by being good can we be happy, and that moral degeneracy surely follows the attempt to get something for nothing.

Speaking of the demoralizing effect of little things he observes: "The writer recently heard a young man laughingly tell of his outwitting a car conductor, and succeeding in riding into the city without paying the usual fare. He told the story in great glee, thinking it, no doubt, cleverness. This seems a trivial thing, and yet that little dishonest trick may be the beginning of that young man's ruin. He is cultivating a desire to get something for nothing."

Besides the murderer and the sneak-thief, the ex-governor shows that railway magnates, newspaper editors, judges, ministers of the gospel, and other "respectables" are in a state of moral decay.

Of the social outcast and her deceiver Mr. Altgeld writes:

"There is no more pitiable object than the weak, confiding woman, betrayed and abandoned, and a social outcast. No condition in life can be more hopeless. The path of degradation, vice and misery seems all that is left for her. When we hear of a man thus abandoning a woman we instinctively feel that there must be a hell—else how could such miscreants meet their just reward? But if we look deeper we find that Nature has fully covered the case, and she never yet has let a guilty one escape, unless he has made ample restitution. The man who ruthlessly abandons a woman who has believed and confided in him destroys himself; and though he flies to the ends of the earth, the curse will follow him. He may have genius, and may seem to prosper; but sooner or later the dark shadow of wrong will turn his face from the sun, and lead him into the currents of destiny that will carry him to his just punishment."

The book is an excellent one to hand to Christians who think Hell still necessary to restrain the vicious. Should the book be generally circulated it would do much to raise moral standards, now so degraded through the influence of Christianity.

The Foundation of All Reform; A Popular Treatise on the Diet Question. By Otto Carqué. Cloth, 50c; paper, 25c. Pp. 75. Chicago: Kosmos Publishing Co.

Opening with an argument to prove that primitive man was a vegetarian, chapters follow on the chemistry and physiology of nutrition, raw food and fruit diet, and diet reform—the ultimate solution of the economical and social problems, all of which are enriched by practical tables of food values, daily dietaries, etc. The author closes with a discussion of the ethics of diet reform. Much more might be said along this line concerning those inconsistent humanitarians who oppose vivisection, but who eat animals killed for food. The book can be recommended to all interested in a rational diet.

Unionism and Socialism. By Eugene V. Debs. Paper. Pp. 44. Price 10c. Terre Haute, Ind.: Standard Publishing Co.

While the Socialist candidate for president favors labor unions, he thinks the labor question will never be settled until the workers become political Socialists.

If I were to offer any criticism of Mr. Debs' position, it would be this:

I am informed that in a Socialist state the number of hours in a working day and the labor value or cost of an article would be determined by a State board. Since the number of working hours would vary with the disagreeableness of the work and the skill required, their adjustment would be a constant source of strife. Another source of friction would be that the producer would want the labor value of his product placed high, while the consumer would want the value of the same article placed low. Such conditions would inevitably cause strikes, and, when the government is the dictator, its position would be maintained by calling out soldiers, giving a repetition of the Colorado affair.

The Diagnosis from the Eye. By Henry Edward Lane, M. D. Cloth. Pp. 156. Price $2.00. Chicago: Kosmos Pub. Co.

The author contends that "morbid changes going on in the system are reflected in corresponding parts of the iris of the eye." The system is elaborated in great detail, charts being given showing the divisions of the iris correlated to the different parts of the body, and the effect of diseases on the appearance of the iris.

Whatever may be thought of this theory, the author's method of curing disease will be welcomed by all emancipated from the drug superstition. Dr. Lane believes in natural methods of healing, and recommends sunshine, fresh air, water as drink, proper exercise and rest, fruits as food.

Any of the above books may be procured from Lucifer.

JOHN E. BOULTENHOUSE.

No matter how many obstacles are piled against you you can topple them over or remove them one by one if you are determined and patient.

LIFE AND DEATH.

I note in No. 1015 of Lucifer, a reference to a book written by Harry Gaze on the union of life and death, and agree with him as to the result of a balance of the two factors. I also assert that the only way to reach such balance is through the entire freedom of women.

The feminine is the builder of all living forms. The masculine is the destroyer, the taker-to-pieces that the feminine may build finer; one just as essential as the other.

The two factors must be equal, the building must keep pace with the tearing down process, or the body must disappear—die as it is now called.

But to be equal, woman must be absolutely free so far as the disposal of her person is concerned, and to pledge herself for life and then to hold it moral to stick to that pledge "for better or for worse" is a bitter mistake.

And yet how true it is that "nearly all women, even those who claim to be free and self-owning, are slaves to their own inherited ideals."

Those who claim freedom, when it comes to living it, are likely to act the advice of the mother in the following lines:

"Mother, may I go swim?
Yes, my darling daughter;
Hang your clothes upon a limb,
But don't go near the water."

I said in the article for which I was fined $100 for sending it through the mails, that there were no fallen women in the sense the world understood that term; that they were knocked down—this in reply to Dr. Paul Edwards' Mental Scientist's article entitled "The awful fate of fallen Women."

No woman has fallen who has never held an unwilling relation, and no woman will be submitted to an unwilling relation if free—free from a legal pledge, and also from blame by those who hold man's law above the spontaneity of nature.

It is this blame of the self-righteous which makes women prostitutes.

In the book called "My Century Plant," written while I was a United States prisoner under bonds because an obscene-minded man had looked through obscene glasses when reading "Foundation Principles," there occurs on page 39 the following:

"Oh, this mighty thought-power! what ruin it can produce! Think of a young girl who has loved to consummation, without legal sanction—imagine the thought directed toward her, surrounding her, enveloping her with a cloud of images that are worse than the locusts of Egypt.

"Under such a pressure the poor girl is very likely to sink, but she is not ruined by what she has done but by what a falsely educated public thinks of her and forces her to think of herself. Suppose she could be positive to this outside sphere of thought, could rise above it and say with Helen Harlow, 'no woman is ruined unless she thinks so,' would she be ruined then? No, she would be grand.

"Let us imagine such a one. Let us think of a woman strong in the divinity of her self-hood; one who sees clearly her right to herself and deliberately lives that right in spite of men or devils; think of such a woman moving on with head erect, and a strength of soul that, refusing to be crushed, drives the swarming thought-images of vileness back with her own positive self-respect, thus forcing respect from others, and you have imagined one greater than any Jesus on the cross, or Daniel in the den of lions, for the lions flee and the cross disappears as she prepares the way for the fulness of a salvation that neither man, nor God-man can bring."

The needed first steps toward woman's full freedom is to change this mental atmosphere, to clear it of its poison, of its serpent-vibrations by thinking right thoughts, pure thoughts, reverential thoughts of sex. We must clear it of the material idea of the need of woman's being owned in its use, of the idea of degradation if not thus owned. Until this is done economic freedom will be of little use so far as the great mass of women are concerned.

We must also get rid of the idea that a woman who is highly endowed sexually is of a lower order of development, is "animal." If our creative life is animal, then we are animals, just as truly as anything brings forth after its kind. The blending of human sex life creates intellectually and spiritually as well as physically, and a woman thus highly endowed, if held to the thought that she is low because of it, then she gestates a low atmosphere, degrades, when with reverence for her own power she becomes capable of blessing all around her.

Friend Shepherd says rightly that the sex question is the most vital, the most far-reaching of all. Solved, and it solves all else. Yes, we shall have less freedom of the press before we shall have more, and as to the Anarchists being so small a factor, friend Kerr makes a mistake. Were the Anarchists of this country to combine in organized form and blow the trumpet as the Socialists do he would be very much surprised, but, as they do not believe in the rule of one over another, they cannot organize without stultifying their own principles. Self-governmen is their watchword.

But, going back to the sex question, and to the book that I wrote and published while a prisoner under bonds, and from which I have quoted, I do not know how much I was aided by spirit friends, but I do know that they gave me the title, "Century Plant," and I never pick it up and look it over without being surprised at the logic and sweep of the argument. I have them bound, and in paper cover, $1, and 50 cents.

Letters and book orders can be sent to me at Home, Wash., via Lake Bay.

Another thought. There is much said in Lucifer in reference to colonies and co-operation. Do such colonies help to solve the sex problem? I know of at least two such colonies that have been broken up by it, and I know of but one place where motherhood is honored without legality, where not so much as a frown is meted out to the mother. No, they are not a reckless, not an "animal," people, but self-respecting, and intelligent beyond the average; and also, are respected by the surrounding country. Freedom does not lead to degradation. When the fact of organized power is taken from the neck of humanity the race will arise and stand erect. LOIS WAISBROOKER.

WOMAN.

"Women are fortunate in belonging to the less tainted half of the race," said Frances Willard, and Dr. Benjamin Ward Richardson tells us that but for "this conserving fact the race would deteriorate to the point of failure."

A bright old woman, after viewing a brewery, distillery and tobacco factory, said, "Ain't I thankful that the women folks hain't got all that stuff to chew and smoke and swallow down."

Frances Willard further says, "woman has come into the college and elevated it, into literature and hallowed it, into the business world and ennobled it. She will come into government and purify it, into politics and cleanse its Stygian pool, for woman will make home like every place she enters and she will enter every place on this round earth. Any custom, or traffic, or party on which a woman cannot look with favor is irrevocably doomed. Its welcome of her presence and her power is to be the final test of its fitness to survive. The growing individuality, independence and prestige of woman steadily requires from man a higher character and purer habits of life. I have no fears for the women of America; they will go forward."

With the foregoing for a text I will say that most women are fortunate in belonging to the less tainted half of the race, but do not deserve any credit for it. The ones that do not use tobacco and whisky cannot, and the ones that can, do; it all depends on the capacity. Woman as well as man is what she has been made by her environment. She is the inevitable product of the past. Some philanthropists have come to believe it possible to improve humanity by better environment and by so educating men and women that they will know that they have no right to the relation that may cause them to become parents unless the proper environment is theirs. They must think of all the responsibilities accruing from this relation and know whether they are willing and ready to take these responsibilities upon themselves.

To the love relation lovers have a right, but not the propagative relation, unless they desire to become parents. As to "the race deteriorating to the point of failure but for the conserving fact that women are less tainted than men" stands to reason, and it is to be hoped it is true, for the great majority are less tainted in body and mind, purer physically and mentally.

In spite of all that has been done by man to degrade her, evolution has given to the world some pure-minded and fairly good specimens of womanhood physically, and as woman evolves so will man. They will rise or fall together, one cannot climb far without the other. Their destinies are irrevocably linked together.

But the women of America and the whole world will go forward and man will go forward with them. A few women have come to know something of their power in the world; have come to realize partly at least some of the responsibility resting upon them as mothers. They can no longer be ruled by man. They know the greater responsibility is theirs and unless the requisite environment is sure, will refuse to become mothers. A few women are capable of making for themselves a living and homes after their own ideal. When this can be done extensively it will be well, for woman must be economically independent before she can be free in the fullest sense. As to "woman coming into government and politics," that will be done by governing herself and her own affairs.

"And woman will make home like every place she enters and she will enter every place on this round earth. Any custom, or traffic, or party, on which a woman can not look with favor is irrevocably doomed. Its welcome of her presence and her power is to be the final test of its fitness to survive." That means that the brothel, the brewery, the saloon, the tobacco factory, political trickery, the office-seeker, interest on money, rent, the government of man by man and the church—all will become obsolete when enough of a steadily increasing number of evolved men and women come upon the stage of action.

"The individuality, independence and prestige of woman steadily requires from man a higher standard of character and purer habits of life." When we have—and we will have—this much-desired condition of affairs, which will be for the good and happiness of both man and woman, then heaven will begin on earth.

But in the meantime, Oh! woman, behold your work. Not one woman can afford to be idle. Things are in the present deplorable condition because of man's rule over woman. If they are ever made better it will be by the help of woman, working side by side with man, a recognized, yea a proudly, gladly recognized equal. S. C. CAMPBELL.

ONE WOMAN'S VIEW.

The sex question is relatively of such infinitesimal consequence to the father-sex when compared to its tremendous importance to the mother-sex, and this fact is made so painfully apparent by a majority of the former when writing upon it that I am fain to wish they might be induced to forego that pastime and keep from that matter their profane and polluting touch.

Please notice, I said "majority"—for there are rare and noble exceptions. I can not now recall that Lucifer's editor has ever made me feel by his own writings that he polluted the subject. And I recollect, too, somewhat to my confusion, that the first time I ever read that the ability to perfectly prevent conception was the key to woman's freedom, it was from a woman's writing—a woman, too, who was a wife and mother—which is to me incomprehensible.

The above remedy for woman's slavery involves this: The organs of conception are raised to the highest, happiest pitch of anticipation. Eager, throbbing, alive with intensest yearning, they quiver for the satisfaction of their desire for fruition, for of cruelty. Can any one not hopelessly blind imagine that repeated outrages like this on such important members and functions of the body will go unavenged? Is it not supposable, even inevitable, that they will react on the nervous system and wreck the health of the woman who thus denies and insults the rights of this portion of herself? It is bad, indeed, that any woman should be childless, but it is infinitely worse that any woman should allow the cup of life and joy to be brought to the very lips of her thirsty motherhood and then withdrawn or devitalized. It is a shame and a horror inexpressible.

The settlement of the sex question belongs to women and I have no fears but what they will settle it in a way not detrimental to any one when they are economically free. If men of unquestioned ability as writers, like R. B. Kerr, would work to free us and themselves from industrial slavery, and cease meddling with the sex question, they would earn most hearty thanks from one, at least.

HOW TO KEEP YOUNG.

Love is considered by most people a plaything to be enjoyed by the young only, but this is a false notion, because no young lovers could be more in love with each other than my lover and I at our advanced age (fifty and over). Love is not confined to young people. Love keeps lovers of any age young. Men and women should cultivate and worship love as a means of warding off old age. Love is the best stimulant for keeping up our interest in life and for keeping us young.

I have always appreciated the society of men but in my youngest days I was never fond enough of one man to give up my liberty to him. Marriage always seemed to me the loss of my liberty and too often the death of love, for I have noticed that generally love ceased after marriage, or after indulgence in marital relations. I have often heard the phrase, "Love kills compulsion." But I always thought the subject and predicate were interchangeable, that is, that "Compulsion kills love."

Perhaps you would like to know how often I have changed my lover. Some of them remained faithful to me for two, three, four, and seven years, others a shorter period. They left me when they realized that I could not be tempted into marriage nor into the orthodox way of loving. I could never understand how a woman could love several men at the same time, because all my time is taken up with my own work and with one lover. Neither could I understand the woman who pins her affection to one man, and when he ceases to love her, she withdraws from society and leads a lonely life.

My present lover is a little older than I. Some of them have been much younger than I. My rooms are our home. My lover does not sleep in my apartments, but he has the key to them. . . . We think that it is wiser not to live together for the present, because the public is so prejudiced against new ideas in love lines. . . . We both want to express in our personal appearance the superiority of our love-life over the orthodox method of loving. We both feel very young, but we are not quite satisfied with our looks, we would like to be still younger looking. . . .

May the God of Love visit all lonely maidens, deserted mothers and wives, and fill them with hope and strength to begin a new love-life on lines that will prevent the disappointment of their past love-life.—An American Young Old Maid, in Health Without Drugs, London, Eng.

Commenting on the invocation of this American Young Old Maid the editor of "Health Without Drugs," Sophie Leppel, says:

"This seems to me the noblest prayer ever uttered. I ask my readers, Is it not a more human, a more divine prayer, a more sympathetic prayer than any you have ever heard before? Bear witness to these words, O thou tragic and uncounted host of broken hearts, blighted hopes and desolated lives! The pity of these tragedies is that, generally, we can fix no responsibility for them on any human instrument."

Sophie Leppel has achieved world-wide fame as a teacher of hygiene. Her paper is published quarterly and is well worth the price, which, as well as I remember, is only fifty cents per year. M. H.

VARIOUS VOICES.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

C. S. Carr, M. D., editor Medical Talk, Columbus, O.: "Your positions are radical, but I am much interested in the line of thought you have taken up. It is a courageous stand to take, and I have no doubt that it is the forerunner of much good. At any rate I shall be greatly pleased to enjoy fraternal relations with you."

Benjamin A. Franklin, Livery Lane, Germantown, Pa.: "Have you any knowledge of any Socialist colony flourishing at the present time? We have quite a number of advanced thought people in this country, but are there any trying to carry out the Socialist plan, not waiting for national nor international leaders to make the lower strata comprehend?"

[Will our Socialist friends answer?]

C. W. Lord, Del.: "Enclosed find $1.00. Will send balance I owe soon."

[If our financial system were based on equity and not upon robbery, as now, the credit plan would not be justified. As it is, many very excellent people find it impossible to pay as they go, and therefore we continue sending Lucifer after time has expired—only insisting that our friends notify us that they want the paper.]

J. G. Coffin, Worcester, Mass.: "You may always send me your valuable paper and whenever I am in arrears I shall be only too glad to make up what I owe you, and subscribe ahead a year or so. It will be doing me a great favor if you will notify me when my subscription expires, as I am liable not to notice it by the number on the wrapper. I enclose $2.10—(ten cents for exchange), for further subscription. Wishing you all success in your work."

[There are many like Bro. Coffin, too busy to notice the tag on the wrapper of their paper and thus allow their subscription to fall into arrears. Hence it is unjust to cut their names off the list without notification. This we try to do, but sometimes it is overlooked.]

THE RIGHT TO BE BORN WELL.

In the paragraphs quoted from the paper read before the Kansas City "Mothers' Meeting," by one of its members, the word "passion" occurs in a way that would naturally leave the impression that the writer regards passion as something to be avoided, something opposed to "purity." Quoting again her exact words:

"Will we lay the foundation in sexual passion? Will we build the superstructure of selfishness, antagonism and hate? . . . It is right here we must make our first impressions; right here we may stamp purity or passion. . . . If the keynote is passion, what must we naturally expect?"

Thus it would seem that the author of the paper, "At What Age Shall We Teach Our Children the Sacred Uses of Sex?" would place sexual passion in the same category with "selfishness, antagonism and hate."

Knowing the writer of these words personally, I have good reason to think she does not regard sex passion as a bad thing in itself, any more than she would think the appetite for food a bad thing in itself considered. All physiologists, all hygienists, will agree that "hunger," a keen "appetite," is the first and most important condition or preparation for the proper and healthful digestion and assimilation of food, and therefore for the prolongation of life.

Precisely analogous to hunger for food is the hunger, the appetite, commonly called sexual passion. The first and perhaps the chief object, purpose or use, of the sex appetite is reproduction of the race, race-preservation, just as the first, the principal purpose or use of the appetite for food is the perpetuation of the life of the individual person or animal.

Thus it is seen that sexual passion is not in itself a bad thing; not an instinct, impulse or force to be fought against, overcome, conquered or weeded out, but rather to be cherished as one of our most necessary endowments, most valued possessions.

In order, however, that sex-passion should be preserved, maintained, in the integrity of its power and usefulness, it must be kept under the control of reason, just as the appetite for food should be kept under the control of reason. Excessive or untimely indulgence of either form of appetite is sure to be followed by weakness of the organs most nearly concerned, and through sympathy and interdependence other parts of the organism, animal and mental, must suffer.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox, author of "Poems of Passion" and one of the most popular writers of our time, is responsible for the following strongly worded vindication of sex-passion:

"I have heard more than one mother of several children make the awful confession that she had not the slightest understanding of love or passion as she heard those emotions described in books or by poets. She was fond of her husband, one wife said, but considered her maternal offices as a duty only, and that she believed such feelings were common to mothers.

"I trust she was mistaken. Children conceived and born under such conditions are, to my thinking, the illegitimate offsprings of Earth. No law of man—no words pronounced by church or court—can make such children legitimate or well born.

"There must be, at least on the mother's part, a strong love and an abiding affection, and a complete abandon of her heart and mind upon the altar of love to render motherhood a sacred and successful office.

"All the great souls of Earth were conceived and born of such a passion. The reason there are so few great souls is that there are so few great passions.

"Motherhood ought to be, but rarely is, proof of the perfect mating of two souls."

That is to say, in mating for motherhood, woman, the race-builder, should see to it that she does not join creative forces with a man she does not love with her whole heart and soul; love as her soul mate as well as her body mate—her physical body or simply animal mate.

I think Mrs. Wilcox eminently in the right when saying that "a strong love, an abiding affection" [soul love] is more necessary on the part of the mother than it is on the part of the father, when uniting for reproduction of the race, and for reasons that need not be elaborated here; hence the cruelty, the criminality of laws and their administrators that will not permit woman always to choose the man for whom her soul yearns, when desiring the union that may result in motherhood.

Conventional woman, as she undoubtedly is, Mrs. Wilcox deserves the lasting gratitude of all sex reformers for such brave utterances as those just quoted, and she can be forgiven for such lapses as that recently printed in the Chicago American when she seems to inculcate obedience to "law and church" in this sentence:

"Many a fallen woman can trace her inheritance to a father who believed he had the right to enjoy the 'privileges of his sex' irrespective of law and church."

That is to say, if a woman disregards civil and canon law and gives birth to a child in freedom, she is a "fallen woman," and can "trace her inheritance," her fall, to a father who also ignored civil and canon law in his sex relations. Such a man may have been the slave of sex-passion and he may not. He may have been one of the self-controlled men described in the opening quotations of this essay:

"It demands something God-like in him who has cast off the common motives of humanity and has ventured to trust himself for a task-master. High be his heart, faithful his will, clear his sight, that he may be in good earnest, doctrine, society, law, to himself; that a simple purpose may be to him strong as iron necessity to others."—Emerson.

If the daughter of such a man really "fell," when she became a law unto herself, a free mother, it was because she accepted the verdict of conventional society and was not strong enough to defy the Grundies, male and female. Otherwise she would have had reason to rejoice and be proud of her act, as having practicalized the advice of the Sage of Concord, when, in another place, he says:

"Be true to your own act and congratulate yourself if you have done something strange and extravagant and broken the monotony of a decorous age. It was high counsel I once heard given to a young person: 'Always do what you are afraid to do.'"

Of course, this precept, "Always do what you are afraid to do," should, like all other ethical maxims, be interpreted rationally, not literally. To put one's hand into boiling oil, simply because the instinct of self-preservation says "Don't," would be foolish, would be suicidal; whereas to violate an irrational law founded on ignorance or superstition, thereby breaking one of the chains of bondage—"bondage to fear"—would be an act of wisdom.

One of the hopeful signs of the times is the frequency with which we hear and read protests against the enslavement of womanhood and motherhood, and also manhood and fatherhood, by statute laws and priest-made customs. I have already quoted in this essay a paragraph or two from Prof. Edgar L. Larkin, Director of Mt. Lowe Observatory, Echo Mountain, Calif., and now again am glad to avail myself of the aid of his powerful pen. In the August, '04, number of Suggestion, Chicago, Prof. Larkin has an article entitled "Human Auras and Psychic Possibilities," the concluding paragraphs of which read as follow:

SEXOLOGY.

"Greater, however, than psychic education will be the entirely new science—psychic sexology. History has not recorded more horrible laws relating to union of sexes than those now on the statute books of "civilized" nations. Vast hierarchies, literary Juggernauts, crush love, hope, happiness, life out of mismated couples. Men and women are forced to live together after they find that their auras are as unlike in rates as A and G wires of a piano. In many cases this frightful discovery is made within a day or week after the fatal marriage. Gloom, dismay and discomfiture settle like a pall, and two lives are ruined. The world is being filled with unharmonious children that ought never to have been born; and wonder is expressed that crime is on the most rapid increase. A man and woman are pronounced husband and wife. Then this sentence is added: 'What God has joined, let no man part.' The repeating of these words is a 'great psychological crime' if their auras are inharmonic.

"Psychic schools should be substituted everywhere and state universities for the education of trained psychic teachers and examiners should be erected in every State in the Union. What horrors are awakened in the minds of a bride and groom when they find that they are not mated! What worlds of suffering would be avoided if a reader of auras could inform them of their inharmonic natures before marriage, not after! What centuries of nameless crime has been heaped upon the generations of inharmonic children! They are criminally brought into the world and must pass lives of suffering with perverted minds and nervous systems. With psychic marriage laws the hideous divorce courts would close, and weeping children would no longer be led from their doors. Everything is coming the psychic way, and a movement of vast import has set in; men are studying that almost unknown entity, the human mind. In a few years we will treat ourselves as well as we now do potatoes, cows and horses. At present the people are in a hopeless tangle; unhappiness, sorrow and trouble fill the minds of multitudes of the married, while love, mercy and pity are strangers to millions of suffering children."

From these paragraphs it is seen that Prof. Larkin expects much from the reading of "Auras"—atmospheres given off from each individual person—by experts. That great advances have been made within the past few years in what is called Psychic Science I feel quite sure, and why psychology may not become very useful as an aid to settling the ever "previous question," that of the right adjustment of sex relations, to the end that children may be born well if born at all, and that parents may live happily in the conjugal relation, is a very practical question for us to ask.

While thanking Prof. Larkin most sincerely for his manly protests against the "hierarchies" and "literary [legal?] Juggernauts that crush love, hope, happiness, life, out of mismated couples," I must nevertheless enter a mild "demurrer" against the State Socialistic features of his educational scheme. Warned by past experience I think the less we have of state regulation of education and of the intimate personal relations of women and men, the better.

THE GIRK BACKED OUT.

(Princeton Tribune.)

Up at Washington the other day James Barton of Monroe City and Artie Nicely of Petersburg, the former under 20 years of age and the latter under 18, through a friend succeeded in getting a license to get married. They sought the services of a minister and the services had proceeded to the point where the reverend gentleman had asked the couple to join hands. At this point the prospective bride put in a question: "Say, if I get married and don't like it, I can quit if I want to, can't I?" The good minister was thunderstruck, but informed her that such was not the case; that she was taking the obligation for life. The girl then turned to the expectant and embarrassed groom-to-be and remarked: "It's all off, Kid; I ain't going to do it." And the couple left the parsonage. We understand the girl was one of the late high school graduating class of Petersburg, but it is very evident that common sense was not included in her high school studies, or if it was she must have graded rather low.

That girl lack common sense? Why, if every girl had as much sense as Artie Nicely we wouldn't have to wait long for the millennium. Then sense would be "common" in fact as well as in name. I say the girl is a credit to her sex, and not only to her sex, but to the human race.

We wouldn't say that a man lacked common sense who refused to make a life contract for an uncertain business proposition. But for a woman entering into a relation far more hazardous and uncertain than any business venture to refuse to make a life contract, that is preposterous! Cruelty, her?

I disagree, decidedly disagree, with this country editor. I believe the girl showed wisdom. She knew that she was taking a step in the dark. She knew that her mate might not prove congenial; that they might not be adopted to each other physically, mentally, or morally. Realizing that marriage would bring her into much closer relations with her friend she wished to leave an avenue of escape in case more intimate acquaintance revealed unforeseen incongruities.

Perhaps she thought that love might change, that the one now to her so dear might become an object of indifference, of aversion, or even of detestation. Perhaps she thought she could longer retain his love if he knew his wife would leave him if he were cruel.

She may have been afraid her husband would become a rake or a drunkard. She may have seen in imagination the nights when, as the husband's unsteady tread sounds on the threshold, the children hide and the mother shrinks back, fearing a drunkard's brutality. Yes, if she had been observant she may have seen many such cases among her neighbors.

At any rate, she realized the uncertainty of the future and wished to protect herself. If anything unpleasant should happen she wanted to be able to escape from it without injuring her self-respect or honor. So I take off my hat to Artie Nicely, the girl who had the courage to say, "It's all off, Kid; I ain't going to do it."

Of course the minister was "thunderstruck." Why not? Woman has been a slave so long that for one of her sex to assert her independence is surely disconcerting. So long has woman been indoctrinated with the idea of submission to the church and its decrees that for her to rebel must have seemed like a sudden change from the natural order of the universe.

This clergyman evidently believed in indissoluble marriage. But whence comes this idea? Hardly from the Bible directly. The marriage laws of the Old Testament were not strict. Polygamy was permitted and, "When a man hath taken a wife and married her, and it come to pass that she find no favor in his eyes because he hath found some uncleanness in her, then let him write her a bill of divorcement and give it in her hand and send her out of his house." Deut. XXIV, 1. Jesus and Paul rather despised marriage, and it was left to the medieval church to proclaim marriage a sacrament—an indissoluble union. When the cancerous growth of superstition had so developed in the human mind that from the moment the church baptized the new born babe 'till she administered last unction to the withered and dying man scarcely a moment of the individual's life was passed outside of priestly control, then was it possible for the church to enforce the decree that whom God, through his official representatives, had joined, let no man put asunder.

This relic of ecclesiastical control still lingers with us. Still we hear it proclaimed that marriage is a sacrament. But this will not be permanent. Although the Christian is always reserving a field of knowledge which he fences around with anathemas and says to the investigator, "Thus far and no farther," yet the scientific mind is not awed. Science claims the universe for investigation. She will admit no limits, no forbidden spots to careful, honest investigation. So, in spite of the threats of the church, science has investigated marriage—its origin and its history. Let us see the result:

The researches of Westermarck and others show that marriage owes its origin to natural selection. For the preservation of the child it was necessary that the parents should live together and nourish and protect their offspring during the period of infancy. Those animals which thus married had their progeny preserved, while those that did not, soon became extinct, as their children did not survive. Thus the habit became an instinct and was transmitted by heredity. This occurred far, far back in the life history of the earth. Our ape ancestors were monogamous, and probably lived the ideal Christian life.

Such was the origin of marriage; not in the decree of a god, but in the action of nature, working blindly for her own preservation. An inviolable marriage was necessary then, but I say it is not so now. Conditions have changed. We have risen above the brute stage. Love has developed in the human heart, so that if couples separate they would not leave their offspring to perish. The human father and mother will sacrifice and work for their children even when children are ungrateful. Even in cases where there is enough of the brute nature left to cause humans to abandon their babes there are always those possessing sympathy sufficient to provide the unfortunates with homes. So I say that indissoluble marriage is no longer necessary for the preservation of the human race.

But just here Mr. Christian Moralist steps forward and says: "Wait! If you permit couples to separate, you destroy the sanctity of the home!" What is the "sanctity of the home"? Will anyone who makes use of the term please define it? Is it anything tangible? Or is it one of those stock phrases which serve only to befuddle and cloud the intellect and so prevent clear thinking? Is the home where love has gone out sacred? Can sanctity exist in the same house with vice, hatred, and malice? Will children born of unhappy unions have any sacred qualities? No; it is impossible! Only those homes are sacred where exist love, sympathy, happiness, and such homes will never be broken up.

Again: Suppose children should sometimes be cast out into the world at a youthful age. I contend it is often a good thing for them. They probably escape from homes filled with rancor and deceit; thus may they be able to escape moral contamination. To strike out into the world makes one independent, and we need independent men and women. We suffer from the stagnation of those who follow slavishly in the footsteps of their parents. Let the children go out into the world that they may get new ideas.

So I conclude that making marriage a contract dissoluble at the will of the parties concerned will result in increase of happiness and welfare for the human race.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

W. W. Miller, 159 Spring street, New Haven, Conn.: (1) I sincerely hope the paper will be continued. (2) Right in its present place of publication, or, if it would suit its editors and publishers better to remove their plant to some sunny climate, such as southern California, then my best wishes would go with them. (3) Whatever its publishers choose to give it; personally I prefer its present name. (4) Personally would rather have fifty-two numbers for $2 than twenty-six numbers for $1. Do not consider $2 too much; consider $1 too small; would not consider $3 excessive and would really rather pay $5 than see it suspended. My means would place a limit at five dollars. (5) Would prefer it weekly; fortnightly rather than monthly, but would gladly accept it monthly if I could not get it oftener. Will be responsible for one yearly subscription, and will circulate my copies among acquaintances that the paper may speak for itself, and may volunteer to pay for an occasional trial trip for some old man or woman who might like to read it regularly but could not afford it.

Cecile C., Tenn.: "I enclose one dollar to help you with your paper. Though I do not propose to answer all the questions you put to your readers, would say that Mr. C. [now deceased] always objected to the name Lucifer, saying it was no use to carry a chip on your shoulder as a target to be shot at. Also that although discussion on most subjects is necessary the sex question would naturally settle itself without so much controversy, for you cannot hasten the march of progress. I wish you all success in your undertaking, in whatever way you may carry it on, but will ask you to discontinue sending me the paper. My main reason is that it is a publication I must keep out of sight, as my husband did, and read on the sly. Our surroundings and circle of friends are too conservative for us to do otherwise."

L. J. L., Box 322, Columbus, O., July 27, '04.: "For one I am not in favor of change of name. The public will gradually, if slowly, get accustomed to the name and it is sufficient if you print the sub-name with it, which is explanatory. A fortnightly is frequent enough publication and $1 a year would be within the reach of all. Drop the discussion of every other issue than sex. Lucifer has always stood for sex and should stand for sex alone. It is the only American publication that does. Let Anarchist, Socialist and other publications—and their name is legion—take care of those issues and leave Lucifer—the beautiful Morning Star of human progress, to shine alone in its glory.

"If you can confine contributors to such magnificent reasoners as Dora Forster and R. B. Kerr there would not be a word in the entire journal that the average reader would overlook. The articles which these two brainy sexologists have recently written—"Must Economic Freedom Precede Sex Freedom," by R. B. Kerr, in No. 1017, and "Sex Radicalism—Who Are Our Teachers?" by Dora Forster, in No. 1018, are simply unanswerable.

"As for Free Love, you need not curtail the discussion one iota, but a little tact would not be out of place; and for the sake of the 'heathen' whom you might wish to convert, the use of the term 'Free Love' might be dispensed with without weakening your position or your argument one bit.

"Just as soon as I can get down to a good working condition I will make special efforts for Lucifer. Will then have you send me several hundred circulars which I will enclose in every letter I send out. I will try in every way possible to get you subscribers and 'ads,' for we cannot afford to let Lucifer go under. I would suggest that every friend of the Light Bearer pay for the printing of several hundred circulars each, and enclose one of the circulars in every letter they send out; or have an 'ad' of Lucifer printed at the head, or in the back, of their letter paper."

[It might be inferred from the apparent earnestness of L. J. L. that he is a new convert to the doctrines of Sex-Radicalism, but such is not the fact. For many years he has been a zealous worker for freedom of motherhood and for the right of the child to be born well, and has been the means of introducing Lucifer and its literature into hundreds if not thousands of homes. The suggestion that our subscribers send out Lucifer's circulars in their letters is, as I think, very commendable. We have some thousands of these advertising leaflets suitable for that purpose, which we can send to all who may care to use them. Several of our earnest workers are now using them in the manner suggested by Bro. L. J. L.—M. H.]

ANOTHER MAN'S VIEW.

Celia B. Whitehead recently said in these columns: "The settlement of the sex question belongs to women. . . . If men of unquestioned ability as writers, like R. B. Kerr, would work to free us and themselves from industrial slavery and cease meddling with the sex question they would earn most hearty thanks from one at least."

The good lady perhaps does not know that Comrade Kerr is one of the ablest and most industrious writers on industrial emancipation to be found on the western continent. He is working on precisely the same lines as is Mrs. Whitehead, so far at least as economics is concerned.

But the criticism offered by this Colorado Socialist writer on contraceptic methods is, to say the least, not scientific, and I would imagine that she had taken her cue from Anthony Comstock, or some other member of the so-called "vice society."

Sex hunger is a fact. With most human beings as with most animals it is the intensest of all appetites. I would infer from Mrs. Whitehead's criticism that she considered essential the propagative relation for the satisfying of sex hunger. In holding this position I think she is very much in error, and the situation she so cleverly describes, where "desire for conception is raised to the highest, happiest pitch of anticipation—only to be cheated," is not worse—in fact, is not so bad as is continual, unsatisfied sex hunger. As Comrade Kerr has shown, sex hunger slays its thousands. It is responsible for scores of deaths where the sufferers of both sexes have contracted all manner of diseases because they have violated natural law.

On the other hand, excessive child-bearing is responsible for more deaths than even abortion.

Mrs. Whitehead's criticism of contraception has been answered by almost every medical writer on this subject, and I believe the society of the future will not only encourage contraception but will adopt every reasonable expedient to lessen the death-rate caused from sex-hunger as well as abortion. We have not the wisdom at present to take any public notice of these great sources of human misery and premature decay. Our children, let us hope, will be saner.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. VIII., NO. 18.

Two more installments of the essay "The Right to Be Born Well," will probably complete the series. It will then be put into pamphlet form, provided there seems a sufficient demand for such pamphlet. The price will probably be 20 cents per single copy, or six copies for one dollar.

JAMES F. MORTON, JR.

Elsewhere in this issue will be found a "Notice" from James F. Morton, Jr., in reference to his proposed lecture tour through the eastern and middle states. Having heard Bro. Morton address several meetings in Chicago I can with a very good conscience recommend him as a courageous, clear, logical and very entertaining speaker, and feel quite sure that our friends everywhere will do well to arrange a series of lectures for him wherever possible.

While it is doubtless true, as asserted by many observers, that a collegiate education spoils a man for the practical affairs of life; while it is true that Horace Greeley prayed earnestly to be "delivered from college graduates" I feel sure that Bro. Morton is an honorable exception to the rule, and that he is a living proof that not all of Old Harvard's graduates are failures when life's serious battles are to be fought. His editorial management of the Demonstrator, Home, Washington, is proof that the opinion of Old Horace is not always infallible. Write to Bro. Morton at once, at his paternal home, Andover, N. H.

THE OUTLOOK.

The political parties have all had their national conventions, have adopted their platforms and definitely outlined their plans of campaign; all except, perhaps, the Democrats; for until the presidential nominee has published his letter of acceptance there is always some doubt as to how much or how little the platform upon which he was nominated represents his own personal views, and the principles by which he will be governed in case of his election.

The telegram, however, sent by Parker to the St. Louis convention in regard to his attitude on the money question, and accepted by that convention as satisfactory, leaves no room for doubt as to where the party, as a party, stands upon what must be considered as incomparably the most important of all issues now before the people of this country,—the financial.

This telegram and the acceptance thereof as satisfactory by the convention, verifies once more the saying that has all the force of an accepted axiom or proverb, namely, that ever since the formation of the Republican party, or at least ever since the opening of the great civil war, the Democratic party may be depended upon to "camp upon the trail" of the Republican, just eight years behind—adopting the policies of its predecessor.

The chief difference now between the Republican and Democratic parties is in the matter of honesty or candor, and in this regard the advantage is tremendously on the side of the Republicans.

As Roosevelt says in his letter of acceptance there is "no room for dodging," no excuse for dodging the issue. The Republican party openly and frankly champions the narrowest basis of currency—the gold standard, the money of plutocracy as against the money of democracy or the common people, while in their platform the Democrats dodge the issue, refuse to take an open manly stand for or against slavery of the masses to the classes—for, as Garfield, in his younger and better days, very truthfully said,

"Whosoever controls the currency of a country controls the liberties of that country."

The banking laws inaugurated by the Republican party, supplemented by the narrowing down of the basis of circulation to the single gold standard, simply chains the masses of producers to the triumphant chariot wheels of the owners of gold, and of gold mines.

With the surrender of the Democratic party to the owners of gold we may with almost absolute certainty expect these, among other results of such surrender:

First the perpetuity of the national debt. Under the reign of the gold lords the burden of debt will never be made less, but, judging the future by the past, this burden will be increased, as the years roll by.

Second. The gulf between the idle rich and the industrious poor will be widened and deepened until there will be practically only two well defined classes in this country, the one owning all the resources of nature, the land, the mines, the forests; also, the means of production and distribution, the tools, the ships, the railways, the warehouses, the factories, the elevators, etc., etc., the other class owning nothing but their ability to labor, their power to sell their services to the owners of the earth and its opportunities—which condition, as any one can see, means a system of slavery incomparably worse than that of chattelhood, for under chattelhood it was for the interest of the slave owner to care for his chattel in sickness, in case of accident, and in old age.

Never before, perhaps in the world's history, has there been such a widespread combine of the plutocratic classes as at this present moment. This combine, having captured the two leading political parties, the legislatures, the courts and the executives, no longer consider prudence and strategy necessary, and hence the gold lords of Colorado, the greatest gold producing state, the "packing house" trust of the leading cities, and if I mistake not, the coal barons of Pennsylvania, all declare, openly declare their intention to destroy the labor unions, thus compelling each applicant for work to underbid his fellow worker else lose his chance to sell his labor, his only means of securing a livelihood for himself and family.

Altogether the outlook is by no means encouraging for the lover of peace, of justice and of human solidarity. And yet some of us are so thoroughly imbued with the optimistic spirit that we do not despair. Notwithstanding the gloomy outlook politically and industrially, there is a silver lining to the cloud, and we all know that to the observer on the highest mountain tops there is always plenty of sunshine.

SEX RADICALISM.

II. WHAT MUST WE LEARN IN HEALTH SCIENCE?

It is no wonder that the theological power which has for ages ruled the world, and which long ago described "the knowledge of good and evil" as the origin of all harm to mankind, should have set up ignorance as a virtue. But even the church has been obliged to pay some court to advancing science; even an archbishop has been known to express a belief in evolution.

In one department of life, however, knowledge is still looked upon as wicked, and special praise is accorded to the girl or woman who is quite ignorant of sex, her state of mind being described by the term "innocent." It was no theological Pope who laid down the rule that "The proper study of mankind is man," and but few have realized the truth of it.

Nevertheless in enterprising America a demand arose about a generation ago, backed of course by the all-powerful femina Americana, for some knowledge on the tabooed subject; which has then and since produced a crop of books which actually made some knowledge of the physiology of sex accessible to the laity. But it was thought necessary to preserve the theological dogma intact that sex is an invention of the devil, only to be hallowed by the blessing of a priest pronounced over a couple who are to utilize sex powers only for the purpose of propagation. Any inconvenient facts, such as the number per cent or per thousand of married people who are able and willing thus to use sex faculties only for generation, were kept in the background; nor could the authors of these books at all tolerate the idea that any right-minded person could possibly feel sex activities of mind or body before a good income had been secured on which to marry.

The goody nonsense of perhaps the best of these popular books, Dr. Nichols' "Esoteric Anthropology," makes it almost useless for our purpose. These writers try to play on human fears exactly as quacks do, and seem to fancy that fear can make people moral. Dr. Alice Stockham's books are more modern, but they do not touch the question of celibacy. We need books that will fearlessly give us all the facts as accurately and fully as possible, and answer such questions as the following: What percentage of children develope sexual feelings and activities, (1) before the age of seven? and (2) between the ages of seven and fourteen? and what is the mental calibre of such children? and how should such activities be regarded? What substitutes, whether physical or emotional, for the natural exercise of the sexual faculties are resorted to by the majority of celibate men and women? and these facts should be easily obtainable, seeing that the Puritan sex system has forced nearly all of us, during most of our youth, to find forms of sex expression other than the most natural forms.

What proportion of men find the service of hired prostitutes satisfying? What proportion of celibate women suffer in health obviously as a result of the virgin state (apart from the strain on the nerves due to celibacy) so as to be disabled from professional work at least one day in the month? What crises in nerves are noticeable in human beings, and what is their relation to sex life? What proportion of married couples are sexually mated? How many women remain passionally unawakened after marriage? and what are the causes of this? and what its effect on health? What is known as to the frequency of sexual needs? In conversations which took place in the frank-spoken west, among groups of married men in two different places, quite a number of them replied to the question "How often?" by the answer "Every night;" one said "several times every night," and one said "once a month." We need to know the effect on happiness of "every night" persons being united in monogamic marriage to "once-a-month" persons.

I have no wish to dogmatize, but I believe the answers to some of the questions I have indicated would be in accord with the following opinions and suggestions of probabilities, which are based on discussions with various conscientious men and women, mostly people of special study and observation.

Persons who are vigorous both mentally and physically develop sex feeling in more or less degree very early in life, perhaps usually not later than the age of seven. The full connection between mental and physical sex feeling is not developed till many years later, though both may be active.

Sexual play is natural to children, and when arising naturally, and not stimulated by bad nurses very early, is usually not injurious, especially when there is plenty of healthy social play. The excess of it in highly nervous children is a symptom not a cause of nervousness. It is quite unscientific to call the excitement of the sex nerves, "solitary vice"; and it is mere cruelty to tell any child or adult that this habit is low and wicked; such teaching always defeats its own purpose. The child should be given enough knowledge to show him that the habit may become selfish, and, especially in the case of boys, exhausting, and to encourage him in moderation. The practice is continued into adult life as a means of relief to the starved sex nerves of celibates,—natural sexing being denied to them by our Puritan social laws. All these sexual phenomena are observable in domesticated animals of nervous nature, and do not appear to increase their nervousness, though they might if animals were infected with our ideas of "sin."

There are various emotional outlets for sex feeling, and when congenial social conditions are present, these may prove fairly satisfactory. Religious enthusiasm is one, especially among women, though it may sometimes excite rather than occupy and soothe the nerves. Perpetual falling in love, common to highly susceptible men in youth, perhaps has the same effect. Romantic affection of the youth of both sexes for persons of their own sex is common.

The institution of prostitution can only be regarded as a mere substitute for the mutuality of true sexing. Sensitive and refined men despise it even when no social degradation is involved for them.

Little information seems obtainable on the periods of greatest nervous power and excitement in human life. The age of twenty-eight seems the most active time of nerves, both in men and women, and there are traces of other nervous epochs, later, and in quite old men of forcible character. At these crises, such trying conditions as sex isolation and false mating should especially be avoided, yet no guidance is given in our popular hand-books of health as to this. The amount of nervous susceptibility arising in women in middle life previous to the climacteric, and usually between the ages of forty-five and fifty, is so great that it seems usually to give immunity from nervous crises subsequently in women; though it does not necessarily impair the normal sexual feelings after middle life, as some imagine, nor need it diminish attractiveness in later life, at least among refined and cultured people, as may be observed in women who have suffered neither from prolonged celibacy nor from slavery in marriage.

It is hard to estimate the extent and the result of the ignorance of sex among women. A woman brought up in the unknowingness which the Puritans call virtue has the greatest difficulty, even when the facts are intellectually presented to her, in realizing that society has actually deceived her on such a vital point, and made use of her own best social feelings of reverence and altruism to deceive her. The "conspiracy of silence," when the celibate woman first understands that she has been the victim of it, seems nothing less than diabolically cruel.

Many married women know nothing of the sex problem, and ignore it; but even when they have missed the best joys of mating, as many do, nature, less cruel than society, often satisfies them with the joys of maternity, and the satisfied do not complain nor sympathize with complaint.

I hope that my fellow students of the facts of sex may be able to throw some light on the points I have raised. On all these questions we have to obtain knowledge, to show the working of our Puritan sex system in its results to the physical health of the individual.

Another day I hope to write on sex as a social force.

DORA FORSTER.

ONE MAN'S VIEW.

As a man that knows a little about the sex question, and its importance to both men and women, I beg to differ from Celia B. Whitehead, as she seems to ignore, to entirely lose sight of, the most important part of sex. See "One Woman's View" in Lucifer, No. 1018.

I will preface what little I shall say on the sex question by the general statement that "The purpose of all life is Pleasing Sensation." That is the main purpose of life; all other objects in life are subservient to that main purpose; and without that, life could never have been developed in its organic form, and would cease to exist except in an undeveloped primitive state. As pleasing sensation produces, continues and reproduces or perpetuates all organic life.

Sex has a twofold purpose: the one very important, imperative purpose—pleasing sensation; the other remote, important only as applied to the race, not as to the individual—procreation. The first, the important, is always desired, required, needed by the properly, normally developed individual of every species. The higher the development of the individual or the species the more imperative the demand, and to unduly restrain or control this desire is to cripple the organism, to prevent its proper growth and development, to partially kill or destroy the individual. The other —procreation—is but little desired, and very seldom until long after maturity or until middle age, and then usually as a result of mental action, a desire of the mind, and not from any feeling prompted by any need of the body or its organs, any real need of the individual.

The sexual system may be likened to the alimentary system, where we eat to satisfy our hunger, for the pleasing sensation of eating, and alimentation results, yet would result equally well from the eating of raw corn or wheat, but with a great lack of pleasing sensation, so much so that life would scarcely be continued without the pleasure of eating. So we see the pleasure of eating is of more importance than nutrition. In like manner only in a much greater degree, is pleasing sensation of more importance in sex association than procreation.

Our "One Woman" is entirely mistaken when she says "The organs of conception are raised to the highest, happiest pitch of anticipation, eager, throbbing, alive with desire for fruition, for conception—and are cheated of their hopes." Such is not the case. I may truthfully say, such is never the fact. Their yearning and desire is all for Pleasing Sensation. They know nothing of conception, and if that yearning for pleasing sensation is fully satisfied (which I know is seldom the case with women, for reasons I will not discuss here), then the purpose has been served, nature has not been cheated, but has been gratified, satisfied and the health of the individual organism and its organs preserved.

It is the lack of gratification, the failure to get the desired and needed pleasing sensation, either with or without working up to the pitch our friend mentions, that constitutes the repeated outrages on nature that does not go unavenged. That is the foundation cause of more ill health than all other causes combined. It marks the difference between the health of the boy and girl at puberty, at the beginning of their sex needs, and that of the average man and woman, especially woman, of middle age, or after the prolonged practice of suppression, of repression has sapped the vitality of its victim.

The settlement of the sex question belongs to men and women, and if ever settled it will be settled by thinkers and investigators, by those who do not fear to walk in forbidden ways, to seek for hidden causes. It will not be settled by those abnormal deformed specimens of humanity resulting from suppression, from false education and training.

C. S. WOOD, M. D.

TEE OTHER VIEW.

The question of heredity, again in No. 1,018, is treated, almost invariably, as though the child had no ancestors save its father and mother. No doubt non-adaptability explains, often, such cases as that cited by the Editor, but every such puzzle possibly has another solution. The child is the offspring of the race no less than of its individual parents, and as the offspring of the race it may take its most salient characteristics of mind and body less from its immediate parents than from a forbear a generation or ten generations farther back in the line of evolution. Any child may do this; many children do so hark back, for better or for worse. This indisputable fact of the frequent predominance of distant over near heredity has two admonitions for us: First—We must not be disappointed to the point of discouragement if the most careful adaptation of the two parents and the best environment fail, in many instances, to produce the desired results. Second—It is at once seen that nothing could be more cruelly foolish than the suggested and sometimes attempted State control of reproduction, a control it is now proposed to carry to the limit of absurdity and outrage in Australasia, the unhappy land upon which has been emptied the entire contents of the Pandora's box of collectivistic nostrums.

We are told again that the solution of the sex problem rests with woman alone, and man should withhold his polluting touch. To make this panacea perfect, I would humbly suggest that man be completely eliminated from the processes of reproduction, for if you permit him to have any part therein he is likely to say that what is needed is the joint study of the processes which lead to the birth of boys no less than of girls, that we have found man-rule to be disastrous and are likely to find woman-rule to be no less harmful. Of course, the suggestion which I am noticing here is merely the swing of the pendulum to the other side of the arc; we have the demand for the one-sided rule of woman because we have had the one-sided rule of man; the scientific point of rest for the pendulum is midway between the two extremes, where men and women meet in equal liberty to do the work that is the task and joy of both.

It also is suggested that men confine their attention to the industrial problem, to secure comfort for men and women alike. This has long been the view of the common man and woman—man was to earn the money and woman was to look pretty and bear children. The result has been to make men the dictators of the sexual status of women, to make every boy-child a potential buyer of sexual favors, in marriage or out of it, and every girl-child a potential prostitute, the seller of sexual favors, in marriage or out of marriage. No, we shall not consent that in the new society for which we are working men only shall be wise in industrial knowledge and women only shall be wise in love and reproductive knowledge.

Those who advocate the limiting of love to reproduction and contend that prevision is harmful beyond all calculation, always ignore the cheating "of their hopes" which the limitation they advocate involves. So little do they understand the nature of men and women that they seriously argue for a condition of affairs that necessitates a million "outrages" where the procedure they denounce may necessitate a hundred or a thousand, and may not necessitate any. They have not yet grasped the fact that there has come about a differentiation of the amative and the reproductive functions that renders abstention except for the few children desired a life-long torture for an increasing number of women.

EDWIN C. WALKER.

FROM THE PICKET LINES.

Among the letters received from Colorado within the last few weeks is the following. The writer is one of the oldest and most faithful of all the readers and helpers of Lucifer:

Longmont, Colo., July 21, 1904.—"I have lived in Colorado nearly as long as any one; have loved the state; have taken pride in it as one of the most glorious members of the American Union, but now am compelled to admit that I am ashamed—profoundly ashamed of the record made by our governor, his adjutant general and their armed and hired lackeys. I think myself justified in using a much harder name than lackeys, but forbear.

"If the stand taken by the state authorities, the military, and the 'Citizens' Alliance,' is sound, and is to be sustained, then all our boasted constitutional safeguards, all the provisions in our 'Bill of Rights,' are not worth the paper they are printed on. They are absolutely worthless.

"That Sherman Bell—a second edition of the Spanish Weyler—is alive to-day proves that the union men are a thousand times more law-abiding than they have been pictured by the Peabody press of the state. Inclosed I send you three clippings from a late number of the Rocky Mountain News, summarizing the case of Adjutant General Bell, when giving to the public his excuse for his later acts.

"A few days ago I had a long talk with a brother G. A. R. comrade—a Republican, one who voted for Peabody, and yet he is as radical in his condemnation of all these outrages by the governor, the militia and Citizens' Alliance as I am. On parting he remarked that if our talk had been overheard and reported to General Bell we would both be candidates for the 'bull pen,' or for deportation. This is doubtless true, or would be if we were in Cripple Creek.

"How it has transpired that the militia, or the citizens' committe, have not as yet encountered anyone sufficiently endowed with the spirit of American freemen, when invited to leave their homes, to tell them to go to the mythical hot place, and then arm themselves and die in a just cause, as becomes freemen, this is something I can not quite understand.

"M H. COFFIN.

Another letter: The wife of a deported blacksmith, a man sixty-two years old, one who has been a faithful friend and patron of Lucifer for a dozen years or more, writes thus from Victor, Colo.:

"My husband and son were taken away by an armed mob, and I am left entirely alone two miles out among the hills. They were arrested at home, minding their own business, without warrant, without excuse, put into the 'bull pen' for three days and nights, with little food and nothing to sleep on but the bare floor. They had their trial at two o'clock in the night. When asked what they were arrested for they replied they did not know—neither did their judges know. When asked if they were Socialists they answered 'yes.' That was crime enough. With many others they were then taken to the Kansas line and dumped on the prairie, without food or shelter, to do for themselves as best they could. They are still exiles from home, and this explains why I cannot send money to pay up arrearages on Lucifer. Will pay up as soon as we can."

The name of the writer of this letter is not given, for obvious reasons. Our readers can have the name by writing to this office. And still another Colorado letter reads thus:

Cripple Creek, Colo., July 21st, 1904.—The Editor Lucifer, Dear Comrade: You will do me a great favor if you will kindly publish this letter in Lucifer. I am in distress. Confined to my bed by rheumatism I am practically helpless. Change of climate and complete rest for a short time are absolutely necessary. I am totally without means whereby the change or rest can be obtained. Indeed I am without means upon which to subsist unless the progress of my disease can be arrested. No comrade has ever appealed to me for assistance and failed to receive ready response. I never anticipated that I would be reduced to this extremity, but it has come, and I am now compelled by imperative necessity to solicit aid from the comrades. I can assure them, one and all, that whatever aid they can and will render me under these distressing and humiliating circumstances, will be profoundly appreciated by J. Allen Evans.

I have known Bro. Evans many years, personally and by correspondence. While in Louisiana a few winters ago I was hospitably entertained by him, when myself a health-seeker. Though nothing is said in this letter about the labor troubles in the Cripple Creek district, previous letters had informed me that his business, that of laundryman, had been destroyed by the conflict between the labor unions and the mine owners. For many years Bro. Evans has been active, with tongue and pen, in behalf of the disinherited classes. He is known as Press Writer 415. He has been a paying subscriber to Lucifer near twenty years. Feeling under personal obligations I have sent a small contribution to his pressing needs, and promised more soon. Believing him every way worthy of fraternal regard I ask our patrons and especially the members of the Press Writers' Association to do what they can to help Brother J. Allen Evans in his time of great need.

NOTICE.

I should like to meet as many Lucifer readers as possible during my coming lecture tour, and will call on any living in or near Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Buffalo and Cleveland, who will let me hear from them at once. I hope to visit other cities east of Chicago, and shall be glad to hear from any who can arrange lectures along the route. While my main purpose is to conduct propaganda work along liberal and radical lines. I have also a separate list of lectures on topics of travel, art, literature, science, history and philosophy, which have already proved acceptable to numerous conservative literary and educational societies. I will accept engagements for these in small towns or elsewhere, where arrangements cannot be made for radical lectures. My present address is Andover, N. H. I desire to hear at once from all points east of Chicago, with reference either to lectures or to personal visits.

JAMES F. MORTON, JR.

VARIOUS VOICES.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

[Full name and address of writers in this department can generally be obtained on application to the editor.]

R. T., Box 81, Alderson, W. Va.: "Find enclosed a two-dollar bill for Lucifer, whose work is all right, name and all. You must send me the paper. I had a sample copy, the first for years. Later: Send me Hilda's Home, 50c, and "Vice," etc., by Walker, 15c, and list of Free Love literature, for which I enclose 65c. Is Aunt Elmina still living?"

[Yes; Elmina D. Slenker is still living, and in fairly good health; or was, some two months ago. She seems taking a needed rest. Hers has been one of the busiest of lives, and hence at her age a rest is eminently in order. Her many friends will probably hear from her again ere long. This letter of R. T. is one of several like it, recently received at this office; letters that encourage us to continue the sowing of sample copies.]

J. F. Paulson, Chicago.—To M. C. J., N. Y. City: "This is the earliest opportunity I find to answer your letter. I promise to co-operate in the fund to sustain Lucifer by sending in July ten dollars to the person named by you. Hoping for success in the matter, I am, yours for liberty."

Clara J. L. Pierce, Mass.: "The article of Mrs. Colby and your reply to it seem to me a very clear exposition of our faith—Freedom in Love and in its expression, with self-control instead of depending on the commands or the opinions of others to keep our lives pure and unselfish. People do not seem to be ready for freedom. More than one acquaintance have told me that if free they knew they would live as passion and self-love dictated, rather than as loving kindness to others would dictate. If this be true, then there is nothing more to be said—to that person. We can only wait, hopefully wait, for their growth into real womanhood and manhood. When freedom comes to one it comes as a test—the use we make of freedom shows where we stand, whether on the lower animal or the human plane."

J. W. Gott, Editor Truth Seeker, Bradford, England: "I will run your advertisement every month for twelve months, as printed on page nine of July Truth Seeker. If my readers will only try your paper I am sure they will like it. They will more easily order from English address than American. Any orders coming to hand I will at once forward to you. You stick to your guns, like a real fighter as you have proved yourself to be. I hope your health will improve and that we shall long have your co-operation in our fight for liberty."

[The Truth Seeker, Bradford, England, has been on our exchange list for more than a dozen years. While held as a hostage for the good behavior of Lucifer and its contributors some years ago, in the Federal prison at Fort Leavenworth, I was bravely and ably defended by Brother Gott in his journal. He went to the expense of having a cut made of my physiognomy, which cut occupied a conspicuous place in his editorial columns. Was it because "God was on my side" (Gott is German for "God," as all our readers know) that I was well treated while in prison and came out in better health than when I went in? Of course I shall be glad to keep a supply of the Truth Seeker always on hand for Lucifer's patrons.—M. H.]

Laura J. Langston, Paonia, Colo.: "Indeed I want the Light Bearer, for such it has proven to me. I will settle all arrearage as soon as I am able. At present I am going through experiences that will push me up nearer to the light. My trials have almost paralyzed me. Sometimes I have felt as if thought and the power of action would desert me, so amazed have I been at the conduct of some of the whitewashed 'Respectables.' Wishing you all possible success and thanking you for your kindness, I am always the friend of Liberty."

[Laura J. Langston is well known as the secretary, for Colorado, of the American Press Writers' Association, some members of which Association will perhaps learn for the first time, from this extract from her letter to Lucifer, that this brave and earnest fellow worker has been, is now, in serious trouble. Doubtless they will at once write and offer what assistance may be in their power. One of the chief objects of the Press Writers' Association, as I understand it, is to bring the volunteer army of workers for justice and liberty into closer sympathy and friendship than they would otherwise find it possible to be. Lucifer's columns, as well as those of the Boston Press Writer, the organ of the Association, are always open to short letters from the Press Writers. A large percentage of our readers and workers are now members of this the most effective (as I think) of all the American associations for the education and cultivation of a public conscience that will in time overthrow all class privileges that have ranged the people of the United States in two opposing armies, ready and eager to cut each other's throats.—M. H.]

Mrs. B. M., New York: "How exasperating such articles as Celia B. Whitehead's! which you have well named "One Woman's View.' But after all, of what consequence is it? I was almost tempted to let the matter go by. I feel sorry for women who with such a superabundance of the motherhood faculty are not permitted by nature or man-made law to have their fill of it.

"As far as I can see, no one has objected in your paper to any one's having all the children they desire. The only objection that has been made is to women having more than they desire. The article I name is so one-sided and so unjust in its estimate of human nature and woman's nature and man's knowledge of it, that I do hope the writer will not occupy much space in your valuable paper in future. I would much prefer Mr. Kerr's and others.

"Celia Whitehead's views are not those of the generality of women. The sex desire is deeper and farther reaching than simply that of motherhood, although the latter is commendable and should be honored and respected under all circumstances."

[To get the whole of truth we must be tolerant and hear all sides. There are doubtless many readers of Lucifer who substantially agree with Celia B. Whitehead. "Let Truth and Error grapple." On careful and unbiased comparison of ideas advanced by the various contributors to this symposium in reference to "contracepta" it will probably be found that no one has a monopoly of truth and that no one's views are wholly erroneous.—M. H.]

WANTED—A copy of "British Barbarians," by Grant Allen. For a fairly well preserved copy of this book one dollar in cash or in literature will be given. Address this office.

DON'T FORGET, good friends all, to send us names of independent thinkers—New Thought people, Rationalists, Agnostics, Spiritualists, Materialists, Free Religionists, Theosophists—to whom we may send sample copies of Lucifer, "Son of the Morning," "Herald of the Dawn," "Harbinger of the Good Time Coming"! We have some hundreds of copies printed extra each issue for the express purpose of sending them out as samples, and, if possible, we want several hundred new names each week, or each fortnight. And if with the names a few postage stamps can be sent to help pay the cost of wrappers and of mailing, all the better, but send the names!

That the more we know the more we realize the scantiness of our knowledge, and dimly perceive a vast unexplored domain, indicates that our capacities transcend our attainments.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

With Macaulay, Rosa Graul would say: "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman would be less loving and lovable, or that man would be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish.

SEX RADICALISM.

III. SEX AS A SOCIAL FORCE.

To do justice to the far off origins of the power of sex in social development, one would need the German mind with its love of fundamentals. The animal which has distanced all others in the competition for supremacy, and established himself the unquestioned lord of creation, has certainly done so by means of his extraordinary development of the social faculties, of which language is the most wonderful and important example.

That this animal, homo, man, has developed sexuality to a far greater extent than any other, and while much less prolific has greater and more constant amative power than any other, is a fact which surely has no chance connection with that of his great social faculties, but rather the two exceptionally developed powers, the social and the sexual, must act and re-act upon each other.

Nor would it seem that the powers of sexual love and passion could have been thus exceptionally developed, (while obviously absorbing a good deal of energy), unless they had greatly aided the social development in man.

Nature, to speak metaphorically, is never extravagant; where she spends liberally she gets liberal returns, and she knew what she was about when she turned man's energy into performing arduous and apparently useless tasks at the bidding of cupid. The powerful stimulus of love has been worth all it costs. Tolstoy may cast accounts, if he pleases, of what he thinks well-spent and ill-spent energy; Nature will not become a Tolstoyan, and she was never less so than when she made Tolstoy.

We think, perhaps, that the falling in love of human beings is a mean trick of Nature's, to ensure the reproduction of the race: not so: children are the product, no doubt, but the by-product is yet more important—the efficiency of the race stimulated by the love passion. And efficiency means happiness.

A certain amount of sexual liveliness and responsiveness Nature insists upon before an individual may graduate as a propagator of his species; but in man, in the comparative standing of races, a capacity for love-enthusiasm, more than numerous progeny, seems a true sign of high development and success, and bears fruit first in fighting power and in poetry, and later in the sciences and the arts allied to the sciences. And again and again we may find that the greatest result is not what seemed the chief aim, for the virtue lies in the struggle, not the prize. An Abelard and Heloise may or may not have produced children, but they lived an immortal love story.

It is hard to say whether this power of enthusiasm becomes more important in the individual or in the race. A gentle Scotch essayist, William Smith ("Thorndale") said that it was Death that startled man into thought. But Love even more than Death does so. Death presents himself at our door in his chief grandeur but twice or thrice in a lifetime; but Love may be there at any season; "behold, I stand at the door and knock," as the mystical Christian evangelist puts it.

Puritan society takes a purely utilitarian view of this love-force. That love should bring forth happiness, and happiness breed love, does not enter into their scheme. That the lover should be broken in to run in harness seems to them no open question. And so the willing lover is turned into a hard-working husband (supporter of the household), and must restrict his affections to a narrow sphere.

This scheme worked fairly well in peasant societies where married life was of a simple character suited to simple natures, and entered upon early in life. But when this ideal is forced upon a highly complicated society, as suited alike to all the varied individualities of such a society; and when it is pretended that marrying at 30 or 40 fulfils the same purposes as marrying at 20, and that no injustice is done to a woman when mating, or maternity, or both, are denied to her—the results are so hideous that we usually forbear to speak of them. But the powers of progress forbid that we should ever cease to take our part in thinking of them, till thought produces radical reform.

Let us exhibit a utilitarianism which is far grander and nobler than that of the puritans; theirs is but poor and petty.

The power of Niagara can turn a saw mill, no doubt, but it can do far better than that. We must have this force of sex love present and at work always and everywhere, an enthusiasm which will blend with and strengthen our enthusiasm of humanity, an inspiration in every life that has grown beyond the narrowness of childhood.

I hope next to discuss "What is Permanent in Puritanism?"

DORA FORSTER.

ANOTHER WOMAN'S VIEW.

It has been the custom of female saints of the church to eliminate men from their lives, but they have eliminated children as well. This would seem to be inevitable, that if we would admit the precious babies we have to admit the men too—bless them! It remains for our own St. Celia to propose that motherhood should eliminate fatherhood, and that women alone should settle the sex question. This they will do, we are told, "without detriment to any one," and the first step in the process seems to be to induce the men to step down and out.

This gives me a lost and lonely sensation, for men are quite essential to my happiness. Of course my own particular friends will be found among those "rare and noble exceptions" who, we assume, may be safely allowed a finger in the pie. Yet am I still dismayed. I have not supposed women to hold a monopoly of "sex." What, I am moved to ask, would be the sex question with the men left out? For the function of begetting the offspring of the race no scientific or metaphysical substitute has yet been found. Are we to suppose the begetters of offspring are to be selected from among the aforesaid rare aves, those paragons of purity so few and far between in the objectionable male sex?

Verily, one would think this "One Woman" had been brought up on a stock farm and could see nothing in love and the sex question but a matter of breeding. Moreover that reminds one of Comrade Kerr, who seems to be one of the objectionables who must not "meddle."

"There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio"—come, let us mix a little biology with our sentiment. That is where it belongs. Woe unto the sentiment that won't mix well with biology!

"In the beginning" sex is undifferentiated. The protozoa meet and mingle and reproduce—each and every individual. Then comes the process of differentiation, a sort of biological division of labor, as it were. Organisms become male and female, functions are specialized, the mother is evolved. With the prolongation of the period of infancy, through increased parental responsibility, the father is developed and the joint care of offspring makes male and female better acquainted with each other and produces the conditions which make love possible.

Through ages of time has Nature produced the mother, through further ages has she been producing the father. Will it be to the detriment of no one to arrest and reverse this development, to shut out the male sex from any and all participation in race breeding save the one essential office of impregnating the ovum?

Man has tried to arrange these matters to his own advantage and has lamentably failed, for the result is of advantage to no one, as the present sex problem abundantly indicates. Woman's part in this has been on the whole a passive one, now she demands a free hand. She would succeed no better. Love must settle the sex question. Men and women, hand in hand, heart to heart, and mind to mind must solve its problems. And we must remove the shackles from love that it may do its perfect work.

Male and female is the human race; male and female alike transmit their qualities to offspring. Utterly interdependent are male and female for the finest development, the highest efficiency, the fulness of life. So interwoven are their inherent needs and desires that all the mistakes of centuries, all the perverting influences of church and state, all the curse of sex superstition, have not been able to quite separate their interests.

The marriage institution has set man over woman in the position of master and owner; it has flouted and denied the free life of love all along the line; but in spite of this, love persists, love still cries for its own. Through the debris of dead and decaying institutions love still struggles to put forth its leaves of healing, its buds and blossoms of joy.

Not to the separation of men and of women, not to the establishment of arbitrary divisions of responsibility, not to the degradation of woman to a sexual autocracy, are we of the new day looking, hoping, striving; but to the growing and the spreading of these joy blossoms that are found on the tree of Love,—this deathless tree that grows even in the desert and the darkness but comes into fulness of bloom only in the sunlight and pure air of Freedom and Equality.

"Love is enough: ho ye who seek saving.
Go no further: come hither: there have been who have found it,
And these know the House of Fulfillment of craving;
These know the Cup with the roses around it;
These know the World's Wound and the balm that hath bound it."

ADELINE CHAMPNEY.

CELIA B. WHITEHEAD REPLIES.

No. 1019 of Lucifer has just arrived. It gives me much satisfaction to know that R. B. Kerr devotes some thought to the economic question. I should like to see some of his writing on that subject for I feel sure it would be good.

Henry E. Allen infers from my criticism that I "consider the propagative relation essential for the satisfying of sex hunger." I do, most certainly, believe that regarding the human female; as much as I believe it of any other female animal. Whatever more women may be they are still, as to their physical bodies, animals. Nor do I believe that any willing, normal, well-cared for woman ever died of "excessive child bearing." Will any who may reply to this please notice my modifications? They are important.

I am told that "my criticism of contraception has been answered by almost every medical writer on this subject." Well, what of that? Almost is not altogether. Doctors are not infallible else we should not have the old conundrum—"Who shall decide when doctors disagree?" And they do disagree, very decidedly, on these questions. Also the profession at one time disagrees with the profession at another time. Doctors used to teach that continence was extremely harmful to a man. When my son was at the medical college he said they taught that that idea was erroneous; yet the legal doctrine of marital rights, which is responsible for the deaths attributed to "excessive child bearing," is an outgrowth of that idea. It was put into law by men, not by women, I am glad to say.

C. S. Wood, M. D., writes so dogmatically that it would probably be useless for a layman to argue with him; nevertheless I venture this explanation: When I said "organs of conception" I did not mean to include the whole sexual organism. He is, it seems to me, partly right and partly wrong as to the "pleasing sensation." Let him try for a few days chewing food without swallowing a single drop or particle of it and see whether he gets the same "pleasing sensation" that he gets when he eats and swallows his food—like a rational, natural human being. The stomach cannot take its "pleasing sensations" by proxy, from the mouth. It seems to me this illustration makes my meaning plain.

I wonder if Mrs. B. M., New York, thinks I want women to "have more children than they desire." But I dare not write more lest she become again "exasperated" with me for occupying your "valuable space." I had flattered myself that I was not given to writing long articles for Lucifer, so I feel quite humbled by what I am desired to do "in the future."

CELIA B. WHITEHEAD.

Denver, Colo., Aug. 7, 1904.

ANOTHER WOMAN'S VIEW.

I do not wish to monopolize the columns of Lucifer, but Mrs. Whitehead's article in No. 1018 so electrifies me I must hasten to place myself on record as to the immense wrong done to woman, and thus to the race through any unnatural means of preventing conception. Mrs. Whitehead has beautifully and delicately painted the wrong, the cruelty of disappointed expectancy, but I can assure her that just such intense expectancy may exist when there is no possibility of material motherhood, and indeed, I have met more than one woman who never felt sex desire until after the period of such motherhood is past; now what does that mean but that the sex relation, when mutual and loving gives intellectual and spiritual life also, and that both are injured when expectancy is denied.

What does it mean but that woman is just as necessary in the intellectual and spiritual development of the race as she is in its perpetuation, and that through the same relation. Woman's freedom does not depend upon her power to prevent conception. There is no more damning slavery than woman's submission to man's wishes in this respect. Nature will furnish her own contracepts if we will follow her methods—will do this through the law of growth—of taking woman, (and man too) beyond the physically propagative plane.

The higher we get in the scale of evolution, the more the mental and spiritual is developed, the fewer children, and that intense expectancy, if fully culminated on both sides is far less likely to ultimate in conception than is the negative passive condition of the woman whose sex nature has been deadened if not killed by serving the husband from a sense of duty, and from the fact that he could torture her in so many ways if she did not yield. Women who bear the most children are those who "are never left to want," as one woman said to me.

Sex is a refiner—is such because of action and interaction, and if our children are taught that offsprings are but the beginning of sex use, are taught to recognize intellectual and spiritual life force in the relation, a finer element will take the place of that which is thrown off, and soon this refining power will take both parties beyond the possibility of physical reproduction. One, two, or three children will be all that such women will bear, but the relation will continue, will be sweeter, stronger than at first, but, being satisfied, soul and body, will not be so frequent. Abnormal sexuality will be unknown.

Those who use preventives destroy this natural order of growth and thus help to hold the race back from its high destiny. Women are now so placed that prevention, in some cases, may be the least of two evils, but they are only emergency measures, and should never be considered as a solution of the disability under which both men and women labor because of woman's enslaved condition sexually. To some my position may seem far fetched and untenable, and I cannot in a newspaper article give what to me are proofs, but it is the light in which I have seen this most important of all questions for more than thirty years, and the more I study it the more convinced I am that I am right.

With Mrs. Whitehead I feel that this question belongs to woman, and I never read an article, written by a man, (or a woman thinking from man's standpoint) urging upon woman her responsibility in choosing fatherhood for her children, but I feel like telling the former to mind their own business and the latter to believe in themselves.

It is not strange that men, as they have so long had the control of woman's sex life, should find it hard to learn to let her judge for herself, but their work is to set woman free, and then see to it that they are worthy to become fathers, and leave woman to do her own work in her own way.

I believe in man. I believe in woman. Man can not rise so long as he enslaves woman, and woman cannot go forward so long as she is bound by man's laws—by man-made environments. In freedom woman will rise instead of sinking, and man will naturally rise with her, he will meet her fullest expectations. Not responsibility but spontaneity will bring out the best in both man and woman—love, not force. Man has bound himself in chains that fret and chafe, thus bringing out the worst instead of the best, and he has so bound woman that she often becomes his curse. What both need to work for is an entire change in the system which enslaves both man and woman.

LOIS WAISBROOKER.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

H. D. Eastley, Bondurant, Iowa. "I hope you will retain the name Lucifer, as I see some hints of a move to change it. Lucifer, Son of the Morning, at once the most striking and appropriate name imaginable for a straight-forward radical paper; and—because the name has been applied to the devil—the most daring step in line with fearless walking in forbidden ways which all reformers so much need.

"I shall be glad if you conclude to publish 'The Right to be Born Well' in pamphlet form as I have not had the opportunity to read it.

"The view put forward by Dr. Wood, that 'Procreation is important only to the race,' points to a solution of the marriage question which I believe to be an approximately true one, namely: 'Let the race [the community?] regard the child as at least as important as a colt, and support the mother and child as willingly and as well as the mare and colt are now supported. Then woman could afford to bear children in freedom. Any man who desires children would strive to please the mother of his children, so that they might dwell together in unity. No lifelong marriage vows would be necessary or desirable, as the mother's support would not depend on her continued submission to a husband, after he had ceased to be congenial. And this fact would tend to induce him to strive to be congenial after full mating as he now does during courtship. Only let the public recognize the cash value of babies, as it now does that of colts, and the problem would not be hard to solve. Whether the child produces or not it must consume—food, clothing, shelter, luxuries, and is not the home market for such things increased by so much? Why should we support immense armies and navies to secure foreign markets while scorning, ignoring and destroying our own home markets?"

T. F. Lee, Lakeport, Cal. "When a fellow has nothing to say the best way is to keep silent. Suggestions and advice have rolled in upon you very copiously, and I would especially second the most of Mr. R. B. Kerr's ideas.

"Now that Celia B. Whitehead has spoken and advised men to cease meddling with the sex question I feel quite relieved and am much more at ease. I for one, being a bachelor, am perfectly willing to turn the battle over to the women and let them settle the question to suit themselves. I would like to see some portion of this earth governed exclusively by women. This is said with no slur attached to it, but as being one experimental way of finding out a few truths. If men and women are so different in their makeup there ought to be some way of finding out how much one should govern and how little the other. The question is how can each best fulfill their wants?

"My visit with the editor of Lucifer in Oakland, Cal., was short, but very satisfactory. Enclosed find one dollar for the cause."

O. Leonard, Editor Waste Basket, Edwardsville, Ill. "We need Lucifer and need it badly, right here in America, just because they try to suppress it. The name that suits you must have preference, and so it is as to price. Of course I prefer to see Lucifer every week, but if there is no better way possible, let us have it fortnightly."

C. C. Fairchild, Stockton, Cal. "By all means continue Lucifer, as it is helping to open the eyes of a whole lot of people. If the powers that be won't let you publish it in this free (?) country, why all you have to do is to go to Canada. I think the Canadians would treat you right. I don't think I would change the name. Would be in favor of issuing fortnightly at a dollar a year. Enclosed find a dollar for 'Love's Coming of Age,' by Carpenter."

Mabel J. Hopkinson, Kosmos, Wash. "Glad to see Lucifer again. Had to sit down and read it through, soon as it came. As to questions: (1) Yes; let Lucifer the Light Bearer be continued and with the same light steadily shining, the same contention emphasized. (2) If it is to be read by the people of the United States why not be published here? (3) One name is as good as the other since they mean the same. As long as the principle is the same I do not care. (4) More people will subscribe at $1 per year, but I think we ought to pay whatever it costs the publisher. (5) If it cannot be weekly let it be fortnightly. I cannot at present be responsible for more than one yearly copy, much as I would like to send to others I know."

DOES FREE LOVE BREAK UP HOMES?

There are theorists who read free love literature who are dissatisfied with their own conjugal mates and think it is because they are not properly mated. That if they could get divorced and could marry some Jimmie or Nancy whom they do love, they would be O. K.

When they come to try it they usually find they are no better off than before, and want to be again divorced, and to try again.

Such notions as these break up homes, whether entertained by readers of freelove literature or by the readers of the most conservative of popular Christian or any other sort of literature. This, in fact, is not free love.

On the other hand, when the true teachings of free love are understood and reduced to practice, no homes need be broken up. Free love teaches love and sympathy for all mankind; teaches that the "skeletons in the closets" of our homes are born not necessarily of any particular fault of either member of such home, but born of the too close association of the members of the family; born of the economic dependence and slavery of each to the other; born of the magnetic polarization produced by the too close and exclusive association.

All this being remedied and obviated by the practice of free love teachings, free love becomes the only real, the only true defender and preserver of our homes.

When once really understood free love is destined to be the savior of mankind.

Free love solves the perplexing problems of our economic customs and conditions.

Makes peace between capital and labor.

Brings peace and order out of strife and chaos.

Cures aching hearts.

Transforms us from this cruel world of strife, poverty, disease, insanity and crime; from a condition of discontent and unhappiness—of the rich as well as of the poor—to a world of peace, love and good will to our fellow man, and to a condition of kind, congenial and loving comradeship of all—which really is all that life is worth living for.

No: True free love does not break up homes, but instead obviates and prevents the coming of skeletons in the closets and tends to perpetuate our homes and render them fit dwelling places for good, true and happy souls.

All people make a mistake who do not study and strive to understand what true free love really means.

Who is the Enemy; Anthony Comstock or You? By Edwin C. Walker. Paper. Pp. 63. Price 20c. New York. E. C. Walker.

Mr. Walker asks, is the postal censorship dependent on Anthony Comstock, or is it made possible by the people, including you and me, who tolerate the laws which give power to the censor? To ask such a question is to answer it. Mr. Walker analyzes the utterances and acts of Comstock, and shows him to be either a hypocrite or a fool. The puerility of the arguments, ambitions, and methods of the suppressors is clearly and forcefully exposed. Mr. Walker is at his best, and his pamphlet deserves a large sale.

INDIVIDUALISM OR COLLECTIVISM—WHICH OR BOTH?

An old time worker in the fields of radical reform, the writer of one of the now historic letters the publication of which gave rise to the nearly ten years' conflict in Kansas, between the suppressors of speech and of press, on the one hand and the editors and publishers of Lucifer on the other—this old time friend and valiant defender of woman's right to self-ownership, in answer to an inquiry as to why we hear no more from him, writes as follows:

"Dear Bro. Harman: I have your letter of the 7th and Lucifer, and I know you are too big to feel wounded at what I may say.

"My purpose is to waive sentiment and stick to facts as I see them.

"Individualism in many forms has ruled the world for ages. It was necessary, but it has about worked out its potentialities and must soon die—struggling of course. I do not wish to serve in the sick chambers of a dying dynasty.

"Lucifer has—to me—become mossy, monotonous. If it is "fittest" it will live. If not it must die. Advance or die is the law. A fact. Economic collectivism has the floor by a large majority. Is it accidental, or permanent? Has evolution anything to do with it?

"The 'sex question' may be solved by one word—mutuality. Can it exist in present economic environments? Mutual economics assures mutuality in all things, as it is the determining factor of life. Economic equality is the soul of justice and only through justice can any phase of freedom be attained or maintained.

"You see there is a wide gap between us. My affectionate regard for the old comrades in past struggles has not weakened in the least, but many of them have driven stakes in Egypt while I have gone on and have glimpses of the promised land. (No egotism in this.)

"You speak of sending me Lucifer for old time sake. I fully understand and appreciate the sentiment which prompts, and accept till convenient to pay.

"Sentiment is beautiful; so is a rainbow but neither can do things practical. I am trying to eliminate sentimentalism and view life and its attributes from a practical standpoint. The approaching catastrophic period absorbs all my interest, and my highest ambition is to help to the accomplishment of the co-operative commonwealth.

"Sincerely and affectionately yours, M. G. W."

REPLY.

Dear Bro. M. G. W.:

Because of the years of helpful co-operation and of fraternal sympathy extended by you to myself and to those who with me were struggling to keep Lucifer alive, I find it a very unwelcome task to undertake the role of critic and pull your letter to pieces. With yourself however, I feel that you are "too big to be wounded by what I may say."

Were it not that I feel sure hundreds of Lucifer's readers take substantially the same view as yourself in regard to the two "isms" that form the subject of your letter, I would be silent. As it is I think it best to make a short reply to the leading points you have raised.

1st. As to "sentiment." I cannot quite agree that we should "waive sentiment and stick to naked facts." As I see it we cannot ignore sentiment and still remain sane, humane and progressive. Webster says "sentiment is a thought prompted by passion or feeling; feeling toward or respecting some person or thing; disposition prompting to action or expression, etc." As a matter of fact I think we never do anything for ourselves or others—especially not for others—that is not prompted by sentiment of some sort. Sympathy for and with others is perhaps the most powerful, most nearly universal, of all human sentiments—one that we share with brute, beasts, birds and even reptiles.

It is because "corporations," such as the coal mining syndicate of Pennsylvania and the gold mining syndicate of Colorado, waive all sentiment—all sympathy with those who do the hard work and take all the risks of loss of life and health in the underground levels, and because they stick so closely to the naked facts and methods of business—"get all you can and give as little in return as possible"—that both Socialists and Individualists are now demanding a radical change of economic and industrial systems.

Facts are stubborn things, they say; so they are, but they are not so stubborn that they cannot be changed for ideals, and ideals are the product of sentiment, the sentiment of justice for instance; of equal rights for all and special privilege for none. Facts are "things accomplished," things done—from the Latin facere, "to do, to make." It is a fact that business methods today are unjust, inequitable and inhuman. Sentiment demands a change; just as sentiment demanded a change in the labor system of the South, forty or fifty years ago. That which is the sentimental ideal of to-day may become the fact, the ideal realized, in the not distant future. Facts belong to the past and the present; ideals point the way to future progress, and ideals are all born of sentiment.

2d. I cannot quite agree that "individualism has ruled the world for ages." Such has not been the fact, to any considerable extent during what are called the historic ages. All the governments of the world, at the present time, including our own, are very correctly described as State Socialisms—in some of its Protean forms. No one individual governs any nation or people now existing on earth, and in no country are the people self-governing, in any proper sense of the word. Nor does history tell us of any nation in which the people, all the people, were self-governing individuals. All nations are now, and have been, governed by minorities,—larger or smaller minorities, not by majorities, not by the people as a whole, nor by single individuals, and therefore it seems to me not correct to say that individualism has ruled the world for ages, and that it is now a "dying dynasty."

As I see it, the world has yet to see a true "individualism," in political or any other kind of government. To my thinking individualism means, involves and includes, self-government of the individual persons, of all the persons in any given community, and this means of necessity the abolition of all government of man by his fellow man—using the word man in the generic sense.

If I understand the purpose or end of Socialism, that is, of "economic collectivism," its aim is the production of more nearly perfect individuals, which would mean not the destruction but the triumph of individualism. As Dr. Herron, a prominent leader of organized Socialism, once said in a Chicago lecture:

"To me Socialism is not a goal but a road; the goal being perfect individual liberty."

Why does Dr. Herron regard individual liberty as the goal of Socialism? Not because Individualism must give way to collectivism but because the object of collectivist organization is to secure the best possible development of individual humans.

Yes, certainly; "evolution has something to do with it." From "monad to man" the constant effort of the evolutionary forces of Nature has been to produce better individuals, not better aggregations or collectivities of individuals. Without individuals there can be no "economic collectivism," or any other kind of collectivism. With full rounded individualism economic collectivism would be an accomplished fact—not otherwise will it be possible.

IS LUCIFER A BACK NUMBER?

Is it true that "Lucifer has retrograded? has become mossy—monotonous?"

If to continue the fight for the right of womanhood and motherhood to self-ownership—which fight first enlisted your interest, Bro. M. G. W., in Lucifer and its work—if to continue the struggle for the yet unattained right of the child (all children) to be born well—if this is to become mossy, monotonous, then your charge is not without foundation. While contending for all human rights and privileges of which the great masses of mankind are as yet deprived, including equal right to the earth and to what it contains, and also the right to the product of one's labor, Lucifer's main fight has been for equal right to be born well, through freedom of motherhood.

To practicalize this right it is necessary to abolish sex slavery, sex ownership of woman by man, since children are born in and of woman's sex nature. Sex reform then is seen to be the first, the most important, most inclusive, of all reforms, because of the well known maxim, or principle, that like begets like. If the parents are slaves—especially if the mother be a slave, the children will be slaves—will not be fit for freedom.

The battle for sex reform is not yet won. Something has been done to arouse the sleeping public conscience to a sense of the terrible wrongs inflicted on woman and her offspring by marriage laws and customs, but the need of sex reform, the need of agitating for the right of the mother to self-ownership, for her own sake, and for the sake of the unborn child, was never greater than at this very moment, largely because of the increased effort on the part of the officials of church and state to silence this agitation.

Never before have the enemies of liberty and justice been more on the alert than now. Through agitation for more stringent divorce laws, thereby making it harder for women to escape from marital bondage; through urging the need of large families, thereby encouraging the enforcement of laws against the use of "preventives" (for limiting the size of families); through increased diligence and vigilance in suppressing papers that would enlighten the ignorant in regard to knowledge of sex, its duties and functions, by all these signs and more, it is apparent that the officials of church and state are alive to the truth that freedom of sex, freedom of motherhood and the general diffusion of sex knowledge, would mean the borning of fewer but better children; would mean that future generations would be so well born that they would need no rulers, no priests, no police, no kings, no presidents, no generals, no soldiers, no privileged classes such as now live in ease and splendor on the proceeds of the unpaid toil of the masses.

Does Bro. M. G. W. know that only a few months ago an entire edition of Lucifer was confiscated and destroyed without legal process of any sort? simply at the command of the postmaster general, or one of his assistants?—an act of high-handed despotism never attempted before, so far as I know, by the postoffice department in the United States, unless, perhaps, as a military measure in time of war. This is one only of the instances from and by which it can easily be shown that freedom of speech and of press is becoming more and more a thing of the past in this country, and especially so in regard to the most vital of all subjects, that which deals with the creation of a better race.

"ADVANCE OR DIE."

Yes, this is one of Nature's methods—not "laws." Nature makes no laws, knows nothing of laws; these are all of man's making. Whether Lucifer is "fittest" is not for me to say. When Lucifer was prosecuted and its editor imprisoned Brother M. G. W. evidently thought it a progressive journal, and that it should be supported and defended. The editor has now been out of prison eight years, but the paper is still held up occasionally by the P. O. department and deprived of equal privileges in the mails, and, as just related, one entire edition was destroyed. Thus it would seem the tactics of the suppressors have changed, not their spirit or purpose. If Lucifer deserved the support of reformers ten or twelve years ago because of its championship of freedom and justice, does it not deserve their support now?

When has Lucifer faltered?

When or how did Lucifer retract?

When did Lucifer show the white feather?

"THE SOUL OF JUSTICE."

You say economic equality is the soul of justice, and that "mutual economics assures mutuality in all things and is the determining factor of life." Here again I cannot quite agree with you. Mutual economics may subsist between husband and wife and yet the wife may be a sex slave. Instead of the "soul of justice" I would rather say that "economic equality" is one of the limbs or branches of justice. "Sex contains all," says Whitman. If so, then it is more nearly correct to say sex equality is the soul of justice.

This reply is much longer than I intended. I close by saying the "wide gap between us" is more imaginary than real. The tone of your letter is, in the main, quite as sentimental as were your letters when you were a valiant supporter of Lucifer and its work. As to whether Lucifer has "driven stakes in Egypt" and has retrograded I leave for others to say. I, too, no less than yourself and our Socialist friends generally, am working and waiting for the "co-operative commonwealth." Our methods may not be the same, but whether the individualistic or the socialistic method be the wiser and better let time disclose. Fraternally and affectionately yours, M. HARMAN.

LUCIFER'S HELPERS.

Herbert Gries, $5; J. F. Paulson, $10; C. L. Swartz, $3; T. F. Lee, $1; H. Kuehn, $5; F. E. Lothrinyer, $9; P. G. Peabody, $5; W. S. Sullivan, $1; M. Everett Pratt, 50¢.

Some of these contributions were sent some months ago to help us to pay the increased expenditures of the office while under the ban of the P. O. department, and, by oversight, have not been publicly acknowledged till this late date.

Now that we have been readmitted to second class rates it is hoped there will be no further need of donations to defray the running expenses of the office. It is by no means a comfortable feeling to know that we are conducting a business that is not self-sustaining, and must be sustained by contributions from others; and yet such seems the fate of most publishers of radical reform journals.

In order, however, that the publication of Lucifer should be self-sustaining it is absolutely necessary that subscriptions be paid promptly when due. Under our present economic and financial system this is not to be expected, in all cases, and hence there will necessarily arise a deficit unless receipts on subscription be supplemented in some other way, or ways.

One of these ways is getting new subscribers by those who have the welfare of Lucifer at heart—by those who feel that Lucifer's work is their work as well as ours. The getting of new subscribers is not always a pleasant task, but by persevering effort some of our friends have succeeded in securing quite a number of new names for Lucifer's list, and thus have helped materially towards putting the paper on a paying basis.

Another way of helping, and one that is more generally available than the getting of new subscribers, is the patronage of Lucifer's book and pamphlet department. Many of these books and pamphlets have been donated by publishers or others in order to help to pay the inevitable weekly and monthly expenses.

In both of the ways just mentioned it is believed most of our readers can help ward off the accumulation of unpaid bills, and thus help to tide over what is always the hardest part of the year to meet expenses, namely, the summer season.

Again the thanks of the workers in Lucifer's office are due to the workers outside, for timely aid. If there are others who have sent help within the past few months and not received proper acknowledgment therefor, they will please let us know.

Thousands of well-meaning but misguided folks are to-day gulping down medicine that has been invented and compounded by men who themselves are suffering all the pain and agony of disease.

Sometimes it is said that man cannot be trusted with the government of himself. Can he be trusted with the government of others?—or have we found angels in the form of kings to govern him? Let history answer that question.—Jefferson.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.

The discussion started by the article of R. B. Kerr, entitled "Must Sex Reform Wait upon Economic Reform" has called out so many responses that it is utterly impossible to print them all, even though the entire paper be given up to their accommodation. A half dozen or more good articles are now in type waiting a chance to see the light of print, and this suggests once more the propriety of condensation, of cutting out all superfluous words and paragraphs, when writing for a paper so small as is Lucifer. One or two long articles is all that should be printed in any one issue. Lucifer's editor is himself so great a transgressor in this line that reproof of this kind comes with not the best grace from him. M. H.

FHOM AN "OLD WRITER" FOR LUCIFER.

Some one asked a little while ago what had become of some of the old writers of Lucifer, and among the names mentioned was that of May Huntley. "May Huntley" can only answer for herself, and she would say that one reason she has been silent so long is that she has grown older and perhaps wiser. She is not so mightily certain that she knows all about the sex question or that any of us do, or that we can safely decry upon the "ignorance of the masses" when we may know so little ourselves. It takes a great deal of study and learning to be able to teach others; and we may do more mischief than good, by teaching some things that are not so.

"May Huntley" has never doubted for one instant the desirability of liberty—that one great blessing that comes second only to life itself. We can accomplish nothing, we cannot grow, we cannot develop our own real lives, without liberty. We must not be fettered by crystallized institutions, by legally established authority, by outside constraints of any kind, if we would truly live. But while appreciating liberty more and more with each succeeding year, I also appreciate that perfect and beautiful mastery of self which should go with it in order to bring ourselves up to the very best of which we are capable. Liberty and knowledge should go together; certainly the way to gain the latter is to possess the former, but one needs be careful what he does with his liberty when he does not know. I have seen so much of sorrow, misery and loneliness come from seizing liberty simply as a sensuous power to satiate every appetite, every passion, every impulse and desire that springs up in the human breast without due consideration, that I have become wary of preaching liberty until a sense of responsibility and self-control is well established within the individual.

I read, with interest, Mr. R. B. Kerr's article in No. 1017. I am aware that Mr. Kerr is a more learned, more scientific writer than I; but at the same time, I take the liberty to express an opinion contrary to his. It seems to me that he writes as though "gratification" were the most important thing in the world, and he is more anxious that "natural satisfaction whenever it is wanted" should be easy, than he is that women should be free. He thinks if "cheap and plentiful checks" prevailed, all would be well and everybody would be happy.

But the "free woman" may not mean "natural satisfaction whenever it is wanted" after all. The "free woman" may be a wise, well poired, self-controlled being who may not think best to yield to every passing passion or desire or impulse. We can none of us be so sure that celibacy is the "evil," the curse, that he seems to think it. There may be other methods for the expression of sex forces, than the procreative act. Creative energy may be exerted in many different ways, and still result in happiness and great good. We do not know that it is so necessary that men and women exchange magnetism by physical sexual connection. I know plenty of healthy, wholesome, high-minded, cheerful people in this world who are celibates. I know many other people who early in life decided that to be a happy and well-rounded-out character one must indulge every impulse of appetite and passion, and that as no one had a right to deny them the opportunity, they must be gratified. No consideration of any one else's welfare or peace, no thought of future health and comfort, no foresight as to consequences, were allowed to interfere with the present delight in "doing as one pleased." And in old age they found only lonely misery, disappointment, the destruction of all the ties that make old age sweet and peaceful; only sorrow and ruin.

I have known of several cases of a young married woman whose bonds chafed too severely, and I have myself helped her to a sense of her own individuality, and to her right to herself. But these women became dazzled with the prospect of "doing exactly as they pleased." Throwing aside all legal or religious constraint, they forgot that they then needed all the more the guidance of a wise, self-possessed, calm and dignified mind; everything was thrown to the winds, and impulse, passion and whim ruled. These women have not found happiness, or health, or development, or sanity. They are far less at peace than the poor, faithful, ignorant wife who has simply followed her idea of "duty." Not that I think the martyr wife is an ideal personage, either. But the free, well-balanced, sane, self-mastered woman who knows exactly what she is about and does it, is the creature I hope to see develop in the future.

Some libertarians are in favor of allowing—yes, encouraging—the greatest liberty to their young children in matters of sex relations. What does a young girl of fifteen know of the consequences of her acts? You may teach her, of course, by words, but there are some things that cannot be learned except by observation or experience; she has little idea of the future; little idea that life is long and earnest and serious. She learns to play at love, to dally with this one and that, to trifle her soul's best treasures away. When she is of mature age, and begins to realize what existence means, she finds she has wasted her gifts and her chances. She is not capable of loving, as a woman should, a steady, strong, devoted and manly man; she is not really fit to be the lover of such a man; not because of the conventional idea that she is no longer "virtuous," but that she really has destroyed those qualities which make her desirable as a companion for an earnest, sensible, good-hearted man.

I do not believe in outside restraints for a sane, responsible person. But I do believe some restraint is necessary for children to prevent them from running into the fire, or into ruin. I would not even set "Mrs. Grundy" off the track of grown women. I have no more use for "Mrs. Grundy" than has Mr. Kerr, but I would remind him that she is, after all, a creature of economic conditions; her power would be very small if she could not deprive people of a chance to make a living, or of occupying the position in the economic world they would like. I would place no obstacle in the way of any person to prevent them doing as they pleased, but I would if I could teach them to know whether they were doing as they pleased or not. I would teach them to study the laws of cause and effect, to look into the consequences of actions and to weigh results. Then to decide, and to decide firmly, what their lives should be. I would not have them be mere driftwood on the current of circumstances, to be hurried hither and yon as impulse and passion seized them. If a woman looks well into the probable consequences of a life of varied physical love relations, and makes up her mind that she will be happier, better, greater, in following that kind of a life, I respect her decision and herself, and would wish her good speed. But if she is ignorant; if she allows herself to drift, to be coaxed or swayed into conditions she does not really understand; if she is imbued merely with a desire to be "free" without any idea of responsibility, I can only pity her and regret that she is so "free."

I wish women to be free, but I also want them to be wise. If a well-poised, firm, self-controlled woman wishes to sacrifice herself and her love nature for the sake of superior children, that is her business. And this brings us to another of Mr. Kerr's hobbies. It is a very "nice" question, this "scientific" breeding of children. The human race are not cattle and cannot be managed in the same way. How will Mr. Kerr or any other advocate of human stirpiculture, control the borning of future generations without setting up a despotism more rigid and exacting than any we have ever known? No doubt every good woman wants her child to be healthy, strong, intellectual, good; but will she be willing to sacrifice her finer feelings, her love, her lover (for he may not always be a superior animal), for the sake of bearing a child by a "scientifically" fit man? And would any lover of liberty expect to force her to do so? It is a favorite fad of some "reformers" to establish a bureau of matrimony before which all who wish to marry or unite sexually shall appear for examination. Ella Wheeler Wilcox advocates this idea and many other apparently sane persons. Could mating be prevented by such means, and if it could, would any libertarian like to see such a despotism established? MAY HUNTLEY.

WANTED—A copy of "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated," for which the publisher's price will be paid in cash or literature. Address this office.

VARIOUS VOICES.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, step at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and step at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

W. W. Thoroughman, Conger, Kan. "Sample copy received. If the paper is to be continued I will be a subscriber—not because I need a teacher but because I want to keep in touch with those who would like to see freedom established in the earth. * * * The whole Mystery of Life hangs on the sex question. You were a year in jail for advocating a deeper truth than the world has got. I was one day in an asylum for the insane for telling a truth deeper than you have got. The people don't believe you and you would not believe me. But I believe you. * * * 'HERALD OF THE DAWN!' Beautiful and sweet! The Dawn is here; the Day will come. * * * All of what little truth the world has got has come through much suffering. The cause of the suffering is out of sight to all who have not seen life. * * * Laura S. Wood of Portland, Ore., says: 'The men who are working along the lines of Socialism per se, of Single Tax per se, of all sorts of creeds and isms, leaving out sex and its mighty underlying force, are good men and earnest in their way, but not gifted with great discernment.' 'It's mighty underlying force.' Laura knows, and you know, that the sex question is the question."

G. E. Bowen, Kirkwood, Mo. "Sorry I cannot suitably put into words, pointed and particular, the things that stir my pity, my resentment or defiance. * * * People are poisoned by fear. They do not understand and when they do they must suffer the greater torture and despair. * * * I cannot comprehend the art of deliberate and determined hypocrisy; and of all questions Sex is first in human importance. The converging views, the common effort of thinking minds the world over, proves this again and again. * * * It is hard to prescribe a cure or fix a turning point in the corrupt tendencies of modern social life, which, I presume, closely resembles in motives, inconsistencies, weaknesses and misery, conditions in the preceding stages of human progress. And it is well to remember that progress is not all upward. * * * Am glad your strength is spared for your great service to your kind; that you are encouraged by crucifixion and cannot by any influence of fear, torture or persuasion be swerved from the truth as it has been given you so clearly to see."

Agnes Benham, Adelaide, South Australia. "By this mail I send you the first fruits of my own many years' contemplation and thoughtful earnest study of the problems you have devoted your life towards solving. I shall be glad to have your opinion of my book, 'Perfect Humanhood,' and if any of your readers wish for a copy I shall be glad to supply you on trade terms. I received two copies of Lucifer dated may 12, containing your article, 'The Right of the Child to be Born Well.' I have always taken the deepest interest in Lucifer and ever shall do so, and wish I could help you more in share of the world's work. So nobly, so bravely, so patiently have you played your part that I am sure your very life is an inspiration and encouragement that shines through your printed pages into your readers' lives. That, at any rate, is what I feel when I read Lucifer. I trust your brave daughter is quite recovered. Your Chicago winters are certainly very trying. We have no such weather in our sunny South Australia. * * * Find enclosed money order for one pound sterling. Kindly send books as per list, reserving five shillings for my subscription to Lucifer."

Julius Conrads, San Antonio, Texas. "What does 'Marked Copy' mean, when found on copies of Lucifer? * * * Enclosed find ten cents for which kindly forward catalogue and price list of books and pamphlets, also copies of 'Son of the Morning,' 'Herald of the Dawn,' 'Harbinger of the Good Time Coming.' Later on I will forward names for samples."

[The words "Marked Copy" when stamped on wrapper or on title page of the paper is simply an invitation to look inside for an article to which special attention is called by the publisher, or by some friend who sends a copy of the paper for examination. "Son of the Morning," "Herald of the Dawn," "Harbinger of the Good Time Coming," are synonyms or sub-titles of the Latin Lucifer, ancient name of the Morning Star. Names for samples are always welcome, especially names of those who do their own thinking.—M. H.]

Thirza Rathbun, San Andreas, Cal. "When I think of my own and other women's lives—of which I have heard—and of what they might have been under a better social and industrial system, am vain enough to think the whole might make a good story as a plea for a better system. Nearly every woman is a slave—either sexually or industrially. May the powers above help her when she is both. How to do the best work along the lines of sexual and industrial freedom seems to be the problem. Will Socialism help us to all round freedom? Time will tell * * * When you find city life too expensive and want to come west you would be welcome to come and camp here till you could look round and decide where it would be best to settle. * * * Mr. R. likes gardening, and thinks that if he could meet a good gardener of broadly liberal ideas, an arrangement might be made to work together. Do you happen to know of any such?"

[The experience of the man who supported himself and wife for thirty years and laid up money on one acre of irrigated land in California, would seem to answer the question as to whether gardening pays in that state.—M. H.]

Walter Hurt, Camden, Ohio. "Until I received a copy of Lucifer a few days ago, I did not know you had been having trouble recently. I am greatly isolated here, being on a farm for my health, and seldom see a paper, wishing to give my mind a complete rest. It is little I can do at present to help along the cause, but at least I will send my subscription. So here is the dollar.

"While acting as city editor of the Denver News my health broke down entirely, and later I suffered a stroke of paralysis that put me out of the newspaper business—permanently, perhaps. So you see I am deprived of my earning capacity.

"Every true lover of liberty who is able to do so should now contribute to the cause and help you out of your difficulties. Lucifer is a light that must not be lost to the world.

"It is encouraging to see a man of great intellect and massive character, and who is large in the public eye, like J. Warner Mills, coming to the support of an unpopular and persecuted movement for freedom and justice. When we shall have a few more such men endowed with bravery as well as brains, the cause will be won."

Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Va., Aug. 7, '04. "Dear Friends: Of late I have received many letters inquiring if Elmina is still alive. I feel I have been a bit careless about writing both to private and public correspondent. Guess I am getting old and lazy, but never too much so to be glad to be remembered by friends. I'm in perfect health, of mind and body, and enjoy every day and hour. Life never seemed more full and desirable than now. Seventy-six is a long while to back upon, though but a moment as regards time itself. I am still a radical atheist, the only one I know in all this part of Virginia. Yet I think I have more real friends than any church member hereabouts. I keep all the old ones and am all the time adding new ones. I love life and enjoy flowers, books and birds more and more as the years roll on. I send you all a loving greeting."

W. G. W. G., Regina, Canada: "Enclosed please find postal note for 50c (fifty cents), for which kindly send me, as a trial, your paper, entitled Lucifer, for six months. I don't know where the devil (not Lucifer) you got my name from to send me a sample copy, but if you can supply me with the name of the person who did so, I will be immensely obliged, for even now I consider him a bosom friend, and how much more so if I knew him personally, thus providing me with a mutual friend. Of course, I would never divulge where I received the information. I have always held the opinions and views set forth in this splendid paper and no doubt you will hear from me anon, but by my acquaintances taken for a crank, standing all alone in my craziness, and never have I been able to come across another person holding similar ideas, so you can see how pleased I am to hear of some brother cranks supporting freedom in love."

[It is impossible to tell from whom we got the name of our new found Canadian friend, as we get names from so many sources. This letter is inserted mainly to encourage our friends everywhere to continue sending us names for samples.]

In sharp contrast with the foregoing letter is the following, which is inserted verbatim et literatim and without comment; and with this as a specimen of the "blessings" we sometimes get for our industry in sending out samples, the "Voices" column closes for this issue:

Chicago, July 19, 1904.

Moses Harmon, Editor Lucifer, City:

Dear Sir—A copy of your infernal paper, mailed to my wife, has been handed over to me. I herewith request you not to send any more of these papers, to my home, and in fact I herewith forbid it. Should any more of these papers be received at my residence, I will see what the Secret Service Officials of the United States Post Office can do to stop it. Neither my wife nor myself are in sympathy and we will not tolerate such ideas. We do not want any argument on the subject. We are in favor of uplifting the home instead of destroying it. We want the mothers to take care of their own children, instead of allowing the State to be responsible for them, and, in every way your ideas are not welcome. I do not want my home debauched by any such literature, and I will not receive it, or permit it in my mail box.

Very respectfully yours,

A. MILO BENNETT.

NO GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP.

In the light of recent doings of the Postoffice Department it would be a great mistake to have the government control the transportation of the country, as some reformers and Socialists are urging. We have lately seen how the Postoffice Department seeks to control the business, the pleasure, the religion and the ordinary affairs of the individual by censoring the mails.

Any person who contemplates the contemptible pleas under which editors, writers, publishers and average citizens have of late been arrested, will at once reflect upon the additional scope that would be given the government if the transportation of the country was given over to its hands. By applying regulations corresponding to those now in vogue in the postoffice, every passenger and every package of freight would be made the object of detective inquiry or investigation, with the result that what the Postoffice Department has neglected in espionage the Transportation Department would fully cover.

We therefore want the transportation of the country left exactly where it is—in the hands of the capitalists—and, not only this, but we want the Postoffice Department sold out to the capitalists also, that the people may have their liberties preserved, and, incidentally, be less robbed and better served at the same time.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

With Macaulay, Rosa Graul would say: "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman would be less loving and lovable, or that man would be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish.

SEX RADICALISM.

IV. WHAT IS PERMANENT IN THE PURITAN IDEAL?

Our subject cannot be truly shown as a living whole when cut into dry sections. But puritanism must perforce be considered in two parts; first, the puritan ideal, and, secondly, the puritan practice; for no two things were ever more distinct and diverse than these two are.

Of these two, the first, the puritan ideal, is by far the more important, both in itself and as marking an historical epoch; for only the things which are unseen are eternal; and the soul of puritanism will remain as an influence when the body it inhabits, the puritan system, misshapen by the ignorance and cruelty which are the worst puritan evils, will only be remembered as a distempered dream. Narrow as this ideal is, and fractional, for it is over-praise to call it one-sided, it yet is real and forcible. And not only are we all the children of puritans (which is not important), but our new ideal is the child of the old ideal.

The puritan ideal in its subtler elements defies analysis, nor is it easy to keep it in our view amid the hideous failures of the sex system which it is supposed to animate. But the essence of it seems to be that the joys of individuals must always be sacrificed to the advantage, real or supposed, of society, and that all pleasure lies under the suspicion of being "bad," and there is a pride in maintaining a kill-joy demeanor to accord with this.

Be it far from us to deny the principle of the individual sacrificing himself when necessary for society. It is one of the fundamental principles on which society is based, and is found among other social animals besides man. The idea that one man should die for the people has, it is true, been worked up by priests into the ghastliest of superstitions, and is linked with many and many a horrible tragedy of useless torture and death, from Judea to Mexico. As usual, the polluted mind of the priest has been able to infuse poison into one of the noblest instincts. Nevertheless, the social enthusiasm which makes any individual willing to be one to suffer or die for others is a true and valuable instinct. Prominent examples of it are seen in the bravery of soldiers and firemen; but there are everyday instances of it in many other walks of life. When the human race has attained to something like a sane sex system, this noble principle of putting the good of society before that of self will be a mighty influence with those assuming the responsibilities of progenitors; and coupled with the wisdom of science, instead of the follies of superstition, will prove an immense power to raise society.

It is of course a mere craze that the pleasure of one member of society must be hostile to the good of the whole. "What? Do you think a woman should do as she likes?" was the horrified question of a man whose own nature and life had been terribly cramped by puritan customs and ideas. The puritan assumption is that what anyone likes must always be selfish, sensual, and the carelessly chosen means of gratifying a passing desire.

The working creed of the puritan may fairly be stated thus:

1. (Self-control.) Instinct and all impulses must be under control. The older puritans would have added that all sex-impulse is of the nature of sin, and Tolstoy still endorses this.

2. (Social control.) Chastity of the unmarried should be enforced by the severest social penalties.

3. (Enforced exclusiveness and constancy.) Sex-love should be exclusive, restricted to one object, and permanent, and take form in monogamy.

4. (Maternity socially enforced and socially prevented.) Monogamy provides the nation with children, and no births outside of marriage are to be honored.

5. (Bond-marriage.) The woman's services to the man in marriage are her only means of exacting his help in rearing children.

6. (Asceticism.) Sensual pleasure is an unfortunate feature of marriage. It is permissable to the man, but the woman should regard the sexual association as her "duty." "A good husband" is one who refrains from excessive sexual demands; "a good wife" is one who sacrifices herself to her husband in all ways.

7. (Ignorance.) All inquiry and speculation in sex-morals is indecent and wicked, especially in women.

To the above we may add (for it is rarely omitted), in the bullying style of the Athanasian creed—which faith, except everyone do keep whole and undefiled, without doubt he (and still more she) shall suffer life-long persecution at the hands of Mrs. Grundy and her followers.

On the above points I believe the sex-radical will pronounce as follows:

1. The principle of self-control goes without saying, and is by no means the exclusive possession of the puritan, as he tries to claim. To ignore such a principle would be lunacy. Even the loosest liver—libertine, drunkard or gambler—more often exercises self-control than follows ungoverned impulse. It may be far less than a tenth of this time that he fails to withstand the craving for excitement which society ignores and for which it affords him no good outlet. The thoughtful are always self-balanced. Our first lesson to the puritans should be to show them that those who have thought out and adopted the creed of love in freedom are not wanting in the principle or practice of self-control at any time or place. The theological idea of "sin" is supposed to be a useful bogie to frighten the thoughtless, but it is rejected by science.

2. The puritan never condescends to definitions, but no doubt he means by chastity the abstinence from all physical expression of sex-feeling. While, of course, fully agreeing that the power to exercise such abstinence at will is valuable, we deny the right of society to force any individual to use that power except at his own discretion, nor has the attempt to do so ever had more than a very slender success. Society should not interfere with the sex-life of an individual, except when his actions are injurious to others. Its issue of licenses to depart from chastity, called marriage, is an impertinence.

3. The puritan, who can only think of sex-love in terms of monogamic marriage (ideal, not actual), constantly confuses constancy and exclusiveness together. The tendency of permanence in love and friendship is recognized by all as wholly good. Everyone entering upon any form of love looks to find the same responsiveness in the future as he does in the present, and rejoices when love proves the same to-day as yesterday. And he aims at being as constant himself as he hopes others will be to him. As Jane Hume Clapperton well says in her last book ("A Vision of the Future"), "Constancy is a social grace and virtue as certain to wax and grow as jealousy is to wane and slowly disappear."

The tendency to exclusiveness is also real, and it is a marked feature of intense and transitory passion. But the motives which underlie exclusiveness are complicated. The finer forms of love necessitate discrimination, selection and restriction to a few. The best of us cannot give our best friendship to those who love all equally. On the other hand, that we are satisfied to love only one or two throughout life, and seek no further, may be due to selfishness or laziness. No rule can be laid down. Many hold that the fullest favors of sex-love must be restricted to one, and that social expansiveness can be allowed sufficient expression in friendship without recognized sexual favors; and this ideal, though rarely carried out, has no doubt added force to the monogamic theory.

My own belief is that the one-only lover idea has had a most unfortunate effect on the minds and lives of all of us.

4. The monogamous system does not now fulfil the function of reproducing the race, as regards Americans of Anglo-Saxon stock; and even some upholders of orthodox marriage, like Roosevelt, are beginning to see that there is something wrong when married women so often entirely refuse to be "as women love to be who love their lords." It can hardly be doubted that the system which checks free motherhood by persecution also checks the almost instinctive desire for maternity within marriage; and that free unions, and a sane and instructed public opinion in regard to sex, duly honoring maternity, will accomplish what blundering coercion has failed to do. On this question, women will have the last word.

5. According to the new ideal, the free services of the woman will prove more satisfactory than the bond services; and the help of the man in supporting children will be at least as readily forthcoming under freedom as under bondage.

6. Sensual pleasure is not wicked, but all joys are heightened by being shared. The true ideal of sex-joy is mutuality, and this implies high mental pleasure.

7. Knowledge and thought are always bracing and helpful; ignorance is demoralizing.

To sum up: Idealists of the new school endorse the puritan principle of self-control, but not that of abstinence and social coercion. They admit the ideal of constancy, but not of enforced exclusiveness. They reject compulsory maternity and persecution of unmarried mothers, and reject bonded sex-service, asceticism and ignorance, for either men or women.

ANSWERS.

Mrs. Whitehead is quite entitled to differ from me, but she is mistaken in trying to discount what I say on the ground that it is only a man's opinion. As it happens, the movement in favor of contraceptis is mainly a woman's movement. I have discussed the subject with many men and many women. I have hardly ever met a man, however liberal, who altogether liked the idea of using preventives; but I have rarely met a woman, however religious, who did not cordially approve of them if she knew about them. In no country are women so free as in the United States; in scarcely any other country are preventives used so much; and the favorite American preventive is one that is applied by the woman, not by the man. Mrs. Whitehead is a typical man in her opinions.

Mrs. Whitehead thinks I should stick to Socialism, and leave the sex question to women. But a similar objection awaits me in the Socialist movement. I am not a member of the working class, and many working men object to people like me poking their noses into what they consider a working man's movement. If I express my views on religion, I am told that I am not spiritually minded enough to understand such matters, and had better leave them to persons of keen spiritual eyesight.

Such complaints do not worry me, however. There was a time when Marx, Engels and Lassalle were told to mind their own business, and leave the working class to emancipate itself; but now most working men are glad that the advice was not taken. In the same way the time will come when women will be proud to quote Shelley, Noyes, Harman, Grant, Allen and Walker; and will admit that these men saw the needs of women more clearly than any of their feminine contemporaries.

The editor's case of the superior man and woman with nine imbecile children was certainly a very remarkable one, but one would like to know a good deal more about it before concluding that it was an exception to the rule that like begets like. What were the characteristics of the four grandparents, eight great grandparents, sixteen great-great-grandparents, and thirty-two great-great-great-grandparents? It is of little use to know about the parents only, for nothing is more common than reversion to ancestral characteristics which do not appear in the immediate parents. At the least, I should like to know something about the uncles and aunts of these children. I myself know a superior man with a very presentable wife, who had insane and deformed children. Unfortunately, the mother's family was tainted, though she herself was very passable. The friends of the father tried to prevent the marriage, because they knew there was insanity in the mother's family.

Then I should like to know what has become of the nine imbecile children. If not all dead, they must now be pretty well grown up. Are they living in asylums, or supported by friends? Or are some of them earning a living, and if so with what success?

Anyway, one must not assume that a very superior person is always a sane or sound one. It is only necessary to read Lombroso's "Man of Genius," or Nesbit's "Insanity of Genius," to get rid of that idea. An extraordinary number of the great persons in history have been insane themselves, and many more have had insane children and relatives. "Great wits are sure to madness near allied," as Dryden told us long ago. It is not safe to breed from very abnormal persons of any kind; those a little above the average give the best results.

In No. 1017 Mrs. C. B. Colby is quoted as giving some advice to sex reformers. "They must know," she says, "that the persistent ideal which has caused the evolution of animal life has been the struggle towards monogamic relations of the sexes. According to the completeness of development along this line scientists have classified life into lower or higher orders. Man has carried it further than any other created being, hence the love which tends to differentiate his pursuit of his mate from the lust of the brute."

There is not a particle of truth in any of these statements. The tendency of modern biology is to attribute "the evolution of animal life" mainly to one cause, viz., natural selection through the struggle for existence. It is alleged that all plants and animals tend to multiply beyond the means of subsistence; that a struggle for existence results; and that those who happen to be best fitted to their environment survive and leave offspring who possess their own favorable characteristics. Any kind of advantage may be useful in this struggle. The sting of the wasp, the swiftness of the deer, the thick hide of the rhinoceros, are all helpful to their possessors. Accordingly these things, which no doubt originally appeared only as very slight variations, have gradually been evolved by the aid of natural selection.

Most biologists, however, are probably inclined to attach some importance to sexual selection as a cause of evolution. In the eighth chapter of the "Descent of Man" Darwin shows that monogamy is much less favorable than polygamy to sexual selection.

It is therefore quite absurd to say that "the persistent ideal which has caused the evolution of animal life has been the struggle towards monogamic relations of the sexes." Equally preposterous is the statement that "according to the completeness of development along this line scientists have classified life into lower or higher orders." It is safe to say that no zoologist in the world ever thought of adopting any such principle of classification. All zoologists place mammals at the head of the animal creation, and all place birds on a lower plane. Yet monogamy is the rule among birds, and the exception among mammals. It is true that, of the four apes nearest in physical structure to man, three at least, the gorilla, chimpanzee and ourang-outang, show a tendency to monogamy, if we may believe the stories of hunters. But these animals have not been very successful in the struggle for existence. They have not been able to spread over a wide area, and there is reason to suppose that, without any intervention from man, they are gradually dying species.

As for man himself, nearly all anthropologists agree that he is the descendant of a promiscuous ape. While the marrying anthropoid apes have eked out a miserable and inglorious history in small corners of the world, the children of their promiscuous cousins have covered the earth, and obtained dominion over all the creatures.

It is not true that "man has carried it" (monogamy) "further than any other created being." I suppose Mrs. Colby will hardly assert that the male of man makes any approach to monogamy. But many birds are really monogamous, male and female alike; and it is generally believed that some of them are monogamous for life. The great naturalist Brehm says that "real genuine marriage can only be found among birds."

Let it be remembered, too, that doves and bull finches are monogamous without law or public opinion, and that is more than Mrs. Colby can trust men and women to be. Mrs. Colby is very funny on this point. She talks bravely about the monogamous instincts of men and women, but she does not care to let them have a chance to display their monogamous instincts in freedom. Wise Mrs. Colby!

The subject is so very complicated, however, that mere observation is an insufficient guide. We must have recourse to experiment, that great scientific method which bigots and tyrants have in all ages abhorred, and which Mrs. Colby abhors. Fortunately we have already proved one thing by that method. The experiments of breeders for thousands of years have proved beyond question that it is undesirable to breed animals by monogamic methods. The most rabid monogamous fanatic would never dream of applying his principles to his cows and horses. When the breeding of men and women is treated as a science, monogamy will seem as ridiculous for human beings as it would now seem for sheep and cattle.

On one point I agree with Mrs. Colby. She recommends "a scientific study of the development of life through all its forms." That is excellent advice. I hope Mrs. Colby will follow it herself.

R. B. KERR.

"GLAD TIDINGS OF GREAT JOY."

BY PROFESSOR EDGAR L. LARKIN.

In looking over the multitudes of books, magazines, pamphlets, papers, essays, monographs and personal letters that pour into this Observatory from all parts of the world, one sentence has been found so often that it could not fail to attract attention. This short sentence bears glad tidings on its wings, and comes laden with promises of untold good things. And "great joy" springs from every letter and word.

The writer has been thinking over great events that have occurred in historic times; great movements or transactions of mankind; startling events, those that brought world-wide changes and modified human civilization, thought and culture. In this review, beginning with the dawn of history and coherent records of man, many vast things have happened, running along down to the present. The mighty events found in history are as follows: The migration of the Aryans to India; the births of the great sages of India, Kapila, Badarayana and Buddha; the foundation of the Iranian empires and of Assyria and Babylon; the birth of Zoroaster; the foundation of Egypt, Rome and Greece, with births of Socrates, Aristotle and Plato; the continual expansion of the Aryans, filling Europe; the births of Galileo, Copernicus, Kepler, Newton, DesCartes, Leverrier, Adams, Bessel, Gauss, Kelvin, Darwin and Herbert Spencer; the Magna Charta; foundation of the United States; the Declaration of Independence, and the liberation of African slaves by Lincoln. These, together with the births of Paine and Ingersoll, with their proclamations that the human mind is by inherent right automatic and free, are the chief events that history records as having occurred on this planet. But glorious as they all are, and of vast import to human existence on earth, they all dwindle into insignificance with the marvelous sentence that is so often repeated in twentieth century literature. The chief sentence that has appeared in any literature during thirty centuries reads as follows:

MEN WILL STUDY THEIR MINDS AGAIN.

No six words in any book, ancient or modern, can compare with these in importance. For the moment men know the possibilities latent in their own minds they will have almost unlimited power over themselves and nature round about. Of all things, we know the least about our minds. Vast systems of mental culture and culture of the body will spread over the world when men comprehend their minds. Each dormant and now unused faculty of that majestic splendor, the human mind, will be trained to transcendent power. Faculties not now known to be in existence will be discovered. Our present system of "education" will be obliterated from the earth and true education based on rigid laws of mind will be substituted. Hundreds of silly habits, customs, beliefs, myths and medieval suppositions will go. Current laws, methods of trials in courts and imprisonment of criminals, marriage myths and customs, "practice" of medicine, funeral habits, all, everything we now think, say or do will be transformed and reversed, when we find our place in nature, and know our own minds. Stupendous changes in transportation by sea and land, due to the introduction of steam turbines in place of pistons; vast changes in irrigation, agriculture, horticulture, human race culture, as well as plant and animal culture, and in every other thing will come when we analyze our minds. An entire new and splendid science—sexology—will appear and be taught in universities everywhere.

It is needless to say that "religion" will be so upset and changed that we can scarcely recognize it, the moment we know our minds. The word "again" appears, for the great sages of India studied their minds 3,000 years ago. In one hundred years we will be their equal in the science of mind. All human beings now alive will be classed as barbarians by future historians.

Lowe Observatory, Echo Mt., Cal., Aug. 15, 1904.

SEX EVOLUTION.

All noble intelligent men are women's co-operators on the sex question, and it seems but fair to give them a hearing, however much they may differ in detail from the opinions of women in particular. Our interests are their interests and the sex question is certainly their business if we ever hope for freedom.

Without the generous and active support of progressive men we women would be helpless to fight our battles.

I believe with the writer who says, "No willing, normal, well cared for woman ever died of excessive child bearing." But that is not the question. We should not be compelled to live the life that would simply keep us alive. We should each live the life we choose to live.

And what of the millions who are neither willing, well cared for nor always normal? Are they never, in consequence, to be allowed sex expression?

There may be good reasons why they should not desire children, or at any rate more than they feel able to care for.

What, then, is to be done if no artificial check is resorted to?

In the present stage of the world, and so long as institutional marriage remains—and it is likely to remain for centuries to come—it seems to me it would be well, and, in fact, the greatest blessing, if some scientific knowledge could be widely known that would prevent undesired offspring. It would greatly help woman in her struggle for freedom.

Some day, when the race is further advanced, a universal natural method will be known and approved, for it is certain that, though motherhood and the generating of offspring is a most necessary and sacred office at the present time, and always will be, yet the trend will eventually be more toward regenerating ourselves. In no way can we so well serve our fellow human beings.

Not the least in the efforts toward that end will be sex manifestation, though the modes of expression will doubtless differ with the needs of the race.

(MRS.) B. M.

Socialism is first of all a political movement of the working class, clearly defined and uncompromising, which aims at the overthrow of the prevailing capitalist system by securing control of the national government and by the exercise of the public powers, supplanting the existing capitalist class government with socialist administration—that is to say, changing a republic in name into a republic in fact.

Socialism also means a coming phase of civilization, next in order to the present one, in which the collective people will own and operate the sources and means of wealth production, in which all will have an equal right to work and all will co-operate together in producing wealth and all will enjoy all the fruit of their collective labor.—Eugene V. Debs, in Unionism & Socialism.

Every real thought on every real subject knocks the wind out of somebody or other. As soon as his breath comes back he very probably begins to expend it in hard words. These are the best evidence a man can have that he has said something it was time to say.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

THE ANARCHIST CONVENTION.

Since our first call for an Anarchist convention, we have received a large number of letters from all over the globe, encouraging the convention and promising moral and financial support. We have, therefore, decided that the convention shall take place on September 5, lasting about five days. Those wishing that the convention may bring forth practical results, but cannot be present themselves, are requested to send essays and suggestions on the following subjects:

Anarchism, Communism, Individualism, Collectivism, Anarchism and Trades Unionism, The General Strike, Anarchism and Social Democracy, Political Action, Religion, Federation of Groups, A Defense Fund, The Sex Question, Our Literature, The Modern Drama and Anarchism, Ways and Means of Propaganda, and other pertinent questions.

Those intending to attend the convention will please communicate with us in order that the arrangement committee may provide accommodations for them at low rates.

DEBATING CLUB.

I hope to be able to attend this convention. M. HARMAN.

"HEART TO HEART TALKS."

ANNIVERSARY MONTH.—A RETROSPECT.

Twenty-four years ago this month, August, at Valley Falls, Kansas, LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER, was born.

It is well, as I think, to take a few moments now and then to looking backward over the road we have traveled, to see how far we have got, and to see whether we have adhered to the line of march marked out for ourselves, or whether we have followed a zig-zag path that leads to nowhere in particular.

What is LUCIFER'S record?

What has LUCIFER accomplished in the score and four years of its existence?

Has it justified the hopes of the little band of pioneer workers, thinkers, dreamers—if you choose to call them such?

What has LUCIFER stood for, all these years? What has been its central thought, what its guiding star?

Speaking for myself alone—as one only of the few remaining members of the little band of workers, dreamers, just referred to—speaking not as the autocrat of LUCIFER'S destiny, not as the "Pastor of His Flock," a la Fra Elbertus, but simply as one of many who have been, from time to time, associated with the work of editing, publishing and co-operatively sustaining the little journal, I would say that so far as I know the facts LUCIFER has stood

First, for LIGHT—as its name indicates—for the light of Intelligence, of Reason, as against the Darkness of Ignorance and Superstition.

Second, LUCIFER has stood for Freedom—for the right of each human being to think his own thought, to speak freely his mind on all subjects whatsoever, and to live his own non-invasive life in his own way, unmolested by meddlers, whether of Church, State or Grundy.

Third, LUCIFER has stood for Justice, which includes Co-operative Helpfulness, an all-pervading human sympathy—Love, maternal, paternal, fraternal, sororal, etc.

In accord with this general statement, LUCIFER has stood especially for light, for reason, for freedom, for justice, in those departments of associative life in which these guiding principles are most flagrantly disregarded, ignored and outraged, namely, the realm of Sex—sexology, the science of creative life, including the question of freedom or slavery of motherhood and the right of children to be born well, if born at all.

That is to say, while contending for freedom of speech and of press, on all lines of thought and action—while aiming to be a logical, all-round "Freethought" paper—LUCIFER has not stopped with generalities, such as the right of each human being to an equal share of earth's opportunities, his right to the enjoyment of all the fruits of his labor, etc., etc., but it has made a special fight for the right of each to know all that can be known of the differentiation called sex, to the end that a better race may be born; born, as it must be, through the right use and by avoiding the abuses of sex; and also a special fight for justice to womanhood, for the right of woman to the ownership and control of herself, her creative powers and functions for her own sake and for the sake of the coming child—because, as we all know, the child is incomparably more dependent upon woman's organism than upon that of man, for its proper development, for its rightful inheritance of a good start in life.

Whether LUCIFER has been always true to these basic principles; whether LUCIFER has faltered or paltered; whether LUCIFER has failed to "declare the whole counsel" of Truth, in this the most important but most neglected of all the fields of human inquiry, of scientific investigation, is not for me to say, inasmuch as I happen to have been, since its first issue, more closely identified with LUCIFER'S management than has any other person—always its senior editor, also its chief manager, except, perhaps, for the years during which I was held a close prisoner behind high stone walls and heavy iron doors, a victim of the American Inquisition, the American Censorship of Speech and of Press, whose Torquemada or chief organizer and director is Anthony Comstock of New York.

To give a complete outline or retrospect of LUCIFER'S experiences with the agents of the American Censorship would take too much space in this brief Heart to Heart Talk. Suffice it to say for this time—for the satisfaction of readers who may be interested, and who have had no opportunity of knowing the checkered career of the paper they may now be for the first time scanning—that for nearly ten years its senior editor was a Federal prisoner in Kansas, "Bleeding Kansas," either behind prison bars or a "prisoner at large" under heavy bonds, also that its associate editor, Edwin C. Walker, and its associate publisher, George Harman, were for several years prisoners under bonds, all three charged with the "crime" of publishing an "obscene" paper; the obscenity in this case being a few plainly worded protests—and yet not "vulgarly" worded protests—against the abuses of sex, and especially against the invasion of womanhood and motherhood under protection of our marriage laws and customs.

These protests constituted the head and front of our offending—only this, nothing more.

But while editors and publishers could be imprisoned and compelled to pay costs and fines, the paper itself could not be suppressed, except by an act of Czarism, such as, in time of peace, the officers of our general government have very seldom been guilty of committing. While its editors were prisoners, under bonds or behind the bars—wearing the stripes without the stars—LUCIFER'S flag continued to float. Instead of retracting, instead of apologizing and asking to be forgiven under promise to do so no more, most of the indicted articles were republished, again and again, in order that the Supreme Court of Supreme Courts of the United States, the people, might know whether a crime had really been commited by these prisoners, or not.

Yes, through all the years of conflict, through the nearly ten years of "border war" in Kansas, which war has been continued in the metropolitan city, Chicago, LUCIFER'S pennon has been nailed to the masthead, with the motto inscribed,

"NO SURRENDER!"

I have said LUCIFER could not be suppressed except by an act of Czarism, and that the authorities in Kansas had not resorted to that extreme measure, and believing ours to be a government in which the forms of "equality before the law" were still observed, however much the spirit might be wanting, we were led to hope and believe that LUCIFER would not be suppressed in Chicago, however much its editors and publishers might be prosecuted and persecuted at the instigation of the Censorship aforesaid.

In this reasonable expectation we have been disappointed. Finding that imprisonment of its editors did not cause the permanent suspension of the paper the Modern Inquisition, acting through what the Ancient Roman Inquisition called the "Secular Arm," laid its heavy hand on one edition of LUCIFER, No. 1000, dated December 17, 1903, suppressed it, "confiscated" it, destroyed it, as "contraband of war"—clearly an act of militarism, not of civil process at all.

We have been advised to bring suit in the courts for the recovery of our property, or for damages, in lieu of the lost property itself. In reply, and as proof, if proof were needed, that governments are for the use and benefit of the rich and not for the poor, it is only necessary to say that justice in the United States courts is a very costly commodity, even when suits are prosecuted to a successful issue. LUCIFER has no money to spend in any such way.

Last winter, when LUCIFER was denied, on a mere technicality, its equal share of the "subsidized" rate of postage—one cent per pound—in order to get us reinstated, a man was sent to Washington to make a personal appeal to the heads of the P. O. Department. This personal appeal involved a considerable outlay of money, besides precious time. I have never yet learned the exact cost of reinstatement, since the expense was borne by LUCIFER'S New York friends, and could not have been met by this office unaided.

But suppose we now had the money to successfully prosecute the Roosevelt administration—the P. O. Department being simply a part of the executive branch of the government—would a verdict in our favor be any security against a repetition of the offense? I think not, and for these among other reasons:

The Roosevelt administration is essentially and ineradicably autocratic, despotic, even when there is involved a plain statute law. In the case of suppression of an issue of a paper, or of any number of issues, under the Comstock "Obscenity" laws, there is the widest possible scope for autocratic and despotic rulings, inasmuch as there is no definition, and can be none, as to the boundary between obscenity and that which is not obscene. It simply rests upon what is in the mind of him or her who assumes to decide upon the matter under indictment, and therefore a decision overruling the administration of Roosevelt, in the case of LUCIFER, No. 1000, would be no guide or safeguard whatever in the case of suppression of any subsequent issue.

Something might be gained, perhaps, by the publicity connected with such trial in the United States courts—provided the case could be brought to trial during the lifetime of any of the litigants—but even publicity seems of little avail against chronic abuses of power in high places, as witness the payment by the P. O. Department to the railways, of seven to ten times the sum for carrying the mails that express companies pay for similar service.

Certainly there has been no lack of publicity in exposing this species of robbery of the public by connivance of the P. O. officials.

If I had the money to do so I would probably republish the entire edition of LUCIFER, No. 1000, and send it broadcast over the country, as the Appeal to Reason, Mr. Wayland's paper, is now doing in the case of Eugene V. Debs versus Grover Cleveland.

As already known to many, the Democratic ex-president made an appeal to the general public for vindication of his acts during the Chicago railroad strike of 1894, in regard to which he was severely criticised, for sending United States troops to break the strike. This appeal was published in McClure's Magazine. Mr. Debs, as chief figure in that strike—being at that time president of the "A. R. U."—sent a reply to McClure's Magazine, only to have it rejected. Arrangements were immediately made with the Appeal to Reason, Girard, Kansas, to publish the rejected defense of the Railway Union. McClure's Magazine claims a circulation of half a million copies. Ten days before the publication of Mr. Debs' defense the Appeal to Reason claimed that its edition—of this date, August 27, the Debs edition—had already reached the half-million mark.

Many other Socialist journals are publishing this article in whole or in part. Even capitalistic journals, for instance, the Chicago Tribune, are giving considerable space to quotations from what will doubtless be regarded as the most complete and unanswerable arraignment of the abuse of power in the hands of a Federal executive, ever made in the United States.

PROSPECTS AHEAD.

Much more I should like to say of LUCIFER history for the past twenty-four years of struggle, of conflict forced upon it by those who claim the right to supervise the press of the nation, in the name of "God and morality," but failing space and nearness of the hour for shutting off the stream of "copy" for this issue, admonish me to close this Heart to Heart Talk for this time. As to prospects ahead, I would just say that slowly but surely the horizon seems widening and brightening. In answer to the four or five questions asked in No. 1013, the first issue after its temporary suspension, some hundreds of friends of LUCIFER'S work have spoken, in no uncertain tones, in regard to whether or not the paper should be continued, most of which responses have been accompanied by substantial toxens of the desire that the paper should live and not die. As to methods:

LUCIFER is not one of the Horse-leech's daughters, forever crying, "Give, give." If I may be allowed to speak for the policy of the paper in this regard, it is that no donations, as such, are asked or expected. Co-operation, sympathetic, fraternal co-operation, such as that voiced by the following letter, received a day or two ago, from a member of a prominent publishing firm in this city, is far more acceptable than would be a dollar or five dollars in the shape of direct donation without the accompanying names:

"Please send to the following addresses copies of last week's issue of LUCIFER, No. 1020, and mark with blue pencil the first article. The idea of man's being greater than animals because he has developed a social side of the sexual relations, is one of the greatest ideas that I have found recently. Am glad to take this opportunity to put it into the hands of thinking people. Send bill to us. Very cordially yours, E. B. B."

Here followed the names of sixteen persons scattered over a half dozen states, personal acquaintances, probably, of the sender.

Some of our subscribers send money and names for trial subscriptions of three months. A few ask that the paper be sent a year to some friend at the cost of the sender. Others send for copies of our pamphlet literature for gratuitous distribution, and occasionally a letter comes like this:

"In No. 1019 I note that Laura J. Langston of Paonia, Colo., is sick and almost helpless. I have written to her, and would now request that you send her bill to me for whatever she owes to you for LUCIFER and I will try and pay it for her. Allentown, Pa. R. S. Clymer, M. D."

Letters like this do much toward bringing about the era of universal brother-and-sisterhood, at the same time helping to keep alive the medium of communication, the white-winged evangel, LUCIFER, Son of the Morning, Harbinger of the Good Time Coming.

INCENTIVES TO ACTION.

Before closing I wish to redeem a promise made to a number of friends a few evenings since, at an informal "social" held at the home of LUCIFER. The guest of the evening was Jonathan Mayo Crane, now of New York, but for many years a resident of this city. The subject of discussion was Walt Whitman, poet and philosopher of the New Time. Naturally enough the talk drifted into a comparison of views in regard to incentives to action. Brother Crane gave a very clear statement of what is known as the materialistic philosophy as to man, his origin and his incentives to effort, namely, that we are all the product of causes dating back millions of centuries, perhaps, and that we are simply as we must be, and do as we must do. That, struggle as we may, we cannot escape this underlying law, this evolutionary force. Then giving his argument a personal turn the speaker continued in words like these:

"Contrary to this view Brother Harman thinks he is not one of the links in the chain of causes and effects. He thinks he can consciously step out, and, defying this natural law, this inexorable succession of antecedents and consequents, he can hew out a path for himself. Not content with the slow but sure march of evolutionary progress, he thinks he can make things move faster than they otherwise would do. While I honor his spirit, his courage, I think his philosophy unsound."

These are not the exact words of the good brother and faithful helper, but they express his argument fairly well, if I properly understood him.

When called upon to reply, I excused myself on the score of the lateness of the hour, but promised a brief reply in next LUCIFER. If my reason for declining to talk, the other evening, was a good one it is still better now, since the clock shows nearly 1 A. M. But nevertheless, here goes:

First, let it be understood to begin, that I know nothing of the "absolute"; nothing whatever of infinities, and nothing of the ultimates of life and of "being," and think it a waste of time and energy to try to grasp and to explain these. Whether there was a beginning of evolutionary progress, and whether there will ever be an end, I certainly do not know, but that there is such progress and that human beings may consciously hasten it or consciously retard it, I certainly do believe. If I did not so believe I would not make the effort I now do to produce a change for the better in human conditions and relations. I am part and parcel of evolution.

To illustrate: Time was, let us assume, when man knew nothing of navigation by water. The primitive savage, let us suppose, falling by accident into a raging torrent, saves himself from drowning by seizing hold of a drifting log. Without oars or even a pole to guide his log the man is little more than driftwood himself. Then by slow degrees and by the use of conscious intelligence the savage learns to guide the log in the direction he wants to go; then, after ages of conscious effort, he hollows out the log, by burning or by stone hatchets, or he constructs a canoe of birch-bark.

Here we have the crude beginning of the ocean-liner of today, that truly marvelous triumph of human skill, directed by conscious human will. By means of water-tight compartments, and by means of electric apparatus showing the approach of other vessels even in the thickest fog, and by means of thermometers that show the neighborhood of icebergs, the danger of shipwreck is reduced to a minimum, if not absolutely eliminated, making ocean travel safer than land travel, safer than living at home in the best of houses, because no cyclone or earthquake can destroy an ocean-liner, as it can destroy the strongest house ever built by man.

All this is the result of the exercise of conscious human intelligence, stimulated by desire to conquer the forces of nature and make them our servants.

By analogy we arrive at the conclusion that consciously intelligent human effort can hasten evolution on other lines, social, moralistic, political, economic—all other affairs affecting human happiness and longevity—much in the same way that consciously intelligent human effort has hastened evolution of the birch-bark canoe to the ocean-liner.

Whatever is desirable and conceivable may and will become the practical, the actual, given time enough, and this time may be shortened by fraternally sympathetic co-operation.

So, then, I am not willing to be driftwood on the stream of time.

I do not wait, Micawber-like, for "something to turn up." I mean, by the aid of LUCIFER'S readers and helpers, to consciously turn something up, and thus hasten the progress of human evolution, of human happiness and welfare.

"It matters not how straight the gate,
How charged with punishment the scroll;
I am the master of my fate,
I am the captain of my soul."

BOOKS RECEIVED.

A Sexual Creed. By L. J. L. Paper. Price 15c.

A bold, concise statement of the views of a radical on the sex question. While a Freethinker can write a creed only for himself, few sex radicals will, I think, differ from the conclusions so ably presented in A Sexual Creed.

The Problem of Life. By Albert Denser. Paper. Pp. 101. Price 25c. Belleview, Fla.

Mr. Denser attempts the justification of a belief in God, a unity of nature, an ideal and designed creation and a destiny to this life, and a belief in the divine mission and prophecy of Christ. On this foundation he erects an ideal Christian Democracy.

What Happened to Dan. By Kate Richards O'Hare. Paper. Pp. 63. Price 25c. Kansas City, Mo. Bird & Fletcher Ptg. Co.

An attempt to solve the problems of marriage, divorce, ignorance, child labor, race suicide, etc., on the basis of economic necessity. The book succeeds in showing the important part played by mercenary motives, but fails in attempting the solution of these questions without reference to factors other than economic.

What Imperialism Means to Women? By Lydia Kingsmill Commander. Paper. Pp. 12. Price 10c. Reprinted from Bellamy Review.

"The strident, harsh call of the cannon is 'Produce, Produce, that I may slay! Give, give, of the fruit of your body that I may feast!'—and women must bear and bear that the monster may be satisfied."

Vaccination Brought Home to You. By Dr. R. Swinburne Clymer. Paper. Pp. 92. Price, probably 25c. Terre Haute, Ind. G. H. Hebe.

A collection of anti-vaccination facts, arguments, and statistics. Just what you need for reference when writing to your newspaper to oppose the advocates of compulsory blood-poisoning.

Not Hypnotism But Suggestion. By Henry Harrison Brown. Paper. Pp. 59. Price 25c. San Francisco. "Now" Folk.

The term hypnotism is objected to as descriptive of the author's method of Soul Culture because the word connotes sleep and the subjection of the patient's will to that of the operator, neither of which is essential to suggestion, which is defined as "that which causes a sensation or a thought. A suggestion is anything used with an understanding of its power to produce a certain mental result when accepted by another person.

To Me, The Sound of Weeping. By Adeline Champney. Price 10c. Reprinted from the Arena.

This is a daintily written allegory of life and love and marriage. The author, Adeline Champney, is doing excellent work in bringing radical ideas before the conservative public. In the July issue of Physical Culture I find her name as the author of a radical story, "The Splash of Blood-Red Color on the Stair," a story exposing the injustice and misery of conventional marriage. Adeline Champney's style is marked by deep sympathy and freedom from affectation, but the dramatic climaxes are not strongly developd.

President Roosevelt's Gospel of Doom. By Lady Florence Dixie. Price 10c. Reprinted from London Times and Echo.

Lady Florence Dixie shows that large families are injurious to the mother, injurious to the child, and injurious to the community. She attributes Mr. Roosevelt's views on the subject to the influence of "Hebraic dispensations, effete and age-worn superstition."

First Class Men. By Freiherr Von Schlicht. Paper. Pp. 285. Price, about 50c. New York. M. Schnitzer Pub. Co.

A story of the attempt and failure of a young buergerlicher lieutenant to gain social recognition in an aristocratic regiment. The book was confiscated in Germany on account of its revelations concerning the snobbishness and depravity prevalent in the German army. As a novel it is as well written as any American novel, and has additional interest because it deals with actual conditions of the present day.

Any of the above books may be ordered from Lucifer.

JOHN E. BOULTENHOUSE.

VARIOUS VOICES.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

Henry E. Allen, Benton Harbor, Mich.—"The letter by A. Milo Bennet in your last issue I am responsible for, as I mailed you Mr. Bennett's name with others for sample copies. Our brief acquaintance with Mrs. B. led me to believe that she would appreciate a paper which in my judgment has done more for the uplift of women than any other periodical in America. 'A. Milo Bennett,' who wrote you the scurrilous letter, we have met but once, and from the tone of his letter we are not anxious for a second meeting.

"Mr. Bennett has no doubt been too busy exploiting the hard-worked members of the theatrical profession in his little 'agency' to read such authors as Edward Carpenter, Grant Allen, Havelock Ellis, John Stuart Mill, Miriam Wheeler Nicol, Bebel, Stockham, Haywood, and many others who have nobly stood for an unpopular and persecuted movement for freedom, justice and human rights. Otherwise, he would hardly care to publish his ignorance in such a coarse, brutal way, of a movement for race culture that claims for its advocates some of the best minds to be found to-day in the civilized world. I feel only pity and contempt for such people—pity for their narrowness and intolerance and contempt for their utter disregard for the rights and feelings of others. Mr. Bennett says he does not care to argue the case—such people never do. If Mr. Bennett had read the sample copies without prejudice he would have discovered that LUCIFER stands simply for equal human rights in all the relations of the sexes. Can Mr. Bennett, as a good citizen, as a gentleman, go against this humane and moral doctrine?"

H. C. Roberts, Bennington, Kan.—"The answer of M. C. W. to your inquiry why his voice and pen were no longer heard and used in defense of the principles for which LUCIFER has stood firm for more than a score of fateful years, is truly pathetic. After depicting sentiment as something out of place in the intercourse of human beings, he accepts an act of the most sentimental character on your part. No, LUCIFER'S work is not yet done. The cause for which LUCIFER contends is the most vital, nearest the heart of humanity, and the struggle has become more fierce and relentless as the years roll on."

Emeline A. Prescott, Maine.—"Yes; I can scatter as many circulars in these three cities as you wish. I enclose stamps (20 cents) towards paying for same."

J. C. Cameron, Soldiers' Home, Va.—"Your slips received and handed to parties who show some interest in sex reform. You can send on some more of same. I should like some copies of 'Woman's Burden,' if you have it as a leaflet, by Harriet M. Closcz. Also would like some copies of the leaflet, 'To Mothers,' by Charlotte Perkins Stetson. Enclosed find 25 cents in stamps for same. It is all I can send till 23d of this month. It is hard work to waken woman to a sense of her rights as race builder—her mind has been so dwarfed by theological nonsense, her whole physical and mental organism so degraded by long subjection to man's selfishly egotistical idea that he is her lord and master."

[The two foregoing letters are samples of responses we are receiving to the request recently made for co-operative help in distributing LUCIFER'S leaflet literature. If all would take hold of this method of widening the sphere of LUCIFER'S work, as a comparative few have done, it would mean such an increase of inquiry along the lines of bed-rock reform as was never perhaps known before.]

G. M. Faber, Press Writer, 516, Los Angeles, Cal.—"It seems to me to be a fact (whether you realize it or not) that you are rightly named. You are apparently the 'Moses' to lead the children of the twentieth century out of the superstitious ideas of the past and present, in regard to sexology, the needs, wants, desires, of human nature. A volume might be written upon this question, and had I the time and you the space I would speak my little piece freely, whether any other human being thinks as I do or not; but as your space is limited I will not burden you or your readers with a lengthy screed. I have filled an editorial chair myself, and realize that 'brevity is the soul of wit.'

"Your August 4 number is filled with thoughts which ought to be digested by every liberal, sensible man and women. There are no questions too indelicate to be discussed, such as, Should a man or woman be considered degenerate who satisfies moderately every desire of nature, desire for food, drink, and the sexual instinct? Is not one desire as pure and good as another, when health and happiness are considered? Everyone must answer these questions for themselves, even that old reprobate, Comstock, is welcome to his own opinion.

"If I were to formulate a motto it would be something like this: Every human being should be endowed with the civil right to seek his or her highest happiness in their own way, provided they do not trespass upon the rights of another. LUCIFER is doing a good work toward that end, therefore and enclosed $1.00 to help the cause along."

[Many thanks, Brother Taber. Sorry I did not meet you during my recent sojourn in the City of the Angels. Shall be glad to hear from you again and often. Glad to know that the list of LUCIFER'S friends and helpers is growing on the Pacific coast. Have you made the acquaintance of the "Light Bearer Club" of Los Angeles? Slowly but surely we are getting the names and co-operation of members of that most effective of all the agencies of radical reform, the American Press Writers' Association. LUCIFER was one of the very first to urge the formation of this now international association of advanced thinkers and workers.—M. H.]

Dr. H. W. Scalfe, Eden, Colo.—"Enclosed is 25 cents. I have received several sample copies of LUCIFER and always read. Though not much interested in the cause you are assisting, I know there must be some value in it or a man of your merit and character would not spend a lifetime in fighting its battles. I wish you all the success your persistence deserves."

Chas. Roland, Washington, D. C.—"Glad to get your paper. Enclosed find postoffice money order for $1.00 for subscription. After awhile, when I am a little better fixed, I will send for some books. Would like to know where I could get some books treating on that primitive form of religion known as Phallic worship. Any information as to where I could get these books would be gratefully received."

[Books on Phallic worship can probably be obtained from E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d street, New York City.]

LUCIFER'S SUSTAINING FUND.

The personal appeal which I sent out to certain friends of LUCIFER last May, asking for contributions to a fund to sustain the paper, did not bring forth the response which I had expected. I hoped that at least $1,000 would be raised for the fund. The contributions made, so far as I have any record of them, were as follows: H. B., $10; E. P. B., $5; H. H., $5; A. W., $10; J. F. P., $10; H. V. K., $1; E. K., $1; J. W. L., $1; D. G., $1, and $1 from some person whose name I have mislaid. Others in response to my appeal sent money direct to Moses Harman. Others have promised to make contributions later, but the amount contributed and the amount pledged is much less than $1,000. Many persons, I know, who wished to contribute were financially unable. Others doubtless intended to contribute and have neglected to do so. Still others, perhaps, did not contribute because they supposed the desired $1,000 had already been raised.

It is unfortunate that so many liberals are liberal only in name. While churches can be built by thousands, and while millions of dollars are contributed every year for the support of religious superstition, it is difficult for a free thought paper to continue its existence.

Again I say, it seems to me that every sincere friend of LUCIFER should be willing to contribute, and should contribute for its support, at least one day's income every year. If every friend of the paper would do that, LUCIFER could be enlarged to 16 pages and published once a week instead of fortnightly.

J. M. CRANE.

R. H. Walker, 1903 St. Louis, avenue, St. Louis, Mo.—"The name, price and general conduct of LUCIFER I consider all that could be desired under present conditions. I hope to be able to read it as long as it will be published. I enclose a money order for $2.00 to pay for a small ad, announcing that I have pleasant rooms to rent to LUCIFER's readers who may visit the Fair, and desire a comfortable place to sleep. We have large, cool, connecting and single rooms. Special rates to parties."

[The ad seems mislaid, but I can say, from personal knowledge of R. H. Walker, that I have full confidence in what he says in regard to his rooms, and if I should need rooms for myself or friends at St. Louis I would go to his place before engaging rooms elsewhere.—M. H.]

Subscribers who receive more than one copy of Lucifer, when not ordered, will please use the extra copy or copies to induce their friends to subscribe, if only for a trial trip of three months for 25 cents. Stamps received in payment. As the paper weighs less than one ounce a copy can sent to a friend in a common 2 cent letter, with an ordinary sized sheet of note paper.

MISCELLANEOUS.

WANTED—A woman who is liberal and educated for a correspondent. Qualifications: Maiden, blonde, age 16 to 32. I am a bachelor, brunette, age 34; object, free marriage soon. Send your personal description, likes and dislikes, in your first letter. Photos exchanged. All letters answered. Eustace E. Southard, Eagleport, O. R. F. D.

A STUFFED CLUB.—$1.00 a year, 10 cents a month. A monthly periodical teaching HEALTH of BODY and MIND by knocking the stuffing out of religious and medical superstition. For those who can think and are not afraid to think. It is the Club's intention to be constructive as well as destructive. Address A Stuffed Club, Denver, Colo.

WHAT HAPPENED TO DAN.

The deepest, most sane and sensible discussion of the problems of marriage, divorce and race suicide that has yet been produced. The author goes to the seat of the ulcer with the exquisite touch but exact precision of the skilled surgeon. A book that lays bare the abuses of our present system with a fidelity true to life, and yet with style so pure and delicate that none can take offense. Price 25 cents. Address Kate Richards O'Hare, Rosedale, Kas.

THE RIGHT TO BE BORN WELL.

Of all the impediments that prevent the practicalization of the right to be born well the present popular standards of sexual virtue are perhaps the most effective, most michievous, as well as hardest to remove.

Even the average freethinker, including Spiritualists, Atheists, Agnostics, Theosophists, etc.,—most of whom have shaken off the chains of bondage to theologic superstitions, such as "Fall of Man," "Total Depravity," "Blood Atonement," "Election and Reprobation," and the like—still are slaves to the superstition that "virtue," "purity," goodness, in the sex-relations of human beings depend upon authority, permission, granted by an officer of the "law," civil or canon law or both.

A most pathetic instance of inability of the average freethinker to emancipate himself or herself from the yoke of sex superstition, marriage superstition, is seen in the subjoined letter, which is given in nearly the exact words of the writer, name, date, postoffice and all:

"Etna, Mont., Sept. 4, 1904. Editor Lucifer: A sample copy of your paper causes me a heartbeat of hope in the midst of deep sorrow.

"I believe you are on the track of the great evil that, gnawing at our nation's vitals, threatens its very life.

"I believe that the chief cause of the terrible increase of vice and of heartlessness rampant to-day, and expressed in the violent conflict 'twixt labor and capital, is that a 'stone' (a lie!) is given our children when they ask for the bread of truth.

"I believe that the whole of religion is encompassed by the circle bounding the social relations, and that the savior of mankind is, or may be, civil law.

"I believe that the silence maintained with regard to the sexual relation, in the early teaching of children, is an error so patent, as well as so fatal, that our civilization should blush to acknowledge its responsibility therefor.

"I believe that children should be taught that the most holy, most sacred things on earth, in heaven, in time or eternity, are their own bodies and their word of honor.

"I was taught morality on the orthodox foundation. When eighteen years of age my reason tore down this foundation. From the fount of enlightenment found in the writings of Thomas Paine and Robert Ingersoll I drank with the eagerness of one perishing with thirst.

"These two writers first taught me the folly of blindly believing the creed my blessed mother taught me; the creed which until that time had been my strong defense in the hour of temptation.

"At twenty, faith being gone, Reason led me fearless to the portals of death. I entered, and my happiness, my welfare, died when my virtue was wrecked.

"Today, at the age of four and forty, a widowed mother of a five-year-old girl, I am confronted with these questions:

"How shall I teach my child?

"What shall I teach my child?

"How shall I so train my only one, my more than life, my more than soul, that she shall be safe from the dangers that encompassed and ruined me?

"Send me your paper for a year. Send me your catalogues; send me words of wisdom, of hope, of encouragement, for I have but one ambition in life, namely, to answer wisely the queries with which I am confronted—the queries before which all other interests in life, in death, in earth, in heaven, in past, present and future, pale as does the moon when sunlight floods the vision —how, what, when shall I teach my daughter?

"Of one thing I am sure, am positive: It is a greater shame to be unworthy the trust society places in me than it is to be guilty of adultery!

"I mean this: The shame, the disgrace, lies not in the fact that adultery has been committed, the consequences of which act must be borne by the womb-man alone, but that the sacred trust reposed in the individual has been broken by two; therefore these two are equally disgraced because they are law-breakers, and not because they have cohabited!

"I shall teach my child that love is her savior; that Honor is the savior of the love, and hence—well, I am talking too much for a first letter.

"I hope to become a regular correspondent, an ardent supporter and worker for your frank and fearless little paper. I have much, oh, very much to tell your readers, not of theories, but of life—of living facts, of facts lived, that will cause them to see your paper as I see it to be—the daring, fearless, earnest, needed little bloodhound on the track of—the devil!

"God speed it! God bless it, and God (in humanity) save our children!

"Friends, help me! Write to me; join hands with me; together let us hunt for salvation on earth for—my baby girl. For her sake I ask it, not for God's sake. God can take care of him-, her- or itself. Our babies are ours to plead for, ours to work for.

"Your fellow student,
"HELEN PHILBRICK."

Paul said: "For I was alive without the law once; but when the commandment came, sin revived and I died." Does not this saying fittingly describe the mental condition of our correspondent, when she says, "reason led me fearless to the portals of death"?

If Helen Philbrick had been guided by reason in social conduct as she was in religious matters, would she not have seen that what church and "society" call "adultery" is not necessarily "sin" or degradation, but that, on the contrary, it might be the highest virtue?

Would she not have seen and known that no woman is "ruined" until she herself considers herself ruined?

Did our conscience-smitten friend ever hear of the saying, "To thine own self be true, and then it follows as the night the day, thou canst not be untrue to any man," nor to the aggregation called "society"—of which ogre she seems to live in perpetual terror?

Like thousands more who believe themselves freethinkers, Helen Philbrick is emancipated only in part. The chains of social or sexual superstition still enthrall her. The inherited dogma that "law," civil law, can make an act good and virtuous that would, without its sanction, be impure and sinful, is even more irrational, even more enslaving, than is belief in the bankrupt atonement doctrine, taught and believed by all orthodox Christians—destroying the happiness of the devotee to that dogma in countless thousands of cases, and, worst of all, saddest of all, making it simply impossible that countless thousands of children that are born, can or will be born well.

In the September Arena (Boston), under the head, "First Cause of Divorce," by Winnifred Harper Cooley, occurs the following instance of the working of the orthodox standards of "virtue" in sex life:

"The writer once knew a 'happy, old-fashioned family.' The man was a prominent judge, 'of excellent habits.' They had eleven children, out of which seven died early, and one 'went to the bad.' The woman had married at fifteen. A year after her marriage she went to her father and begged him on her knees to receive her at home, promising to do the work of a servant. Shocked and severe, he sent her back to the husband she had promised to obey. After this she had eleven children by the man whom she dreaded and despised. People considered their home a typical happy household, and a separation would have caused a sensation and been regarded as a family disgrace; yet no one in that day would have considered it a social crime to propagate that family, nor would any considerable number of people have cared to openly confess compassion for the woman's daily crucifixion."

How many of my readers can recall to mind instances that would parallel this terrible impeachment of popular standards of sex morality. I once lived near a couple who had been married twenty years. Though not particularly bright in intellect they were above the average in that respect, and in their ability to make a good living and comfortable home. They lived happily together so far as the outside world knew, but no children were born alive. Eleven miscarriages, or still-born children, told the story of non-adaptation, of failure of the most important purpose for which homes are founded, the borning and rearing of children. As in the case quoted from the Arena, "a separation would have caused a sensation and been regarded as a family disgrace," to say nothing of the dishonor brought upon the institution whose talisman is: "Whom God hath joined, let no man put asunder."

I have more than once related the case of the Kansas couple (the male partner whereof was a prominent freethinker) of whose nine children seven were hopeless imbeciles, born with life enough to live many years a perpetual burden to themselves, their parents and friends. The other two children were far below mediocrity. In this case also "a separation would have caused a sensation and been regarded as a family disgrace," and thus this intellectual and highly respectable pair went on, year after year, committing the social and physiologic crime of propagating a family of imbeciles. The last time I met Major ——— he was on his way to visit two of his children, who at that time were inmates of an institution founded and kept up for the care of such unfortunates.

Thus does "society" build asylums, supported by compulsory upon the shores of mortal life by its most cherished, most sacred "joss," the marital institution.

THE LOUISIANA PURCHASE EXPOSITION.

Most Americans will compare the World's Fair with the Columbian Exposition of Chicago, and considering the time which has elapsed since the latter event, and the natural expectation of progress of improvement, the more critical are likely to meet with a certain amount of disappointment. Using the standard referred to, the ensemble of buildings seems to lack that unity and proportion which characterized the Court of Honor. The attractions of the lake could not be duplicated, and the electric fountains and the Wooded Island are missed perhaps chiefly because there are no other distinctive features to take their place. The parade ground is a discord in the color scheme and gives an unfinished effect, while the immense signboard of the Tyrolean Alps, completing the panorama, is a blemish of different yet typically American kind. The beautiful and richly ornamented Festival Hall is approached by two paths of the same objectionable color as the parade ground, and this building as well as the rotunda of state figures on either side, distinctly the handsomest architectural feature, might have been still more effective without the variegated and restless flower beds. The German Building, also, does not harmonize either in color or style, although it re-emburses by its interior.

To those who place beauty above utility, the departments of Arts and Sculpture will appear the most satisfying. Even here, however, the thrifty desire to turn golden moments into small change was in evidence. The timid visitor received careful instruction from the voluble lady attendant to the effect that it was impossible to enjoy an exhibition of this nature without a catalogue giving the artist's name, age and possibly the color of his hair, while another fair representative of what the writer always understood to be the modest sex, flitted through the rooms boldly offering "the last catalogue left," and this to visitors who had just passed stacks of them at the door.

The attractions of the Pike, which may equal but hardly surpass those of Coney Island, need not greatly concern any but those who enjoy the study of human nature, and that other large class who spend money merely for the love of the spending. Novelties of any kind seem to be particularly scarce. What was to have been the distinguishing feature of the Fair, the airship concourse, has received somewhat of a setback by Santos-Dumont's departure. As yet there are no airships, and that part of the grounds is deserted to the extent that the mere meeting with a human fellow being is an occasion of congratulation and joy. Physical culturists, also expatriated to this section, are in part disappointed that the exhibition should be so largely confined to competitive sport, deeming that this particular trait of American character is already sufficiently prominent. Bernarr McFadden well voices the sentiment in hoping that some day there would be a Fair which should not show what man does, but what he is. As an item of interest in this connection it may be stated that the nude in art and sculpture seems to have been handled with greater freedom than one could heretofore observe.

The expense of viewing the Fair, has, as usual, been grossly exaggerated. Desirable rooms can be found at from $3 per week upward, and there are several restaurants on the Battle Creek plan, at at least one of which attractive meals are served at from 1 cent per dish up. On the Fair grounds opportunities are less favorable, and an entire absence of fruit is especially noticeable. That a view of the Fair may be obtained in a week, without danger of either surfeit or bankruptcy, your correspondent proved to his own satisfaction by buying a pair of duck trousers and abandoning its attractions for those of a river excursion boat, where he was promptly mistaken for the captain, and extensively interviewed as to the carrying capacity of the boat and its passengers. He is now visiting the very interesting industrial settlement at LeClaire, where he finds variety in giving concerts, dishwashing and discussing Herbert Spencer with the cook. Yours truly,

OSCAR SCHLEIF.

SEXUAL AUTOCRACY.

Nature made man a sexual autocrat. He cannot be forced to enter the sex relation, consequently without his consent there could be no such relation. Mrs. Champney says: "Not to the degradation of woman to a sexu-autocracy." I cannot understand what she means. If woman is conceded the full right to her own person, then she, too, will become a sexual autocrat—that is, there could be no such relation without her consent, but would that be degradation? She has never risen to that plane yet. She may not do what she pleases with herself. She must ask church, state and Mother Grundy, and if she dares to go contrary to their dictum she is counted accursed.

Surely, no sex reformer, man or woman, will claim that a man has a right to a woman's person without her full and free consent, and again I say, she would then be a sex autocrat, in that there could be no sex relation without her consent. When she rises to that plane, the sexes will be equal autocrats, but there will be no degradation therein. LOIS WAISBROOKER.

Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., of 120 Lexington avenue, New York City, treasurer of the Free Speech League, informs us that he has a number of copies of Darrow's Brief on the Turner case, for sale at 50 cents each, and postage, 10c. It is a strong and instructive book, although it failed to influence the Supreme Court. No doubt there are many among Lucifer readers who would value this book and utilize its historical research. The proceeds of sale of this work will, presumably, be applied to helping pay the expenses of the Free Speech League.

Failure is only another name for success to men that are willing to wait and work for their success. There was probably never a great success of a permanent nature in this world that did not begin with a failure.

HERTZKA'S "FREELAND."

My Dear Mr. Harman: In reply to your request in Lucifer asking me to give a resume of Freeland I would say that it would be impossible to give Dr. Hertzka's scheme in "a brief statement." I am afraid that even the reading of "Freeland" would only give a surface view to most readers. But if what I say here will make intending colonizers investigate further, I will feel more than repaid for my effort.

Hertzka has raised the idea of colonization from a sheer Utopia to the firm basis of scientific certitude by invoking the aid of economics and thus solving the two primal problems of efficiency and security. He noticed that a low rate of wages is uniformly accompanied by low efficiency, lack of mechanical development, the prevalence of dwarf industries and low productive power (see statistics of China, Japan, Russia, Spain, etc.); while a high rate of wages is uniformly accompanied by high efficiency, great mechanical development, checking of dwarf industries and great productive power (see statistics of Australia, United States, Canada, England, etc.).

The cause of these phenomena is that the lower wages are, the higher must be rent, interest, profit and taxes, and labor-saving machines must consequently yield more tribute in low wage countries than in high wage countries. If this is true, reasons Dr. Hertzka, then when wages equal the total product, every labor-saving machine will be, aye, must be used. A co-operative colony that guaranteed to labor its total product as wages would increase the productivity, efficiency, etc., of its members above those of high wage countries the same as these do over low wage countries. This would enable colonists to "sell" the market. Labor in Freeland would receive more in wages than slaveland divides as wages, rent, interest, profit and taxes, and yet sell its goods cheaper than monopolists can.

This will draw to Freeland the most intelligent part of the labor population until it would seriously affect the labor market in slaveland, compelling a general rise in wages if monopolists desired to retain their laborers and a lowering in prices to enable them to retain their markets. If these two tendencies continued, price and cost would soon be equal and the reason for monopoly, as well as monopoly itself, would disappear, just as when the reasons for cannibalism, slavery and serfdom ceased, these disappeared.

But there is another difficulty. Low wage countries have no over production, no unemployed problems and no industrial panics, while high wage countries have them in the ratio of the height of their wage rate. A colony would have to start sufficiently large (say 1,000 members) to secure it from the adverse effects of the uneconomic and unsocial conditions existing around them. They would have to be economically (though not geographically) isolated, in the sense that outside market conditions would not affect them. They would have to have a sufficient variety of industries to make them independent by producing for each other, and thus creating a home market. In this way they insure security as well as efficiency. Colonies would thus become the means of solving the social problem, the highway during the transition period from slaveland to Freeland, by possessing elements of economic and competitive advantages over monopolists.

To solve theoretical problems, however, is only a part of the work. To so organize a colony as to insure a maximum of efficiency and safety within the limits of equal freedom without sacrificing industrial discipline has been the dream of all who have planned social betterment, but Dr. Theodore Hertzka was the first who did this in such a way as to make it of immediate application to small as well as large commonwealths without basing it on a hypothetical change in human nature. His plan of organization is simple, natural and practical. Here it is in a nutshell:

Imagine a thousand individuals with $500,000, arrived in a location richly endowed in natural resources such as iron, coal, (or water power), fertile soil, etc., as the Puget Sound district of Washington or the southwesern portion of California for instance. They establish three departments and as many more as they think will be useful but not less than three—the central bank, the central warehouse and the central statistical departments. The central bank keeps and clears the accounts of all those who do business in Freeland. All goods are bought and sold at the central warehouse and the statistical department furnishes the community and its members with detailed and tabulated information about wages, production, fertility, etc., so that any workman can at any time determine for himself what work and pay will best suit his taste and capacity.

All other functions are performed by individuals or voluntary associations. The Freeland shoe manufacturing association organizes with, say, 50 members, obtains a credit at the bank of $15,000, which is to be repaid in annual installments without interest in such time as the borrowed capital is estimated to last. They proceed to order their buildings, machinery and raw material from the various associations, organized similarly to themselves. These are credited at the bank for what they do, and the Freeland Shoe Manufacturing Company charged with it. When the shoes are made, they are sold at the warehouse and those that buy them are charged while the Freeland Shoe Manufacturing Company is credited with the amount, and thus the circle of exchange is completed.

The rules of the association are few, but complete. Any one may join or leave any one or any number of associations, but the majority (of members, not workers) determine who shall be employed, the rates of wages, etc. Remuneration is based on labor performed, reckoned in number of hours worked; older members, skilled labor and managers to receive a premium or higher rate according to a voluntary arrangement with each individual concerned. Fifty per cent of last year's average product is advanced to all laborers and profits at the end of the year are divided in proportion to the rate of wages. Liability of each member holds till he leaves the association and is to be paid in proportion to wages received. The majority of members (not workers) is the highest authority and all officers, auditors, etc., are subject to the recall initiative and referendum of the general assembly.

The main principles of Freeland are the following: Elimination of all business and trade secrets; free mobilization of labor from group to group, or the "open group" system of land tenure; unlimited competition; the elimination of usury from all economic processes, by furnishing land free of rent and capital free of interest, thus insuring the highest efficiency within the limits of progress; the right of every individual to the undiminished product of his labor as wages; a guarantee of the maximum of liberty compatible with the equality of liberty to each member in all his social, economic and private life, thus securing individualism.

Dr. Hertzka has many other proposals which do not rise to the dignity of principles, but which may be adopted. He has a system of old age insurance, maintenance of women, children and the disabled; a most thorough and far reaching system of public education; free transportation of persons and free telephone, telegraph and mail service, etc. The money for all this, as well as for the accumulation of capital, is raised by tax on the net incomes of all laborers, the only just tax in a community where labor is the only source of income—for the height of the incomes depends on the efficiency of labor due to the aids furnished by the commonwealth through expending this tax. The tax constitutes about 35 per cent of all net incomes.

What differentiates Freeland even from the most liberal authoritarian socialism is the right of each individual to secede without leaving the confines of the community. Secession would consist in not keeping an account at the bank, for Freeland is not a state in any sense of the term. For those who would secede, the optional single tax could be adopted. Any one who wished to work in a "closed group" could do so by voluntarily agreeing to pay for the use of any location as much as he thought would prevent others from desiring the same location and in consideration of this the community would make his bid a charge on that land and thus protect him in his exclusive occupancy. Communists could practice communism among themselves by keeping a communal account at the bank and drawing on it as a community.

In this way I believe Freeland would meet all practical requirements, and while not free from minor faults, which would tend to become a constantly diminishing factor, it is certainly the most plausible, consistent, logical and admirable scheme that was ever submitted. Freeland carries within itself the seed of social regeneration and while it would secure to its members the highest material advantages, its highest claim to careful consideration rests on its universal adaptability. If started and carried out with tact and intelligence by a sufficiently large number of co-operators who are not entirely without means they would influence the economic, social and political life of the whole nation within ten years. BRIEF COMMENT.

ECONOMIC INDEPENDENCE FIRST.

Not wishing to forestall or anticipate the answers that may be coming from R. B. Kerr and others, to the letter of our old-time friend, Alfred B. Westrup, formerly of Chicago, now of Havana, Cuba (see "Voices" column), it seems to me the logic of said letter is faulty. "Since our economic condition is what prevents Free Love," etc., says our Cuban friend, thus assuming as proved, or, at least, as admitted, one of the chief points in the controversy.

To some of us it seems more nearly correct to say that the sex-enslavement of woman is what prevents economic freedom, than it is to say that our economic enslavement is what prevents freedom in love; that is, prevents the emancipation of womanhood and motherhood, including the right of the child to be born well. That there is much of truth in both these lines of argument is freely admitted. Sex reform and economic reform must proceed together, and neither can achieve final triumph unaided by the other, but the question as to which of these takes precedence in the order of nature, in degree of importance, or in point of practicability without waiting for the full triumph of the other, is something upon which there is wide divergence of honest opinion. Meantime it strikes me that the use of dogmatic assumptions—such as "totally blind," "money system the (sole) cause of poverty," etc., are not the best evidence of the possession of superior wisdom. All admit that our "money of privilege," our legal tender money system, is one of the chief methods by which the masses of mankind of both sexes are robbed of their birthright, but that this is the only instrument of robbery and enslavement is true only to him who gives his attention so closely to the subject of finance that he has neither time, patience nor inclination to devote to the consideration of other factors in the great socio-religio-political problem.

SEX RADICALISM.

For obvious reasons I seldom venture to say much of the merits or demerits of the various articles contributed to Lucifer's columns, preferring to allow each article to stand or fall upon its own merits, in the arena of conflict, rather than to show favoritism by editorial discrimination.

In the case of the series of articles entitled "Sex Radicalism," by Dora Forster, I think it right and proper to say that our readers would do well to preserve the papers containing this very carefully prepared series, which has now reached number five, with more coming, so as to be able to read the whole as one essay, all the parts being closely related and interdependent.

If I could have foreseen the extent of this remarkable contribution to the literature of sex freedom I certainly should have taken steps—with the consent of the author—to hold the type of the several parts till all were published, so that a pamphlet might be cheaply made of the whole. As I see it, few if any continued series of articles have ever appeared in Lucifer more worthy of preservation in permanent form than are the chapters thus far published on "Sex Radicalism."

COLONIZATION.

Some months ago I promised a "Colony number," but have never yet found the time to properly prepare the matter for such number. For some weeks we have had in type part of the proposed number, in shape of an extended article by Alexander Horr, printed in this issue, giving some account of the scheme proposed by Dr. Hertzke, and described at length in his book, entitled "Freeland."

Mr. Horr is now in Chicago, on his way to Puget Sound, where he hopes to be able soon to put the plan of Dr. Hertzke to the test of trial. Our readers who may wish something more definite in regard to Mr. Horr's plans can address him at Lake Bay, Wash., or through this office.

In next Lucifer will probably appear a further review of Dr. Hertzke's book, a volume of some 400 pages, lately issued from the press of the Freeland Publishing Company, of New York. M. H.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Libra Dawn, or Dawn of Liberty. A sequel to Cupid's Yokes. By Marie L. Follett. In her preface the author says:

"I bring to the work a strong desire and painfully earnest purpose to stir up a grand awakening upon an imperfectly understood, yet all important subject. I write and publish this true delineation of human bondage in the same spirit evinced by Harriet Beecher Stowe, when, impressed by the divine spirit of freedom, she produced 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' hoping thereby to become instrumental in the emancipation from slavery of the negro race. The most impossible characters are taken from real life; the most horrible scenes are descriptions of actual occurrences; the foundation and framework are unvarnished truths, while the finishings and embellishments (of Libra Dawn) alone are fiction."

I am not a writer of stories, have no genius or talent in that direction, and therefore am not qualified for the office of critic of books in this line. Will say, however, that while I can see many defects in the literary make-up of the book, I am in hearty sympathy with its leading object or purpose, which purpose is voiced, so far as a very imperfect examination allows me to judge, in the two following paragraphs:

"The day is not far distant (and we hereby appeal to all that is noble and true in humanity, and to the divine spirit of progress, to hasten the time) when all pure-minded, genuine advocates of temperance in all things will deem it a more flagrant outrage against nature and morality to furnish a couple with a marriage license than is now thought by honest, radical prohibitionists to issue a license for the sale of that which 'biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder.' If a certain course of action is right, it is right without leave or license; if wrong, no amount of license or ceremony can make it right.

"Founded on the supposition that man's love is naturally ferocious, marriage attempts by legal means to furnish food for his savage nature; and we have but to open doors and windows, and lift the roofs of respectable houses to find the skeletons, both male and female, of its victims. It is because the marriage theory is both unnatural and barbarous that it works out such shocking results. Advocates of marriage cling to the exploded doctrine of natural depravity; and freethinkers, spiritualists and atheists, who scout theological perdition, think these social hells of permanent necessity in human life. Nowhere does the human intellect so disgrace itself as in its cowardly, skulking and hypocritical attitude in presence of sexual reform."

Is this indictment against the human intellect—against "freethinkers, spiritualists and atheists"—too severe, too sweeping? I think not. I think the impeachment a just one, and most sincerely do I thank Marie Follett for her brave assault upon the breastworks of the last stronghold of orthodox theology, the marriage superstition—as voiced in the sentence said to have issued from the mouth of "the judge of all the earth": "Thy desire shall be thy husband and he shall rule over thee," and also in the oracles of Paul, the great "apostle to the Gentiles," the real founder of the Christian religion, such as: "Wives, submit yourselves to your own husbands, as unto the Lord;" "the husband is the head of the wife, as Christ is the head of the church;" "the head of man is Christ, the head of woman is man;" "let the woman learn in silence with all subjection;" "Adam was first formed, then Eve" (an afterthought!); "Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression," etc., etc., ad nauseam!

Again I say, thanks, honor and welcome to Marie L. Follett and her book.

Libra Dawn is a volume of 227 pages, price not stated, but presumably 50 cents paper bound and 75 cents cloth. Address the author, Leclaire, Iowa, or this office.

Who Is Responsible for the Colorado Trouble? By Joseph Shatzke, Colorado Springs, Colo. In his introduction the author says:

"This pamphlet has been written by a close observer, by a man who never belonged to any union or to any Citizens' Alliance, in fact, I do not like to belong to any organization who keep their doors closed. But I always take the part of the oppressed. I do not like to see any violence. I want to say more, I do not believe in forcible resistance. . . . . I write the following without prejudice to either side and hope the reader will be the judge and the American people see that such lawlessness and mob law be abolished, and law and order, liberty and justice, be established."

This pamphlet of twelve large closely printed pages was very evidently written by a man who is little acquainted with English idioms, consequently it will not receive the respectful attention its matter and evident earnestness of the author entitle it to. However, the brief statement of the facts bearing upon the question of "Who is responsible for the Colorado trouble?" accords well with the statements of many others, resident in that state, and therefore I recommend Brother Shatzke's pamphlet to the readers of Lucifer, notwithstanding its many imperfections from a literary and mechanical point of view. No price is given, but it can be had from this office, while the supply lasts, at 5 cents per copy. M. H.

Prophylaxis Sexualis. By Lip Tay. Paper. Pp. 391. Price 10 francs. Paris, France. A. B. De Lip Tay, 26 Bd Poissonniere.

This French work is a clear, practical treatise on the avoidance of sexual evils. It contains chapters on such topics as sexual anatomy and physiology, venereal diseases, morals, malthusianism, preventive checks, etc. It is not procurable in this country unless ordered direct from publishers, owing to its detailed description of contraceptis. I would translate the book and publish it were it not for the laws passed by conceited busybodies who think they know better than I what the public need to read. That the book cannot be sold in this country is a striking commentary on the comparative degree of human freedom in the United States and France.

Perfect Humanhood. By Agnes N. Benham. Cloth. Price $1.25. Adelaide, S. Australia.

A radical discussion of love and passion, marriage and the borning of first class babies. She shows how essential passion is to human existence, pictures the monsters of vice and heartlessness which follow in the trail of institutional marriage, and teaches the responsibility of parenthood. I predict a large sale of this book, for the ability of the author raises her far above the level of the average writer on sex topics.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

Joshua Harman, Jacksboro, Texas.—"Glad you are still able to battle for the right. It is well that you have the gift of continuance—inherited, as I think, from both father and mother, else you would have failed. It is my opinion, however, that you would accomplish more good if you would not undertake so much. Life is too short; time too precious. You cannot afford to teach the people the origin of words. One reason that Ingersoll accomplished so much was that he did not undertake too much. If he had dabbled with everything he would have accomplished nothing—comparatively speaking. Do not back down from your principles, but don't try to educate people in the meaning of words. The sex question is your specialty, and that has nothing to do with the word Lucifer. You want to take the battering ram of truth and smash the walls of ignorance and superstition.

"As I am able to do so little it does not become me to advise. I am too big a coward to do much. Have a great many copies of Lucifer on hand that I could distribute, but am afraid to do so. Have loaned many books, and these have made some converts, but not one of them is helping me to spread the light. So you see they are worse cowards than I am. Send me a few copies of 'Prodigal Daughter' and 'Facts Worth Knowing.' If they want to kill me for distributing these, let them kill. This is our fourth year of Growth. I am not able to work much, but here is a dollar for the books just named. It will not do to be a mere cipher in the world."

Dr. Geo. Hardcastle, San Francisco, Cal.—"Will gladly distribute 'slips' you speak of. Thanks for the 'trade' you have made with me—it is all right, and besides, your greater compensation is coming later. Have but a moment to spare now, so must be brief. The wise man goes to the dictionary for definitions and to his school books for synonyms, and amongst the latter perhaps may be found the words 'devil,' 'satan,' 'lucifer,' as meaning one and the same thing. A million readers, taken as they run, have this understanding of their meaning, with only here and there an exception to the rule. The logic of the matter is: Any name that necessitates session after session of a 'debating club' to determine its significance is about the very last that should be adopted by a would-be successful reformer."

Tom Swinburn, Charleston, W. Va.—"I have never answered the questions asked some time ago, but want to say now that in my judgment Lucifer is the more effective part of the name. While some might turn away from it, more would be struck by so odd a title, and read from curiosity to see what there might be under it. Then, of course, the subject and its treatment would decide them. Stick to Lucifer. . . . I enclose one dollar, for which send me an additional copy, for as long as it will reach. I should like to have it include back numbers from the last start, after the suspension. I think I shall get a permanent subscriber."

Jacob B. Daisy, Charleston, Ill.—"I received a copy of Lucifer dated May 26. I believe it one of the best papers published in this country, because it opposes tyranny of all sorts—including vaccination, vivisection, cruelty to women, children and animals.

"To the questions you asked: 1. Yes. 2. In the United States. 3. Lucifer, the Light Bearer. 4. One dollar per year. 5. Weekly. Can I get the numbers I have missed since I was cut off last fall? I always want Lucifer, the Light Bearer. Do you have extra files away back for several years? If so, at what price can they be obtained? You don't know how lonely I feel without Lucifer. It seems like meeting and conversing with a dear friend every week. Is Free Society still published?

"I don't see why all the Biblical bulls (of Bashan?) are so bitter against you. One of these stopped in my house last spring and seeing a copy of Lucifer on the bed, drew his worthless carcass away as though the paper were a rattlesnake; then began to ridicule it, and when I headed him off, he got angry and left the house. I was glad."

(Yes, the missed numbers can be had, all, I think, except number 1,069, which was destroyed by order of the postal authorities, acting, presumably, under orders from headquarters of the Modern Inquisition in New York, the "Society for the Prevention of Vice," so-called. As the P. O. department is simply a public carrier and not a censor of morals, politics or religion, it is reasonable to infer that No. 1,069 of Lucifer was destroyed at the command of irresponsible persons, of those who without rightful authority assume the right of deciding upon the character of matter deposited with the post office for mailing. Files of Lucifer for several years back can be had for one dollar—52 numbers—but cannot promise that they will all be consecutive issues, or that each volume, for several years back, will be complete. We have bound volumes, complete, in cloth, for the years 1899, 1900 and 1901, price each, $1.50. Postage or expressage, 25c. Free Society is published at 220 E. 4th street, New York city.—M. H.)

Joseph Steiner, Washington, D. C., No. 18, Treasury Department.—"In view of the severe ordeal through which Lucifer has had to pass and the financial straits in which the paper finds itself, I am really ashamed to confess myself compelled to restrict my enclosure to a renewal of my subscription, which I see has about expired. The reason for my inability to contribute as liberally as I could wish, is that of prolonged sickness, loss of time and money, together with heavy doctor's bills. You know what that means. Wish I could do better, but cannot, and my earnest hope is that those of Lucifer's friends who are well-to-do (of whom I know several) will take sufficient interest in the paper to see to it that it is not starved to death. . . . As to name, I think that Dr. Greer has suggested by far the most commendable, namely, 'The Biologist.' With love and best wishes always."

H. Damour, Macon, Georgia.—"Enclosed find ten cents for 1,019, and the number containing the next installment of 'Sex Radicalism.' I have not found a dull copy yet. I have no right to say anything about the title, but as a friend of the cause I hope I may be allowed to say that Lucifer ought to continue as the name of the paper. It is distinctively its own name."

John Erickson, Seattle, Wash.—"I have read several copies of Lucifer and congratulate myself on being allowed the privilege of becoming a subscriber. Its teaching is grand. The name is O. K. 'Hilda's Home' was received some time ago. Have read it and re-read it. In my opinion it is one among the best of books. Shall feel proud to have it in my library."

SEX RADICALISM.

V. THE PURITAN SEX SYSTEM AS IT ACTUALLY IS.

The puritan system, as exemplified in Anglo-Saxondom, certainly produces self-control of a kind, and the "stony British stare" occurs to one's mind as the mask of a man who is so proud that he prefers to appear unfeeling rather than betray emotions, good or bad. But it may well be doubted if this kind of self-repression really produces the true graces of reverence, gentleness, unselfishness and kindliness for which alone self-mastery is valuable. At all events, the typical puritan, the Englishman, is a proverb for bad manners all over the world—sorry though I am thus to censure my own countrymen.

And is the boasted puritan self-control a feature of puritan marriage? Does not the word honeymoon tell a tale of depleted magnetism and of sweetness that does not last beyond a month? And the tale is untold when it is of one-sided gratification in what ought to be a true love-exchange; of the bridegroom who is an untaught savage, and of the bride who will never learn the simplest meaning of sex joy, unless she is fortunate enough to have a real lover in after years. All these things obviously result from the deprivation, inexperience and ignorance which are forced on all before marriage.

No kind of failure or tyranny or crime seems to the puritan worth notice so long as it is covered by marriage. The case of the outraged and half-murdered woman whose wrongs were published in the famous Markland letter aroused but little more pity and indignation than the many unpublished cases of cruelty before and since. This was not "experimental nastiness." It was time-honored outrage of a wife. The puritan conscience, however, could not stand the case being described in plain words; and the humanity and chivalry of Moses Harman, who took up the case, were rewarded by persecution for years and imprisonment.

The undisciplined mental state of those to whom marriage is the be-all and end-all of sex is seen whenever they are placed in any unusual circumstances or when they have to face what the puritan characteristically calls "temptation." Whenever I have known of a sex association that was unforeseen, hasty, snatched as a starving man snatches a crust, incomplete, and regretted afterwards, it has been that of puritans, impelled by momentary passion and haunted by the idea that by incompleteness they would keep their "marriage vows" or some other real or imagined vows. Whenever I have known of a sexual association that was founded on real friendship, deliberately planned and carried out with completeness as the noblest of sacraments, it was that of lovers who believed in sex-freedom. Such is the difference between the self-control of bond lovers and of free lovers.

Yet the failures of puritanism outside marriage are even worse than those within it. The attempt here to establish a social control of the sex life of the individual has led to the well-known "double standard" of morality. The great majority of men will not live without women, and prefer the poor and brief pleasures of hired sex service to none at all; and puritanism relaxes its rules in the case of unmarried men and visits double disgrace upon the women who serve them, who are made an outcast and degraded class solely to suit the puritan conscience. Even puritans have been known to express pity sometimes for this degradation of women. This is what the "purity" of the orthodox comes to.

The unmarried women living celibate, upon whom the curse of ignorance chiefly falls, are not socially disgraced, or only slightly so in later life, when they are described as "superfluous women" and "old maids"; but no more of them have any genius for celibacy than men have, and they are heavily handicapped in the pursuit of health and happiness, and consequently in the ambition to be the worthiest possible members of society. We think ourselves privileged to condemn the Chinese for binding and deforming the feet of their girl children, yet our own practice of cramping and repressing the sexual faculties of our girls is as bad. And probably both customs have the same origin—the aim being to keep women confined to the home, and to please the fancy of men by artificial prettiness of physical and mental dependence.

I believe that the evils of celibacy are more widespread, more poignant and more demoralizing than those of prostitution. And this is confirmed by the facts that men condescend to associate with prostitutes and that women are driven into coercive marriage. I have never known the life-history of any man or woman in our society of bondage to whom the curse of puritan celibacy did not work cruel tragedy, and in most cases it left permanently injurious traces on character, health and capacity for happiness.

A sketch of Puritan Society would be very incomplete without a glance at the spy system. This spying is carried out with a gusto unequalled in any trade, and is no doubt a form of sexual excitement, and the only form permitted to some, with whom tale-bearing may become a master passion. Not only are stories of real love affairs circulated, but actions, even the minutest, are scrutinized and fitted into a tale, and where this is impossible, the most private feelings are invented, imagined and reported. There is no redress for this kind of injury. But the more enlightened and broadminded a society becomes, the less there is of it; and under true social freedom, scandal-mongering is almost unthinkable.

In their aim of exclusiveness in love, the puritans have attained some success; indeed, many a man under this system has been so exclusive as not to let his love extend beyond himself, and many have been content to adopt "the selfishness of two." Perhaps the "jealous God," in whom many puritans believe, helps them to limit their affections. But this limitation does not prevent the death of love within marriage, and after "forsaking all other," as the church marriage service exhorts them to do, a married pair often finds that love has forsaken them. The inconstancy of love within marriage is proverbial.

And just as the puritans' idea of love is narrow and their marriage system cramped and unnatural, so are they utterly deficient in any ideal of right generation. The whole of their morality for parents may be summed up thus: Beget children (whether healthy or not) and bring them up in the "fear" of the Lord, not sparing the rod. It has never dawned upon their consciences that it is wrong to beget children by a mate who inherits disease; that while a woman should seek the noblest in mind and character that she can get for sex partnership, and aim at being herself worthy of such partnership, she ought to be even more careful in selecting the father of her child for sound heredity, both physical and mental.

This is the most important lesson that we have to learn ourselves and to teach to others. And though it may seem a hard task to moralize puritans, sunk as they are in ignorance, prejudice and indifference, yet there is no hope for the betterment of the race till both puritan principles and practice are "mended or ended."

DORA FORTER.

WOMAN'S VOTE ON THE SCHOOL QUESTION.

Though your correspondents do not all agree as to the method by which woman's emancipation may be brought about, the need of it is patent to all. But we must not forget that woman herself is largely responsible for her present degradation. Or, rather, ignorance is responsible for it, and a large majority of women refuse to be anything but ignorant.

The writer, in working on the school vote among women, was once assigned a ward in the slum district of a certain large city. The object was to introduce temperance and hygienic literature into the public schools. The politics of the candidates on the school board was not taken into consideration.

Armed with sample ballots bearing the crowing rooster and the spreadeagle, we sallied forth.

A rap upon the door of a dilapidated tenement was responded to by a repulsive looking female in "dishy bill," as we once heard an English lass call that condition in which the outer garments were lacking.

"Yes, we've been expecting you an' talkin' it over," she said when the business was explained to her. She then led the way to where were congregated a number of other equally attractive specimens of—we dare not say womanhood. However, they were not men.

"T'other side has been here ahead of you," she explained, "an' they offered us 50 cents apiece for our votes. We think they ought to be worth a dollar to us poor folks, what hain't much else worth sellin', but if you uns will give us 75 cents, sure, you kin have 'em."

Another call brought us to where a row of houses of prostitution fronted on the playground of one of the public schools. The separate establishments, however, were all in one block, under the control of a "Madame," who, after some difficulty, succeeded in gathering her "ladies" together in one common council chamber. They came reluctantly in negligé toilets, fearing the police.

Said she: "There is objection to our business being carried on so close to the school house, but the other party has promised to protect us here for our votes. Now, if your party will do that, and in addition——"

We did not wait to parley further. The other party got the whole row. Votes were more merchandise to most of the women in these wards, the same as to the men. There was no pretense among the politicians of hiding the fact that they used money, drinks, intimidation, threats of discharge from employment—anything, in fact, to coerce these people into voting their ticket.

One old negro woman, when asked to vote for a Democrat, declared:

"No, no, chile; I wash ebery day in de week, but I'll nebber jump ober dat eagle to catch onto de rooster."

We suggested the partiality of her race for chicken, but it wouldn't work.

"I'll stay by de Linkum pahty," was her decision. She at least was not for sale.

Like their husbands, Irish women were for Democrats; Germans and Negroes for Republicans.

FENTINA LENTE.

CONSCIOUS EFFORT IN EVOLUTION.

When Hugh O. Pentecost had finished his address on "Whitman's View of Life" before the New York Radical Club a few months ago and the chairman of the meeting announced that anybody in the audience might criticize the address, I sat speechless and spellbound by Pentecost's eloquence. It is needless to remark that I agreed with almost everything the speaker said, but it did not dawn upon me until after I had left the hall that I had been tricked by the clever speaker; that he had merely used detached passages from Whitman's "Leaves of Grass" to give his audience, not Whitman's, but Pentecost's "View of Life." I met Mr. Pentecost a week or so afterwards at a social gathering and complimented him on the adroit way in which he had duped his audience. "It was merely your own view of life," I said, "and you could have done the same thing by quoting passages from the Bible."

"Of course I could," he admitted. "We get from any book the views we take to it."

Those were not his exact words, but that is the idea his reply conveyed to me.

He repeated the address shortly afterwards before Unity Congregation in Lyric Hall and took occasion to mention my accusation that he had presented his own and not Whitman's view of life.

"But I have read you Whitman's exact words," he said, "so you see it is his view."

I had no opportunity to reply at that meeting, but I still insist that an entirely opposite view could be presented by quoting from the same book, for the contradictions in "Leaves of Grass" are as glaring as the contradictions in the Bible. Whitman admits it. He says:

"Do I contradict myself?
"Very well, then, I contradict myself;
"(I am large—I contain multitudes.)"

I delivered an address on "Whitman the Iconoclast"—not on "Walt Whitman, Poet and Philosopher of the New Time," as Moses Harman misunderstood it—at the residence of Moses Harman on August 23. I stated at the beginning of my address that I did not intend to give an analysis of "Leaves of Grass" or give the general drift of it. My intention was to give only one phase of Whitman—that of the iconoclast, the breaker of social and conventional idols. In spite of that clear and definite announcement, one of my able critics, William Francis Barnard, made an attack on what he called Whitman's philosophy—as if Whitman had not explicitly denied any intention to formulate a system of philosophy.

"No words of routine are mine,
But abruptly to question, to leap beyond, yet nearer bring."

Brother Barnard said he admired Whitman as a poet, but had small regard for him as a philosopher. Whitman was a loser in many things, as all strong egotists are; but I have never discovered any evidence that he posed as a philosopher. Moses Harman said in Lucifer, No. 1,021: "Brother Crane gave a very clear statement of what is known as the materialistic philosophy." Marvelous! Why, I don't know what materialistic philosophy is. I cannot conceive of such a thing any more than I can conceive of materialistic hope, or materialistic thought. I know not the boundary between the material and the immaterial, but I do not regard thought as material, although I cannot conceive how an immaterial thing (or being) can think. Brother Harman may say the ego, the conscious man, is immaterial. He is welcome to that belief; I do not dispute it. I merely affirm it as my belief that without a material brain a man could not be conscious. The survival of the conscious ego after the decomposition of the brain is to me inconceivable. Yet I do not deny it, although it is to me inconceivable.

After a brief argument Brother Harman draws "the conclusion that consciously intelligent human effort can hasten evolution," yet in his argument he made the fatal admission, "I am part and parcel of evolution." That admission tells the story. His conscious efforts also are part of evolution, and hence can neither hasten or retard evolution. Whitman expressed that idea when he wrote:

"What blurt is this about virtue and about vice?"
Evil propels me, and the reform of evil propels me."

Brother Harman is what he is and is consciously pursuing his chosen line of so-called reform because everything in the past has been what it was and everything to-day is what it is. No; that statement is not accurate. We cannot say because; causes are beyond our grasp; so please substitute the word "and" for the word "because" in the foregoing statement.

But Brother Barnard says, "If everything is as it must be, there can be no incentive to action. There is incentive to action and action produces results which inaction would not produce; ergo, everything is not as it must be."

Lame logic. Here, I think, is the correct syllogism: Everything is as it must be; incentives to action exist; therefore incentives to action must exist. The doctrine of fatalism is not the negation of hope, for hope is part of the scheme of things—an inevitable part. I have tried to do my part towards helping Lucifer in its work. I am still advocating the broadest personal liberty. But I realize that I do so because I cannot help it, because "the reform of evil propels me." I realize also that Anthony Comstock opposes personal liberty because he cannot help it. The battle between the so-called advocates and foes of progress is not of their own making, but is an inevitable phase of evolution. To me there is nothing depressing or discouraging in this belief; nothing to make me pessimistic. On the contrary, I rejoice in the battle, rejoice in seeing the evolution of more rebels every day against the rule of the tomb. This mighty impulse is the moving spirit of evolution and I feel elation in believing that I, too, as well as Brother Harman, am on the side which will eventually conquer. Not that such struggles will ever cease; for I cannot conceive of their ceasing; but that those who are battling for freer and less trammeled humanity are in line with progress; whereas those who cling to the superstitions of the past and would restrict the fullest expression of humanity are mere remnants of the barbaric past and must give way before the march of cosmic progress. Again Whitman:

"I see those who in any land have died for the good cause;
The seed is spare, nevertheless the crop shall never run out;
(Mind you, O foreign kings, O priests, the crop shall never run out)."

DON'T FORGET, good friends all, to send us names of independent thinkers—New Thought people, Rationalists, Agnostics, Spiritualists, Materialists, Free Religionists, Theosophists—to whom we may send sample copies of Lucifer, "Son of the Morning," "Herald of the Dawn," "Harbinger of the Good Time Coming"! We have some hundreds of copies printed extra each issue for the express purpose of sending them out as samples, and, if possible, we want several hundred new names each week, or each fortnight. And if with the names a few postage stamps can be sent to help pay the cost of wrappers and of mailing, all the better, but send the names!

HEALTH AND A FORTUNE FOR SALE AT A BARGAIN

"COTE BRILLIANT" is a finely improved thirty acre fruit ranch in the banner county (Sonoma) of the state of California. It is located one mile west of the town of Kenwood, three miles north of Glen Ellen and ten miles southeast of the city of Santa Rosa, with oiled and sprikled roads leading to these points. It is sixty-four miles north of San Francisco, and can be reached by the California and Northwestern railroad from Glen Ellen and the Southern Pacific from either Kenwood or Santa Rosa. There are four trains to and from San Francisco daily. It is convenient to good stores, schools and churches.

SEVEN YEARS AGO its deep rich soil was set to the best and most profitable kinds of fruit, consisting of peaches, pears, prunes and cherries. One year ago a splendid variety orchard was planted for home use, which contains an unlimited variety of the rarest nuts, fruits, berries and vines, from all parts of the world. Many of these will be in bearing next year.

THERE IS A GOOD living spring on the place, an extra large well of pure water and large windmill and tank. Water is piped to the house, cottage, barn, chicken yard and gardens. The orchards require no irrigation whatever.

THE HOUSE WAS BUILT three years ago at a cost of over $5,000. It is a two story structure with attic and cellar. Is strictly modern. Has eight living rooms, bath-room, laundry and store-room.

THE ROOMS CONSIST of an elegant reception room, parlor, dining-room, kitchen with large pantry and a china closet connecting the kitchen with the dining-room, also laundry with two porcelain laundry tubs. Connecting with this is a store-room which leads to the cellar.

ON THE SECOND FLOOR are four large, light, sunny bedrooms, with roomy clothes-closets in each. There is also on this floor a large bath and toilet room, with porcelain bath-tub and marble wash-stand. The house is finished throughout in hardwood, with stained and oiled floors in each room. The house is piped throughout with hot and cold water, also for Acetylene Gas.

FIFTY YARDS SOUTH of the main building is a fine four-room cottage with high basement for storage. There is a fine barn, wagon shed, carpenter shop and other out buildings.

THERE IS A NICE large poultry yard, containing four chicken houses, an extra large brooding house and two extra large capacity incubators. Over 1,000 chickens can be nicely cared for.

THE PLACE IS FULLY equipped with all necessary farming implements, wagons, phaeton, cart etc.

THREE GOOD HORSES and a splendid Jersey cow go with the place.

THE CLIMATE in this section is unsurpassed and the place is a natural sanitarium where invalids rapidly recover. This would be an ideal place for a public sanitarium, and a quick fortune could be made by opening one at this point.

THE OWNER'S BUSINESS interests in Chicago compel an immediate sale. The place cost $15,000, but if sold at once $10,500 takes it. The place can be divided if necessary and easy terms can be arranged to suit. An offer of CLEAR well located Chicago (North or South side) property would be considered.

PHOTOGRAPHS of the interior and exterior of the house and different portions of the ranch may be seen upon request.

When writing on business of any kind, please do not forget to enclose a stamp for catalogue of books and pamphlets on sale at this office.

SEX RADICALISM.

VI. THE SEX WAR.

The sex forces will always be liable to produce disturbance and conflict as surely as electricity in the atmosphere under certain conditions gives the explosions of thunder and lightning. Sometimes the battle is in the mind of the individual, sometimes it is the half-conscious rivalry of persons of the same sex, but under fully developed puritanism it is more or less open war between men and women, with the priests encouraging it, as is their wont in all strife, and taking fees here and there for drawing up a partial truce, supposed to be a lasting Peace of God, called marriage.

There is supposed to be a kind of standard of honor or fair play in all contest. If so, it is hard to say whether men or women, ranged on opposite sides in this social strife, have descended to lower stratagems against their enemy; but the women appear most mean when acting singly, entrapping men into marriage, and the men most ungenerous when acting in bodies, trying to starve or harass women out of every profession except marriage.

The men seem actuated by pure malice, only partly excused by their ignorance. But a woman who tries to get married has in case of failure to lose some of the most obvious rights of a human being, and moreover loses usually her only chance of a career. And the women certainly have the excuse of acting by puritan principles. The marriageable woman is never allowed to lose sight of the main chance. Even in our nurseries the lesson is instilled. In the ballad of "The little man and the little maid," the maid replies to her ardent wooer, "Will your flames assist a little to boil water in the kettle?" and her scorn of love is deemed praiseworthy.

Should a girl have an ambition to cultivate the friendship of some man comrade,—"What can it lead to?" asks the puritan aunt or mother. A young Scotch lady when congratulated on her engagement to a neighboring minister, replied, politely depreciating the merits of the bargain she had secured, "Yes, it is a very nice manse, only the bed-room ceilings are rather low." She was imbued with true puritan principles. And how often is marriage in England or America as much an arrangement made by the parents as any marriage in France!

The girl who turns from this sort of bargaining, and aims at independence, soon finds that one has not only the sneers of men to face, but their persistent endeavors to keep her out of all but the lowest work. Men like to preach about the place of the womanly woman being in the home, when the girl who suffers from their spite not only may have no home to look forward to, but has to struggle to live and work in a garret.

Perhaps it is a good sign that the women have begun to "talk back," and many now think it spirited in conversation to make little hits at the weaknesses of men, though the speakers are often without any appreciation of the working of a sex system that weighs almost as heavily on the best men as on all women.

Among the worst effects of the sex war are the divisions it causes among women, and the want of sympathy between the three classes, the married, the celibate and the prostitute. The contempt of the wife for the spinster is sometimes unconcealed. "It is a good thing," said one, "that there are sisterhoods in which superfluous women can do useful work." And the attitude of a past generation toward some of the saddest sides of these questions is well worth noting, that women, at least, may never again fall so low as to take such an attitude. The clear-sightedness of youth would lead to some amazed question of what? how? or why? and our grandmothers or aunts would reply: "O, we know all about that, but do not stir up the mud." That the best human vitality should be forced to flow in underground courses, and be regarded as a sewer too foul to be ever cleansed, is a situation which is wholly unworthy of an age rejoicing in the dawning light of science.

I have seen a good deal of "the class war," and it was what I heard in comfortable drawing-rooms which first made me feel heart and soul with the weaker side. Such remarks as "shoot them down," which were no mere pleasantries, were passed, when workmen were on strike for a living wage or for decent hours of work. Yet the brutality of men upholding wage slavery is fully equalled by that of men upholding sex slavery. If they do not want to take the lives of women, they are desirous that everything should be taken from the lives of women that makes life worth living. Men seem able to behave generously towards any one woman, in concrete form (unless married to her), but cannot feel the simplest humanity toward women collectively.

History has not failed to record the behavior of the men who in every instance opposed the endeavor of women to obtain university education. Formerly it was the "blue" woman who was the object of ridicule; now it is the "new woman;" but the speakers always seem equally ignorant of what they are talking about.

The sex war can perhaps be best studied in England. The sex which utterly refuses to have celibacy thrust upon themselves is quite willing that it should be thrust upon the opposite sex; and men of the most cultivated social class who are forever preaching maternity to women as their one great function are indifferent to the fact that fifty per cent of the women of their own class are condemned to be unmated and childless. One can scarcely avoid the conclusion that men like the presence of a number of sexually starved women to minister to their vanity and to afford a large selection when it pleases them to choose a wife. The sexual starvation and coercion of an Oriental harem scarcely goes further than this.

Again, professional life, with its training, regular occupation, the social position that salaried work gives, and the social variety it usually affords, is so healthful as largely to counteract the evils of the sex deprivations above noticed; yet men have persistently tried to bar all professions against women.

It would be noted, however, that menial work, or work poorly paid or unpaid, is not called unwomanly. All the most trying work in the treatment of diseases, whether in public or private, is done by nurses mostly women. The clergy induce women to perform the work of curates in the parish without payment. The professional man asks his sister to keep house for him without salary and turns her off without a pension when it suits him to replace her by a wife. And the menial offices of that "great unpaid" class, the mothers of families, are too numerous to mention.

It is some years over a century since women, led by Mary Wolstonecraft, claimed to be human beings in their own right, and not mere appendages to men. That claim is not yet fully established, but it will be, and men will wonder how it could ever have been denied. And the greatest force to end the bitterness of the sex war will be the recognition of sex love as a power for good and a principle to regulate the conduct of men and women as equal comrades; and thus will be abolished all buying and selling and coercion in sex favors.

DORA FORSTER.

ON PREVENTION—A TEST QUESTION.

What is so strange about the present strange century is the too largely prevalent idea that advancement is to be made by negation, unfaith, prevention of birth. Quite a number of persons are engaged on the singular doctrines of denial and death. With absurd persistency they shout to us that if we are only sufficiently negative, if we disbelieve enough, and above all if only we war against birth, and curtail by every means the flow of life, then we shall be saved! It is the most hopeless paradox ever upheld; it has but to be stated and its rottenness is evident—yet it proceeds.

In the advanced party it is not uncommon to meet women clever beyond the ordinary, interesting, apparently vital—yet once touch on the question of birth and they recoil with morbid abhorrence—motherhood has for them a terror which can only proceed from decadence. Thus they go on to extinction, inevitably—go on as though driven on by some fatality stronger than themselves.

Of course we are all familiar with the standing arguments as to the advantage of relieving a woman from a too heavy burden of motherhood—in some cases such arguments may be genuine enough, but it is not these cases that I wish now to discuss. For the sake of brevity I wish to center attention for a moment on what I may call the hypocrites of the Prevention movement—women who argue as if their aim were to keep families within certain limits, whilst all the time in their inner minds they are determined to have no children at all, and who have practiced prevention even on their very first participation—having discussed it with their lovers at a time when the ardors of love should alone have absorbed them.

Such racial suicide has no moral justification. Before the advocates of prevention can present any really logical case to the thinking world, they ought to clearly divide into two camps—those who believe in motherhood within certain limitations, and those who, whatever they may shelter themselves under, do not really believe in motherhood at all, but seek only such gratification as coldly deliberate sterility can give.

To all those who profess a belief in a prudentially controlled motherhood I would like to ask one test question:

Would you consider a healthy and capable woman who has deliberately sterilized all her love-relationships as better or worse than one who has done her best with a large family?

After that was fairly answered we should begin to know what it is that the advocates of Prevention believe in.

London, Eng. WILLIAM PLATT.

ONE WOMAN'S EXPERIENCE.

I would say that Celia B. Whitehead has not been through the treadmill of experience or she would see things in a different light. Having been forced to be the mother of ten children, I know. Some of these were begotten when there was no expectation whatever on the part of the organs, for every part, soul, mind and body, cried out against it.

How can there be any anticipation or yearning of the organs in such conception? I know there is none. The time when the organs are outraged is when woman is forced into motherhood without her consent or desire. When woman has the ability to prevent conception she is well on her way to freedom. Who has the power of knowing this question any better than the woman who has been through the experience and has come out of and above it, and is on her way to freedom?

Woman alone cannot settle the sex question. Woman and man will have to work side by side as comrades. We women have been prone to cast our brothers down; to put the yoke, the stigma, of degradation upon their desires, instead of holding them up to the ideal of true manhood, thereby helping them to be pure in themselves.

Let woman and man hold themselves up, purify their own lives, reform themselves. Then we will know what true reform is.

ADA WRIGHT.

SEXUAL AUTOCRACY—AN EXPLANATION.

"Autocracy; uncontrolled or unlimited authority over others, invested in a single person; the power of an absolute monarch."

"Autocrat; one who is invested with or assumes unlimited authority in any direction."

These definitions are from the Century Dictionary. The power to consent or to refuse is not authority over others, but mere self-ownership. Mere refusal to act cannot make one an autocrat. "Equal autocrats" are impossible; the very term is a contradiction, for the condition of autocracy being that the authority is "uncontrolled or unlimited," there cannot possibly exist two autocrats in the same realm.

Autocracy, authority over others, is not to be tolerated in any relation of life. Man's attempt at sexual autocracy has made the condition of things from which we are struggling to extricate ourselves and the race. This cannot be accomplished through the autocracy of woman unless two wrongs will make a right. Unlimited authority of any kind is an evil, degrading alike to those who exercise it and to those who are its subjects. To obey is a degradation, but to command degrades no less. To change from slave to master makes no one free, for we are bound by slavery whether we submit to it or inflict it on others.

It is not Nature but custom has made man a sexual autocrat. The wild, free female animal is not forced against her will. The civilized slave female is taught to find her duty in obedience to the male autocrat, and not the woman alone, but the man also, is bound by the chains of this hideous slavery.

When both respect the self-ownership of the other there will exist, not equal authority, but equal freedom from all authority; a condition wherein may be developed mutual respect, mutual helpfulness, mutual responsibility, mutual love; and with love supreme there can be no authority, for the love that desires authority is self-love merely. Love desires harmony, and true love set free will create harmony.

ADELINE CHAMPNEY.

ECONOMIC FREEDOM AND PREVENTIVE CHECKS.

There will be little sex freedom until we have established economic freedom for women and men.

When girls can remain free from care for the future; when there is work for all the girls and boys as soon as they are fitted for it; when conditions are pleasant and all independent of each other; when all will work and plan for the good of the whole, then girls will not stay single when they have a desire to get married.

Then boys won't object to marriage, as they will have the assurance of a lasting home, a lasting job and sufficient lasting money.

Then motherhood will not be undesirable as now. Parents will know that children will find enough to eat, enough to wear, good shelter, a chance to learn, a chance to play.

Women are few who object to motherhood. They object to it now because starvation stares them in the face continually, not because they lack love for children of their own.

Still there are some who object because they have degenerated in a life of luxury while squandering the substance of others.

Under economic freedom, such as can only be established by complete organization of humanity, people will not get married in order to better their condition, as now. They will not be able to better their conditions by marriage as all will be in as good condition as organized society can produce for each individual.

Marriage will only take place when the natures of two people of opposite sex blend and harmonize. Here, too, motherhood will not be undesirable in the least.

Nevertheless, and notwithstanding all this, there are many things we can change and improve without waiting for this economic freedom. Mothers can teach their boys to respect the girls.

Men can learn to realize that women are their equals, generally speaking. That women are physically weaker and should be relieved of work that is beyond their strength. That what women lack in bodily strength they make up in patience.

What man could endure to take care of six little ones; instruct them; nurse them; keep them clean; mend the clothes of the family and perhaps make them; cook the meals; do the washing; scrub floors; sweep; wash dishes and keep the house clean and in order—on a few dollars a week.

Then, may be, the husband tells her every day he is supporting her.

Men can stop making slaves of their wives sexually, before we get economic freedom, and women and men can discontinue their brutality to each other before that freedom gets established.

As for using cheap preventive checks—how will we get enough soldiers to send into the field to be shot down and to shoot others?

You must not advocate anything like that; it is illegal!

We can only kill children on crossings; in factories; in mills; on battle fields and by filling their lungs all hours of the day with the germ-laden dirt of the streets, which is stirred up by street cleaners all day long and by the wind. That only is legal!

Don't forget to tell the people in your articles that you expect them to exercise control over their passions.

That reason should always guide and that others must be considered as well as ourselves.

A STUDENT.

REINCARNATION.

Unless we accept the truth of reincarnation it is impossible fully to understand the sex question.

Intelligent, progressive men and women agree that women should be free, and that, in fact, all mankind should be free.

We have an inherent right to our own life and to work it out in our own way. We are here for that purpose and none should hinder us.

But by far the greater number of men and women, strange as it may seem, hug the chains that keep them from freedom.

Why is this?

Reincarnation alone can and does explain.

There could be no change, no advancement without evolution, and no evolution without reincarnation, for evolution depends primarily upon the unfoldment of the individual.

Race development in the long run is the outcome of individual development, and that alone depends upon opportunity for experience, which can only be obtained through a succession of physical lives. No matter who the person, a scientist, the most intellectual, with ability to reason intricately and verbosely on the most abstruse subjects, if he does not accept and know the basic truth of rebirth he cannot give us anything satisfactory on this most important subject of sex expression.

Why do people differ? Why are the needs of some not the needs of others? Some will answer by talking heredity, but heredity will not make things plain. There is much in heredity, but reincarnation is even at the back of heredity.

If this one short span of earth life were all that has been and all that will be, the question would forever remain unanswered, but in the knowledge of rebirth occurring time and time again the answer is most simple. We are each what we are because of what we have been in past lives. Cause and effect follow us unremittingly.

Many ask why we do not remember our past lives. The generality do not, primarily because they, with each new birth, function through a different brain, and not having as a rule cultivated the intuitional sense, they have no memory of other than what has transpired in the present life, and often not much even of that. Others, again, have a dim memory of other lives and have often been puzzled at it. Some few have a distinct memory and understanding of many of their past lives. And all this again is but another proof of the evolution of human mind through successive opportunity. Some have progressed further than others. All are in different stages of development. All act and reason from different planes of thought, according to their unfoldment in knowledge.

There is the savage, the barbarous, the semi-civilized, the civilized and the highly civilized.

To this last no race, though some individuals, have as yet attained. The dawn is approaching for the race, but we must be patient for the day to appear.

Now the needs of a person in one stage of development are an anomaly to those in another stage. The sensualist, so-called, looks with wonder and some contempt upon the one who, not requiring the life of the sensuous, leads a quiet, abstemious one. They are enigmas to each other, but not so to the one who understands the why and wherefore.

The terms low and high, good and bad, are often misapplied. Nothing is low that is natural.

The perversions and excesses so prevalent in life are but the outcome of repressed or misdirected sex expression.

Much of this is owing to the artificial laws and restrictions of our present civilization. Constantly doing violence to nature through the ignorant application of civil and social laws, it imagines itself doing the very best for all. And it will continue this mistake until with repeated incarnations it has developed another plane of thought. How are we to be wise if we have not had experience?

And how are we to get experience without opportunity, and how can we have opportunity without the time to get it in? And does any one suppose that in a life of say eighty or ninety years on earth he can get all the experience needed to become wise? Some are wise in their generation, but it is only because they have had experience in past lives that has enabled them to be so.

None need therefore be conceited about their wisdom or their knowledge or, in fact, about anything, for whatever they are and whatever they know is the result of work and deep thought, coupled with great suffering through many mistakes.

And what of those who die young or in middle life? No more chance for them?

And in what other world but this could they naturally obtain the necessary experiences that would fit them to become perfect human beings? And if the aim in coming is not to be perfected in the human before going hence to return no more, of what earthly use would it be to come here at all?

Every one should lead the life best suited to his stage of development, but alas, precious few are permitted to do so. From the barnyard stage all along the line to the seraphic, each should be allowed to live their own life.

If any are excessive in their indulgence, experience alone will teach them their mistake. Certainly condemnation, scorn and criticism will not and even teaching of others does less than is supposed. But it is well for would-be helpers of mankind to put before them an ideal just a step in advance of their conceptions, but only a step. A whole flight would be worse than useless, for each step is in the shadow until it is nearly reached. Such is the human mind and it is no use to quarrel with it and expect more of it.

MRS. BERTHA MOORE.

DON'T FORGET, good friends all, to send us names of independent thinkers—New Thought people, Rationalists, Agnostics, Spiritualists, Materialists, Free Religionists, Theosophists—to whom we may send sample copies of Lucifer, "Son of the Morning," "Herald of the Dawn," "Harbinger of the Good Time Coming"! We have some hundreds of copies printed extra each issue for the express purpose of sending them out as samples, and, if possible, we want several hundred new names each week, or each fortnight. And if with the names a few postage stamps can be sent to help pay the cost of wrappers and of mailing, all the better, but send the names!

When writing on business of any kind, please do not forget to enclose a stamp for catalogue of books and pamphlets on sale at this office.

LUCIFER: ITS MEANING AND PURPOSE.

LUCIFER—The planet Venus; so called from its brightness.—Webster's Dictionary.

LUCIFEROUS—Giving light; affording light or the means of discovery.—Same.

LUCIFIC—Producing light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing, and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Temporary illness of the editor must excuse absence of editorials this week.

ERRATA: In last issue a line dropped out of the last paragraph of the article, "Right to Be Born Well." The entire paragraph should read thus:

Thus does "society" build asylums, supported by compulsory taxation, to care for the failures, the congenital wrecks, stranded upon the shores of mortal life by its most cherished, most sacred "joss," the marital institution.

In same issue a comment was made upon a letter from Alfred B. Westrup, but the letter did not appear. Both are printed in this issue.

EVOLUTION AND INCENTIVES TO ACTION.

[In lieu of the brief reply I intended to make in this issue the following paragraphs by E. C. Walker are herewith inserted. Bro. Walker requests me to say that these paragraphs will constitute part of a pamphlet he is now getting out, entitled "Communism and Conscience; Pentecost and Paradox."—M. H.]

In the minds of a good many persons of more or less progressive ideas, "Evolution" is a sort of mystery-fetish, just as "God" or "Oversoul" or "the Divine Immanence" is a mystery-fetish in the minds of a great many more persons. Seemingly, it is believed that "evolution" is an entity or a force beyond and independent of nature, acting upon nature to influence and direct its elements, instead of being the name given by man, First, to the sum total of the process, the activities, of these elements, and, Second, to the changes the results produced by these processes, these activities, changes and results seen and cognized by man. A variant of this error is found in the belief that, while evolution in no sense is supernatural, nevertheless it is something that cannot be affected by anything man may do; that our efforts, conscious or unconscious, neither can defer, or hasten, neither can deflect or modify, the changes destined by the fetish-power, evolution. In either view of the matter, "evolution" is simply another name for "God."

In the rational, because the scientific, view of the subject, every element, every combination of elements, in nature is perceived to be a factor in evolution, accelerating or retarding change, producing differentiation or assisting in maintaining the status quo, fixity or type. This is true alike in the worlds of subconsciousness, consciousness, and self-consciousness. If the actor, the factor, in nature's workshop is conscious, then conscious effort has an effect in nature, modifying, it matters not in how slight a degree, the efforts of other factors and aiding in altering its own environment. If this factor is self-conscious, then it perceives that it has the power to affect the efforts of other factors and knows that it may alter its environment for better or worse. Man, a conscious and self-conscious being, is no less a factor in nature than is that which we call unconscious matter; he affects by his activities his race and its environment, and he is conscious that he does this.

An amusing instance of the second form of the astonishing misapprehension with which I am dealing, is found in an article in a reform periodical. The writer, arguing against the position that conscious effort can be a factor in evolution, first very curiously admits or maintains the substance of all I am contending for here, for he says: "His [the editor's] conscious efforts also are part of evolution,' but he instantly cancels this admission, for he adds in a wonderful second part of the same sentence, "and hence can neither hasten nor retard evolution." Was such a complete non sequitur ever seen before? The regiment is a part of the army corps—therefore, the regiment's action is a matter of no concern to the commander; it cannot help win victories nor contribute to defeats. The condensation of vapor, its precipitation as water, the passage of the water through channels and its settlement in the earth, are parts of nature's activity—therefore, man's conscious efforts in irrigation and subsoiling are acts of futile folly, in no whit affecting results. The writer's liver is a part of his body—therefore, his health cannot be affected by the condition of his liver. The wheel is a part of the wagon—therefore, the movement of the wagon is in nowise dependent on the condition, and consequent quality of activity, of the wheel. Well, well!

Evolution is the name given to the course of the activities and the results of the activities of nature. Man is a part of nature. Hence, man, a conscious and self-conscious being, can and does participate in evolution; he is a factor, a self-conscious factor, in causing changes, in deciding the trend of evolution; especially, of course, in human society and its immediate environment.

THE RIGHT TO BE BORN WELL.

Is it any wonder that hypocrisy, deception, intrigue, falsehood are leading characteristics of modern society, when the dangers of mistake in making the matrimonial venture are so great, and when the consequences of mistake are so terrible, so far-reaching? In other words, is it strange that seeing the falsity, the falsehoods, the immorality, the criminality, inherent in the popular standards of virtue in the sex relation, thousands of people deliberately live a life of deception in order to outwit the guardians of this "joss," the popular marriage institution?

Take the following story as a sample of these deceptions in high life, clipped from Reed's Isonomy for September (San Antonio, Texas):

"In spite of the strenuous efforts made by the proprietors of the leading hotels throughout the country to prevent couples who are unmarried from obtaining accommodations of rooms in their hostelries, their rule is broken every day, and by the very people, too, whose appearance is sufficiently prepossessing to indicate that they would not be guilty of such reprehensible practice.

"'Yes, we are very careful whom we accommodate with rooms,' said the senior proprietor of one of the largest hotels in Philadelphia the other day, 'yet there is not a doubt but what we frequently have the wool pulled over our eyes. In fact,' said he, 'I know we do, although whenever we observe even the slightest grounds for a reasonable suspicion, it is our inevitable rule to inform such couples that we have nothing left, save the servants' quarters—and that usually settles it.

"'To prove to you, however,' he continued with a smile, 'that even the most cautious may sometimes be deceived, I will relate to you an instance which occurred within this house just a few days ago. It was early in one afternoon. A young man, accompanied by a young woman, entered the hotel, and while he was engaged in registering himself and wife, his companion took a seat in the elevator car. Both of them were well dressed and presented every mark and appearance of refinement. They were assigned to one of the choicest rooms, such being his request, and nothing further was seen of them for several hours. At length they came down the stairway and passed out into the street. Some time later, while the house clerk was away at supper, the young woman returned alone. Proceeding directly to the desk, she addressed one of the assistants then on duty, and requested the key to her room.

"'"What is your number, madam?" the assistant inquired.

"'"Why, really, I do not know, but it is on the second floor."

"'"Are you alone?" was the next inquiry.

"'"Oh, no," she responded promptly. "I am with my husband. He is out attending to some business."

"'"Well, that may be adjusted very readily," returned the clerk politely, opening the hotel register and referring to the day's arrivals, "what is your name?"

"'"W-w-why, I don't remember what name he registered," she thoughtlessly blurted out, her cheeks flushing vivid scarlet.

"'Fortunately, I chanced to overhear the entire conversation, so, after calling a bellboy and directing him to show the woman to the parlor, I waited until her alleged husband returned and then quietly informed him that he would have to seek quarters elsewhere. I offered no explanation; indeed, he required none. He was "on" like a flash and, calling for his grip and hers, joined his so-called wife in the parlor, returned together down the elevator and passed out into the street.'"

Several explanations may be easily imagined for the conduct of this "prepossessing" couple. One or both may have been "married but not mated," and may have been seeking a temporary respite from uncongenial companionship in order that their lives might not be complete failures so far as enjoyment of the other sex is concerned.

Second, the woman may have been married, and either there was no prospect of offspring from association with her "liege lord" and she was adopting this method of becoming a mother, as a matter of necessity; or her husband may have been agreeable to her personally, but utterly unsuited, through disease, tendency to insanity, or other cause, to become the father of her child; or the husband's personal habits may have been such that his touch was poison to her, and yet she did not have the courage to brave the scandal of an elopement which would give the husband legal ground for divorce. A hundred reasons may easily be imagined for this clandestine meeting, none of which would be in themselves wrong; the great wrong being the denial of freedom by the artificial sex code of organized respectable "society." In any case, however, the deception would probably have entailed an unfortunate heritage upon the child, had this clandestine meeting been productive of offspring—a heritage of hypocrisy, a tendency to intrigue, to underhanded methods in business, in all the relations of social life.

From the same paper I clip the following:

In that impressive melodrama, 'The Two Orphans,' which is being produced at intervals with all-star casts, there is an incident which seemingly makes a lie justifiable, and that it touches a popular chord is evinced by the applause which always greets the priest who points to heaven and informs the liar that her lie will be recorded to her credit there. It is a point which the theorists do not accept, but that doesn't matter.

"A similar occasion presented itself recently in the practice of an old Philadelphia physician. He was sent for by a family he had never attended. He answered the summons and found a stern mother of the Puritan type and a beautiful daughter. He was informed that unusual conditions had given rise to suspicions in the mother's breast that her daughter had strayed from the path of rectitude. Indeed, she accused her of having sought medical aid to remedy the wrong, and she called in a strange doctor to decide the point.

"The girl tearfully protested against such an examination. There was an air of refinement and delicacy about her that precluded the possibility of anything deliberately base, and when the old physician took in the situation he insisted that he be left alone with the girl.

"The girl's tears came afresh and she confessed that her mother's suspicions were well founded and that if it were an error she had erred out of love, impulse and youthful passion, and that she expected soon to be a wife. He soothed her and when the mother returned he informed the latter that she had done her daughter a cruel injustice. Then the mother could not do enough to make amends. Only the other week the daily papers contained the notice of the marriage of the young girl. The truth in this case would have wrecked her life, probably, and certainly cost her the confidence of her mother. It is not hard to believe that she remembers that dear old doctor in her prayers."

FREE MOTHERHOOD.

I speak for, live for, and work for, free motherhood!

When we get a condition of life in which a woman may have a child, and still own herself, own her name, maintain her freedom and self-support, we will have very little sickness in pregnancy.

We will have a self-conscious woman, who controls her own mind and her physical states, her appetites, who eats lightly of foods best fitted to the pregnant state, who takes daily baths, exercises, walks well, breathes well, and who cares to hold herself poised and strong and healthy.

A married woman is inclined to lay the "blame" on her husband, to feel bound and enslaved, to run to him with every ailment and weakness, to lean on him, to whine to him, to extract sympathy from him. The idea is to let him know how much she is suffering—and he is not suffering.

But the child really belongs to the woman; and when the free mother—asking nothing better than motherhood, able to stand on her own feet, feeling that she owns herself and her babe—comes into existence, we will have the healthy mother, rid of the pains, the pangs of pregnancy, rid of the "sickness" of childbirth, a gay young joyous mother, a girl still, the coming of whose child does not rob her of activity and equality in the supporting and producing world.

When may these things be?

The thing that stands against it is the sentiment there is in the social mass concerning woman, her place, her position, and her relation to the sex question.

Heretofore, she has been creed-bound, absolutely, in her motherhood. In order to be loved, to be a mother she must, in the worldly opinion go in under the world's way, become the bond-slave of some man, take his name, become labeled as "Mrs.," be known as a "wife" (which is a creed-bound position in society), keep a "home" and be supported. She must, arbitrarily, give the child the man's name and, in fact, bear his children for him.

This makes her lean and lop, sulk and suffer; this gives her a weak mind and a weak body; lays her open to "morning sickness," to false cravings, to an abnormal appetite for food, and so on through the thousand and one weights, heavinesses and ailments of the bound-in woman in pregnancy.

None of which need be.

As some of the free women who have become free mothers, and who have been light-hearted, happy and well, have proven.

LAURA SMITH WOOD, M. D.

THE SOCIAL EVIL.

In my youth the remark made resignedly: "I fear he is only a man," was often made in my hearing to my great puzzlement. I pondered over what it might mean, and when later on a dawning consciousness came, several of my most cherished idols lay in the dust, never to be restored. Now, how can woman who is the greatest sufferer from the great social evil go on folding her hands in her lap with an apology for her sons and a killing of ideals for her daughters?

If her daughter grows blase as to the hope of ever meeting a Prince Charming up to her standard, who can wonder?

If I could only jog the apathy of mothers sufficiently to make them quit this inane setting up of one ethical standard for their girls and another for their boys. This folding of the hands if they have only boys to bring up.

Oh! to instill into our sons such a reverence for womanhood and motherhood that it would be a thought apart from carnal ideas.

The poor, ignorant factory girl or house slave with little endowment save her emotional nature trusts too far and where is she? Turned prematurely out of a hospital with a young life cumbering her incompetent hands; and a little later with the curse of Cain written on her brow. She is according to the civil law a murderer and must suffer the penalty of her crime.

But is she the murderer? What about the skulking hind who killed her morally and socially and leaves her to bear the penalties of his indulgence in ignominy and lost womanhood; and still struts about unpunished without even consciousness of his depravity.

Some woman, somewhere is to blame for that man's obliquity of moral strength. Some woman ready to accept the trite theories handed down by her mother instead of teaching her boy the beauty of purity, the sanctity of womanhood.

If there is a mad dog about in the neighborhood, we do not perpetually keep our children within doors; we shoot the dog and then the children are free to run.

Let us mothers shoot the dog which causes the social evil by facing straight about and refusing to tolerate or touch the hand of any man we believe guilty of desecrating our sex; then may our daughters glory in their weakness, since true chivalry will have been brought to life in our sons.

Lacey Baker, New York City.—"I would like some back numbers if you have any on hand. A sample copy of your fearless paper convinced me of its excellence. The sex question will stand all the ventilating you can give it. Enclosed find one dollar for subscription to Lucifer."

(We have a good supply of back numbers of most issues for some months past, or even for several years past, for which, when volumes are not required, we ask only postage and a little pay for time spent in hunting up the particular numbers desired.)

Morris Scheibel, Chicago.—"Enclosed find two dollars, one for my subscription, the other for the welfare of Lucifer."

(Many thanks, Brother Scheibel, for timely aid, but did you not forget to send names of friends who, as you may think, would appreciate a trial subscription for three months? It is not too late now to send names. Autumn and winter are the best seasons for reading, and for thoughtful investigation and reflection.)

Alfred B. Westrup, 2 Fomento St., Havana, Cuba, Sept. 4, 1904.—"Your correspondent, 'Subscriber,' in issue of Aug. 18th, after commenting on the subject of free love, and recounting the wonderful things that free love will accomplish, says 'Free love solves the perplexing problems of our economic customs and conditions.' Since our economic condition is what prevents free love, how can his statement be true? The fact is, he as well as the majority of freelovers, freethinkers, etc., are totally blind to the fact that we have an arbitrary money system, and this money system is the means by which the few exploit the many, it is the cause of poverty. As long as it exists there will be poverty, and poverty will increase faster than population; and as long as poverty is thus produced, free love cannot exist. Economic independence of woman must precede free love. How shall we realize economic independence? Is the great and first problem to solve."

Not wishing to forestall or anticipate the answers that may be coming from R. B. Kerr and others, to the letter of our old-time friend, Alfred B. Westrup, formerly of Chicago, now of Havana, Cuba (see "Voices" column), it seems to me the logic of said letter is faulty. "Since our economic condition is what prevents Free Love," etc., says our Cuban friend, thus assuming as proved, or, at least, as admitted, one of the chief points in the controversy.

To some of us it seems more nearly correct to say that the sex-enslavement of woman is what prevents economic freedom, than it is to say that our economic enslavement is what prevents freedom in love; that is, prevents the emancipation of womanhood and motherhood, including the right of the child to be born well. That there is much of truth in both these lines of argument is freely admitted. Sex reform and economic reform must proceed together, and neither can achieve final triumph unaided by the other, but the question as to which of these takes precedence in the order of nature, in degree of importance, or in point of practicability without waiting for the full triumph of the other, is something upon which there is wide divergence of honest opinion. Meantime it strikes me that the use of dogmatic assumptions—such as "totally blind," "money system the (sole) cause of poverty," etc., are not the best evidence of the possession of superior wisdom. All admit that our "money of privilege," our legal tender money system, is one of the chief methods by which the masses of mankind of both sexes are robbed of their birthright, but that this is the only instrument of robbery and enslavement is true only to him who gives his attention so closely to the subject of finance that he has neither time, patience nor inclination to devote to the consideration of other factors in the great socio-religio-political problem. Steven T. Byington, East Cambridge, Mass.—"In No. 1,921 of Lucifer, R. B. Kerr asserts that birds are a lower order of life than mammals. Where does he get justification for this? Birds are warmer blooded than mammals, they have larger brains in proportion to their bodies, they are more highly organized in such matters as eye and voice, they have the power of flight, which mammals have not. (All this is in general; I know, for instance, that a bat can fly better than an ostrich.) The differentiation of the four limbs so as to have two for flight and two for walking or grasping is a distinct forward step in evolution. I believe there is no reason for putting mammals above birds except our conceit that because we have more intellect than the birds (though even man is beneath the best birds in most respects) therefore whatever creatures are nearest akin to us must be the highest. The care of parents for the young is a test where we should expect mammals to come out strong; but, in fact, our proverbs for such care are derived from birds rather than from beasts."

Bertha Moore, Williams Ave., Portland, Ore.—"The plucky little paper still lives! It cannot die. It is made of stuff that cannot be killed. The questions it considers will not be downed. They are as vital as the air we breathe. The paper is small, but made of pure grit. Opposition only proves that the enemy has been struck and wounded."

Alberta Joute, Mattoon, Ill.—"Through the kindness of some unknown friend I have been receiving copies of Lucifer all summer. You are engaged in a mighty work. If the world can only be brought to a realization of the importance of sex reform it will soon see that crusades against other forms of intemperance will be unnecessary. I shall be sending for other literature soon."

J. Allen Evans, Cripple Creek, Colo.—"Yours with one dollar received. I am again on my feet and slowly regaining my strength. I've lost 31 pounds in weight. Comrades from all directions have sent me about $20, in small amounts, without which I don't know what I would have done. Of course, being ill so long, I got in debt, but have instructed you and Free Society to say to comrades that they need send no more money. I'll pull through now without further help. Am no man to draw on my friends except in dire extremity. Expect to be able to reduce my indebtedness two or three dollars per week from this on. Will write a short article for Lucifer and enclose it with this letter. Whatever I write will be facts, and you may append my name. I don't think the mob in C. C. are likely to see it. They never read such literature as Lucifer. If they did they would not be guilty of such high-handed outrages as have been perpetrated here."

LeRoy Cummings, San Diego, Calif.—"Lucifer reaches first causes in the study of human destiny. No other periodical within my knowledge strikes so near the roots of our social troubles as does Lucifer."

Laura J. Langston, Poania, Colo.—"I gladly give the names of those who responded to your appeal in my behalf. I feel like another woman since receiving so much active sympathy. J. Warner Mills was the first to respond, and he is in the front rank of lawyers. Great was the surprise of those who sought to put their feet on my neck, when they learned that such men as Warner Mills was coming to my aid. Last, but not least, was Dr. Swinburn Clymer, enclosing five dollars and offering more if needed, and telling me he would settle my arrearage with your valuable paper. (This he did.—Ed. Lucifer.) Perhaps you know that Dr. Clymer is secretary of the Thompsonian Medical College of Allentown, Pa., also one of the faculty of that famous institution. Other good friends who came to my help are: Nellie M. Jerauld, Frank Weller, Emma A. Abbey, H. J. Dunham and A. Johnson.

"The fraternal feeling expressed by these good friends in their letters was like rain in drouth, for which I will gratefully remember them always. And you, Brother Harman, are not the least of those to whom gratitude is due."

B. W. G., Illinois.—"The article, 'Does Free Love Break Up Homes?' in No. 1,920, written by 'Subscriber,' is so good that I would like to have one thousand leaflets struck off, if the type is still standing, with an 'ad.' for Lucifer or some of its literature printed on the back. Please make a note of this in next Lucifer and see how many think as I do and are willing to spread Light Bearer literature at small cost."

(The type spoken of is not standing, but it can be reset if a few more readers would take the same interest in the matter that Bro. B. W. G. takes. The leaflet should not cost more than 25 cents per hundred, or $2 per thousand. Another subscriber says he will take 500 copies. The article in question is excellent for missionary work among those who do not understand what we mean by Freedom in Love.—M. H.)

Mrs. S. K., Los Angeles, Cal.: "For the enclosed ten cents (stamps) I beseech you to get the September issue of "Good Housekeeping" and read therein the most able, excellent and fearless article from the pen of Julian Hawthorne, entitled the "Abdication of the Father." May it elate you as much as it has me, to find such bold and splendid utterances—our very own sentiments, ideals and prophecies—verily flung in the faces of the conservatives through one of their most respected mediums. My enthusiasm in the cause has been kindled anew at this revelation that we really have more freedom of speech than we may be aware of, when such an epitome of much that Lucifer stands for can be given such a hearing where least expected. I reckon this a cause for joy and exhilaration. I long to spread that article broadcast, as I recall having read nothing more to the point from a confessed liberal, and I believe it is couched in language that will powerfully appeal to many who are ready to grasp its import, but are reached with difficulty as a rule. Hope you will reprint at least the latter part of this article in Lucifer."

[Many thanks for the news that Julian Hawthorne has written an article on Lucifer's lines. I remember with gratitude a powerful plea written by that very popular writer, in behalf of freedom of speech and of press for the discussion of questions pertaining to sex and to reproduction of human beings, and am very glad to know that Mr. Hawthorne has himself given utterance to radical thoughts on the tabooed subject.]

Celia B. Whitehead, Denver, Colo.: "I most heartily agree with your estimate of Dora Forster's articles on 'Sex Radicalism' and had hoped that they would be put in book form. They are too valuable to be lost."

W. F. Jamieson, Pentwater, Mich.: "Your argument in Lucifer on Evolution is the clearest, most satisfactory, in answer to the claim that evolution will do it all, that I have ever read. . . . You have had an uphill journey all the way for twenty-four years. Had you been a Methodist parson, all that hard work 'the Lord' would have blessed you for, in 'basket and in store,' and heaps on heaps of yellow-legged chicks. Like myself, you threw all these away because we came into possession of 'convictions' which compel us to sacrifice the good things of this world and no alluring prospect for a better world to come. . . . You are trying to tell the world 'how to be saved,' and you dig so deep to get at the root of the matter that purblind humanity cannot see."

John Orth, Boston, Mass.: "You are certainly a very appreciative young man. Franklin Wentworth says you are 'all right,' and I guess he was all right when he said so. Meat is sometimes pounded to make it tender. The thumping you have received seems to have had a like effect, making you not only tender but—true."

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

Theresa Hughes, Pittsburg, Pa.: "I see the talk about changing the name of Lucifer. I don't know, but it seems to me you cannot well find a better name, and the old readers will miss the old name almost as much as the paper itself. The main thing is, will the change of name benefit the paper? If so, why I would say change to the name which would be most beneficial. . . . I have followed with interest the controversies about which sex shall control in matters of sex. It is certainly well to know all that can be known, but after all, each loving couple will manage their sex ethics to suit themselves."

Cornelia Boecklin, N. Y.: "The article in Lucifer about what can be done on one acre was not an exaggeration. What I had from my first small garden in Burlington, Iowa, would seem marvelous to many. In Switzerland I have seen very, very good results from a small piece of ground. . . . To me it seems very strange to hear of so-called radical people finding fault with the name Lucifer. Do not believe you ever lost six subscribers on account of that name, and if you did you surely did not lose much. Why, "Liberty," Mr. Tucker's paper, has lost subscribers, and what is the matter with the name Liberty? Of lovers of freedom in every sense of the word, the number is not overwhelming. One draws the line at the color of a person's skin; another does not approve of a radical change in woman's mode of dress; another thinks that freedom in trade is a bad thing for his country, and so on. It seems incredible that thinking people should be afraid of freedom in any and all directions. . . . Received one copy of "Freeland" and enjoyed it very much. Co-operation is undoubtedly the thing but to practicalize it will of course take time. To get a few persons together to try it in a small way seems almost impossible. I am living alone. Waited for months to see if some of those people that were talking about co-operation would start in on same farm land thirty or forty miles from New York City. Went to see one farm and heard of other farm lands on Long Island, that could then have been bought for a very reasonable figure; not entirely in the rough, houses on the land that could be put in good shape with some labor. All to no purpose, and so I am living entirely alone."

Mrs. Boecklin's experience has many duplicates. We are all individualistic and narrowly selfish to such degree that it seems impossible to combine forces in rational and practicable co-operation in home making. A few experiments, however, in this line have been quite satisfactory to the participants, and when these partially successful plans have been merged in the larger scheme advocated by Dr. Hertzke, in his book called "Freeland," we shall see—those who live long enough—the full triumph of the co-operative principles now dreamed about by many thousands of very intelligent people. M. H.

POLYGAMY FOR THE WEALTHY.

Paris, Aug. 29.—A sensational book, advocating polygamy for the well-to-do interest of womankind, is being hurried through the press. It is signed "C. M.," and the monogram is surmounted by a royal crown. The authorship of this publication is credited to the kaiser's sprightly sister, the hereditary Princess Charlotte of Meiningen. After discussing several hundred cases "from life," gathered by a famous divorce lawyer, the royal author comes to the conclusion that men must have a matrimonial change after a certain age and income. "It would be well to grant the right to marry a second wife after the old one has ceased to be attractive, under certain restrictions," opines the princess, "because such a law, besides eradicating (more or less) the divorce habit, is desirable for the protection of the wife that has become obsolete, is intended to protect the rights of the children and would be an aid to morality." The Scriptures, she points out, treat the polygamous habits of Abraham, Jacob and David as "quite self-evident"—that "all of Jacob's children helped found the twelve tribes of Israel."

"As a correction of the evils under which women and children are suffering nowadays," continues the author, "divorce is wholly inadequate. The Catholic cannot get a divorce under any circumstances, and there are hundreds and thousands of good-natured Protestants and Jews who cannot bring themselves to divorce the woman who proved a beloved companion while young and beautiful.

"There is no use denying the fact that a man between his fortieth and fiftieth year undergoes a thorough change of taste and habits. Every day he sees a dozen women whom he prefers to his own wife, with whom he would like to begin life anew, to have his own and the world's profit. But it cannot be done without robbing the woman he once loved of home, position and friends, sometimes—so he leads a double life. That means disgrace for the woman of his second choice, and her children likewise—days of anguish, storm and stress for the first wife. In cases of this kind we advocate legalized plurality of wives, on the ground of morality, decency and common sense."

The princess says that only rich or well-to-do men, able to take care of two wives and their children, should be allowed to take a second wife, while women might be privileged to guard against the introduction of a second wife during their lifetime by inserting a clause to that effect in their marriage contracts.

"Permission to take a second wife would very largely reduce the surplus of unmarried but desirable women; at the same time it would help the working classes by removing competition from women who are now denied matrimony because there are not enough men to go around."—Ex.

Subscribers who receive more than one copy of Lucifer, when not ordered, will please use the extra copy or copies to induce their friends to subscribe, if only for a trial trip of three months for 25 cents. Stamps received in payment. As the paper weighs less than one ounce a copy can sent to a friend in a common 2 cent letter, with an ordinary sized sheet of note paper.

Here is where the weak man shows his weakness and the strong man his strength. HEALTH AND A FORTUNE FOR SALE AT A BARGAIN

"COTE BRILLIANT" is a finely improved thirty acre fruit ranch in the banner county (Sonoma) of the state of California. It is located one mile west of the town of Kenwood, three miles north of Glen Ellen and ten miles southeast of the city of Santa Rosa, with oiled and sprikled roads leading to these points. It is sixty-four miles north of San Francisco, and can be reached by the California and Northwestern railroad from Glen Ellen and the Southern Pacific from either Kenwood or Santa Rosa...There are four trains to and from San Francisco daily. It is convenient to good stores, schools and churches.

SEVEN YEARS AGO its deep rich soil was set to the best and most profitable kinds of fruit, consisting of peaches, pears, prunes and cherries. One year ago a splendid variety orchard was planted for home use, which contains an unlimited variety of the rarest nuts, fruits, berries and vines, from all parts of the world. Many of these will be in bearing next year.

THERE IS A GOOD living spring on the place, an extra large well of pure water and large windmill and tank. Water is piped to the house, cottage, barn, chicken yard and gardens. The orcharda require no irrigation whatever.

THE HOUSE WAS BUILT three years ago at a cost of over $5,000. It is a two story structure with attic and cellar. Is strictly modern. Has eight living rooms, bath-room, laundry and store-room.

THE ROOMS CONSIST of an elegant reception room, parlor, dining-room, kitchen with large pantry and a china closet connecting the kitchen with the dining-room, also laundry with two porcelain laundry tubs. Connecting with this is a store-room which leads to the cellar.

ON THE SECOND FLOOR are four large, light, sunny bedrooms, with roomy clothes-closets in each. There is also on this floor a large bath and toilet room, with porcelain bath-tub and marble wash-stand. The house is finished throughout in hardwood, with stained and oiled floors in each room. The house is piped throughout with hot and cold water, also for Acetylene Gas.

FIFTY YARDS SOUTH of the main building is a fine four-room cottage with high basement for storage. There is a fine barn, wagon shed, carpenter shop and other out buildings.

THERE IS A NICE large poultry yard, containing four chicken houses, an extra large brooding house and two extra large capacity incubators. Over 1,000 chickens can be nicely cared for.

THE PLACE IS FULLY equipped with all necessary farming implements, wagons, phaeton, cart etc.

THREE GOOD HORSES and a splendid Jersey cow go with the place.

THE CLIMATE in this section is unsurpassed and the place is a natural sanitarium where invalids rapidly recover. This would be an ideal place for a public sanitarium, and a quick fortune could be made by opening one at this point.

THE OWNER'S BUSINESS interests in Chicago compel an immediate sale. The place cost $15,000, but if sold at once $10,500 takes it. The place can be divided if necessary and easy terms can be arranged to suit. An offer of CLEAR well located Chicago (North or South side) property would be considered.

PHOTOGRAPHS of the interior and exterior of the house and different portions of the ranch may be seen upon request.

Address for further and important particulars, the owner, R. Wilkenson Moore, care "Lucifer," 500 Fulton st., Chicago.

SEX RADICALISM.

VII. SEX DENIAL UNDER BONDAGE AND UNDER FREEDOM.

We must always hasten to assure our puritan opponent that self-denial will have full place under a new and rational sex system. For he worships renunciation and self-negation,—that is, every puritan heartily approves of those for every other. They like the idea of love being robbed of its ambition, denied its highest desire, and cheated of its culmination. They will still find some of these things to gloat over under freedom, for only people of the lowliest designs in life can wholly escape them.

"The mark of rank in nature is capacity for pain,"—as well as capacity for joy, the poet, Mrs. Browning, might have added. The intenser forms of love and friendship have their sorrows and disappointments as surely as shadows accompany the fullest sunshine.

Carlyle told us, in a chapter that is rather too wordy for mature taste, that "the everlasting yea" is only to be attained by renunciation. He was a genuine Puritan, and preached more than he practiced, and his doctrine is not to be accepted without consideration; but some truth may be found in it. Renunciation is of value when there is freedom of choice, and when the good is renounced for the sake of the better, the less for the greater; and that is when there is knowledge of the difference between the good and the better.

But we may at once dismiss the idea that suffering is good in itself. As well say that the soldier is the stronger for the wound he incurs. Pain may evoke strength, but always wastes it.

The youth of noble nature does not go far in life before he loves some woman who is not for him. Of such feelings, puritan society makes a mock; and the only service the lover is allowed to render to his lady is to efface himself and disappear from her sight. The puritan prates of the elation of victory over self; but in reality the feelings of a beaten hound, who is allowed the luxury of looking miserable, are paradise compared to those of a lover thus forced into total renunciation. Our society puritans only recognize two possible motives in the aspirant lover,—if he does not want a good housekeeper, a complete wife, then he aims at obtaining sex favors which are held disgraceful outside wifedom. Greed and lust are intelligible to these puritans, but anything beyond is scarcely noticed, is mere sentiment, a word they have degraded to mean a butt for ridicule.

Under rational freedom love will be allowed expression in a hundred ways, and "sentiment" will be held honorable alike to the possessors of this faculty and to those who have the power of inspiring it. Such standards of love were known in old France, and maybe found elsewhere in history. At the present day, our weakling sentiments can sometimes succeed in honoring the dead by some worthy memorial, and we inscribe under a church window that it is to the glory of God and the memory of our departed friend. In the future temples of human solidarity there may be found works of art, of both utility and beauty, dedicated to the service of humanity and in honor of a living lady.

But our lover of the future time, while he will not have to suffer ignominy and total repression, will often have to set himself bounds, in accordance with restrictions that are unknown and unrecognized in our present vicious circle of celibacy, bond marriage and prostitution. There is a law of sex denial as well as of sex acceptance. It will be well understood that it is not refusal of sex favors that causes the most pain to the one refused, when there is the intensest form of feeling. One who is born to the fate of such feelings is "an epicure in emotions," like Sue in "Jude the Obscure." But the true lover will know when he must not claim the privilege of an answer; and the lover who refrains from pressing for certain refusal, even of the slightest sex favor, comes next in strength to the lover who refrains from pressing for certain concession. Not pride, but only love, can give this power. The true lover must not obtrude himself as a conquest. Even in accepted and settled love relations this holds good. As Bernard Shaw says, in one of the best pages he has ever written:

"Although romantic idealists generally insist on self-surrender as an indispensable element in true womanly love, its repulsive effect is well-known and feared in practice by both sexes. The extreme instance is the reckless self-abandonment seen in the infatuation of passionate sexual desire. Everyone who becomes the object of that infatuation shrinks from it instinctively. Love loses its charm when it is not free; and whether the compulsion is that of custom and law, or of infatuation, the effect is the same: it becomes valueless. The desire to give inspires no affection unless there is also the power to withhold; and the successful wooer, in both sexes alike, is the one who can stand out for honorable conditions, and, failing them, go without. Such conditions are evidently not offered to either sex by the legal marriage of to-day. . . . ("Quintessence of Ibsenism," III, The Womanly Woman).

The puritan of the common or garden sort knows nothing of these things. But where there is some amount of sex freedom, the ideal of denial, if I may so call it, and of the lover denying himself, is held high in honor. This is very noticeable in French literature. The husband in "Le Maitre de Forge" makes no attempt to claim his marital rights till he has obtained his wife's love and indeed her great respect, and is honored accordingly. Cold women even when heartless are a favorite theme. Balzac enjoys describing such a one in "La Peau de Chagrin." And Alfred de Musset's lyric, "Sur une Morte," beautiful and sarcastic with the chill steel of sarcasm, was inspired by a woman dead to love and pity. The loss to herself which her coldness involved is shown to be far worse than the pain to her admirer.

Yes: she had loved, were't not that pride
Like some poor useless lamp, uplighted
To burn a funeral bier beside,
Watched always at her heart benighted.

Yes: she is dead, whose lips were stirred
By no live breath to living glory:
Out of her hands has dropt the story,
Whereof she never read a word.
—(From Hardinge's translation.)

The lady of unawakened feeling is peculiarly a product of puritan society. Rudyard Kipling writes of the pathos of love encountering her careless indifference, in his poem, "The Vampire," written for Philip Burne-Jones' picture:

A fool there was and he made his prayer
(Even as you and I!)
To a rag and a bone and a hank of hair
(We called her the woman who did not care)
But the fool he called her his lady fair
(Even as you and I!)
. . . . . .
And now we know that she never could know,
And did not understand.

And while deep, enthusiastic love may thus fall a prey to the heartless indifference of the irresponsible flirt in our unmoral society, the more impetuous and lighter-loving youth under present social conditions is in no fit state to benefit by steady friendship, and he petulantly rejects the sisterly kindness which his lady fair may offer him. "Friendship is impossible," he groans. But that same man when he has reached the soothing conditions of sexual mating, finds outside friendship very possible; and indeed I believe that this is the more usual form that free love takes under the puritan conditions of English society. No doubt a dread of the vivisections of the divorce courts contributes somewhat to enforce this sort of "virtue"; but the lesson we may draw is, that when sexual starvation is abolished, the calmer forms of sexual friendship will flourish, and this is much to be desired.

A true pride in love cannot develop when nearly everyone has only the choice between the license of prostitution or bond marriage, on the one hand, and the drag on health and happiness that celibacy causes, on the other. Balanced conduct is not to be expected from men and women more or less starving for love. True virtue will come with knowledge and freedom. It cannot be doubted that a high ideal of fitness and discrimination in love and friendship will grow up when these are freed from dependence on economic conditions.

What we have really to combat is not so much the puritans' ideal of self-denial, as their system of enforced denial, and the sensuality and hypocrisy of those who pretend to uphold self-denial.

DORA FORSTER.

WILL IT BREAK UP HOMES?

Free Love will never break up homes. It will only break up discordant ones and that would be a blessing. Woman will always desire to make a home, if only for herself. There she can bring up her children, if she has them, even if the father be elsewhere. A true home is where harmony dwells and whether a woman prefers to live alone or with others should concern only herself.

When women are emancipated and Mrs. Grundy is dead, homes will be reared all the same, and vastly improved. It may be asked, if women alone make the home, what will become of the men? Are they to become helpless wanderers on the face of the earth?

By no means. They are not so helpless as women have thought, and as they themselves have often appeared to be. Many prefer now their own snug little quarters where no one may intrude, or if mutually preferred they can share with others of their own or the opposite sex.

O don't be alarmed, ye fearful, conservative ones who deplore the breaking up of homes. None will be broken that deserve to remain intact. All things will work together for good, not alone now, but when all mankind are free.

This brings me to another part of the subject. If all mankind were free at the present stage of the world's progress, without restrictions of any kind, how terrible conditions would be! Imagine the criminal class let loose. Human nature will not change suddenly, and there are astonishingly undeveloped people upon the earth. Surely we cannot mean that no government should exist—no restraining laws.

Let it be the one law that no one shall encroach upon the rights of others, nor wrest from them whatever possessions they have acquired, either through their mental or physical toil or through inheritance. This covers the whole ground. Freedom to all to live as they please, provided they allow each to do the same, and, what is most important, put no impediment in the way of others' advancement in order to contribute towards their own selfish gains.

Any offending one should be restrained and surrounded by educational and industrial influences. No legal murders or tit-for-tat methods, no dismal dungeons where all hope is excluded.

Under certain circumstances, however, I believe one is justified in killing in self-defense, just as we would kill a wild beast did we know it were ready to spring upon us.

There should be stringent laws for the protection of good citizens, and the physically or mentally weak or infirm.

To say there would be no criminal class if there were no laws is a very ignorant statement and to say further that there is not a class that would need the strong hand of restriction is not to understand human nature and its present state of development at its worst.

Those who are absolutely lawless are those who are supremely selfish and who while they exact free scope would undoubtedly encroach upon the rights of others.

And Labor Unions, primarily organized for the protection of the laborer, have degenerated into the most tyrannous government. What right have the heads of any organization to dictate who shall or who shall not work? That is a question that should be decided by every separate individual. I don't believe the interests of the workingman are furthered by such a procedure as what is termed "a strike."

I have wandered from my original subject, but everything of this kind has a bearing upon all. It may not have occurred to most women that if they gained perfect emancipation they might, like the Puritans, become tyrannical and dictatorial towards men. Freedom for women should mean likewise freedom for men, and should eradicate all jealousy, hatred and malice. In time it will, but not soon. As women and men continue to progress they will more and more understand the full meaning of Freedom, and they will become consistent, just and generous. Then, and not till then, will that hydra headed monster, jealousy, wedded to selfishness and fostered in the bosom of institutional marriage, be driven from the human mind.

THE ECONOMIC EMANCIPATION OF WOMEN.

People are always talking of woman's "economic independence," and the wonderful things which will happen when she has got it. Scarcely any, however, have a clear idea as to what would constitute such economic independence. Let us, therefore, inquire what the phrase really means.

I think it is evident that, in order to be independent, a woman must have the means of subsistence for herself and children secured to her without the favor of any other individual. It is essential that she should have the means to maintain her children, for a woman's children are almost a part of herself. Whoever feeds the children will control the mother.

Now, how are women to be supplied with the means of supporting themselves and children without the favor of any other individual? American Socialist lecturers are very fond of telling women how independent Socialism will make them. Unfortuntely, they rarely explain how, and I am afraid it is because they have not thought the matter out themselves. Most of them seem to mean simply that under Socialism every woman will be guaranteed work, and will be paid the full equivalent of her labor after the necessary deduction for collective purposes.

If there were only adult men and women in the world, this might be regarded as settling the whole matter. But there are children to be supported, and the bearing and rearing of these children takes up much of the mother's time which might otherwise be spent on productive work. It is very likely that for a long time to come all women fit to be mothers will have to average at least three children apiece to keep the population even. At whose expense is all this to be done? At the best the earning power of women will probably be less than that of men. Are women to take on their own shoulders the whole expense of pregnancy, of nursing and rearing three children each, and of supplying them with food and clothes? Such a thing would be utterly absurd.

In fact, most people who talk about the economic independence of women do not think of anything like this. They really believe in the continuation of the present system with some slight alleviations. They think of women as still minding the babies and darning the stockings at home, while the man goes out and earns the money as of old. They want women to be better fed slaves, but still slaves. Women, however, will not submit to this, and will come to see that in order to be free they must be entirely independent of every individual man for the support of themselves and children.

There is only one way out of the difficulty. Woman cannot bring up her children at her own expense. She cannot be free and allow any other individual to pay for bringing them up. Therefore the community must pay the bill. This is the view that all the classic writers on Socialism have taken, although many of the small fry do not like the idea. As Frederick Engels says, in his "Origin of the Family":

> "With the transformation of the means of production into collective property the monogamous family ceases to be the economic unit of society. The private household changes to a social industry. The care and education of children becomes a public matter. Society cares equally for all children, legal or illegal."

We must guard against one error, however. The early Socialists rather favored the idea of taking the children out of the parents' hands as far as possible. That will never do. We must give the mother perfect control of the children. At the same time we must make her economically independent by paying her for her time spent in pregnancy and rearing the children, and giving her an allowance for the keep of each child. By this means we shall combine public maintenance with private management of children.

How far can this subject be dealt with under the present economic system? The Socialist parties of all countries have long lists of immediate demands which they hope to realize while waiting for Socialism. There is rather a tendency, however, to think that very little can be done for women until Socialism is obtained. But that is nonsense. This question could be more easily dealt with than most others under the present system. The experience of New Zealand, Australia, and several European countries shows that the easiest kind of palliative to apply under capitalism is one which consists in giving a pension or allowance out of the public funds. Old age pensions exist in various countries. Why not young age pensions? As for the maintenance of women during pregnancy, and for some time after child birth, I am glad to see that the recent International Socialist Congress at Amsterdam passed a resolution urging the Socialists of all countries to try and get legislation for this purpose passed at once.

It is a curious fact that, although America has the most unconventional women in the world, it has the most Grundy-ridden Socialist party in the world. To mention sex and the family in a meeting of American Socialists would be considered almost as shocking as to allude to these subjects in a Boston drawing room. It is time to make an end of such squeamishness. I therefore move that a committee consisting of Adeline Champney, Elsie Cole Wilcox and Amy Lisnett, be appointed to prepare a manifesto demanding practical guaranties for the economic independence of women; to get as many Socialist women as possible to sign it; and to send it to the press and bring it before the various Socialist conventions. They should also include a demand that the mother be made sole guardian of her children in all states. By taking these steps it will be possible to bring the whole question of the emancipation of women rapidly to the front.

R. B. KERR.

NOR PSYCHIC MARRIAGE LAWS.

There are few of us, I think, who do not consider that the sentence, "What God has joined let not man part," (as Prof. Larkin puts it), is a superstitious bit of church tyranny. As an assurance of wedded happiness, it is a complete failure. Throwing rice and old shoes after a wedded couple is no more superstitious and no greater failure in securing their happiness.

Prof. Larkin says the priestly sentence, "Whom God has joined let no man part," is a "psychological crime." I don't deny this, but what of his scheme? It would not be polite to say things of Prof. Larkin's plans that we freely say of the church ceremony. For my part, I see no less superstition (I wish I could think of some other, milder word) in "What psychic schools have joined, let no man part," than in the sentence Prof. Larkin calls a crime. I have no more faith in "auras" than I have in gods, or rice, or old shoes.

Many people have plans to close the doors of hideous divorce courts, but they are mostly failures, for few people, comparatively, live together who really wish to live apart, and I see no reason to believe that "psychic marriage laws" will be any more effective in keeping them together.

There is, no doubt, a great deal of suffering and inharmony caused by people living together who are inharmonious, but I believe it is circumstances oftener than law that hold them together, and the suffering caused by adverse decisions of psychic schools could not but be more poignant and agonizing.

Young people have a habit of falling in love with each other suddenly, deeply, intensely, passionately. They might reach this stage before they have time to consult a "psychic marriage law." To them the music of their love is so sweet and clear—at least so pleasing—that the thought never occurs to them that their "auras" are not attuned in harmony. Suppose the decision is an adverse one—they discover that their auras are in A and G, instead of musical chords—that they will make each other miserable in the future and help to fill the world with "unharmonious children." So say the "psychic teachers" and "readers of auras," from whom there is no appeal if firmly supported by faith or state. If the lovers are firm, devoted believers, in psychic schools, or if the psychic marriage laws are firmly established by state machinery, they will tear themselves or be torn asunder, regardless of the rending and tearing of heart-strings. But if they are sensible people, and if the schools are established as Mr. Harman would have them, without the fangs of the state; if they are self-poised, egoistic, self-reliant—they will decide that no one, professor of psychics, aura reader or what not, is more capable of deciding their lives or future happiness than they themselves!

Once upon a time I happened to be for a few days in a home where a loving young couple spent most of their time previous to the wedding day. They were both young, handsome, loving, lovable. Their billing and cooing was as pretty as that of turtle doves. She was a sweet, simple, timid, little maiden; he an experienced man of the world, quite seriously attracted for the moment by her pretty face. It did not require a "reader of auras" or a "psychic teacher" to see in the future the inevitable heartache, suffering, desertion and divorce, all of which came in the course of time. I could have foretold it then as well as any psychic marriage lawyer—but what effect would it have had? or if anything could have been said that would have induced them to part then, would there have been any less suffering? I doubt it. The denial of unfulfilled desire, the suppression of love's expression, the silencing of the music of their souls (they heard no discords), would have caused them keener sorrow, greater unhappiness, than any trouble that could come along in the course of time. She is now married to a more congenial mate, but she would now say that if she could she would not have her first love experience taken out of her life. The love and happiness enjoyed more than balanced the subsequent sorrow.

It is a dangerous thing to meddle in the love affairs of others, whether the meddler be a common individual or a psychic teacher, a reader of auras or a psychic marriage law school.

MONEY OF PRIVILEGE.

EDITOR OF LUCIFER, Dear Comrade:

Perhaps if I fully comprehended your meaning I should agree with you that our "money of privilege" and "our legal tender money system" mean the same thing; but with my present understanding such an inference seems to me incorrect.

Our "money of privilege" comes from the National Banking System and the notes of that gigantic concern are not legal tender, as anyone may see from reading the inscriptions thereon. If A owes B one hundred dollars and tenders him that amount in bank notes B is at liberty to refuse it and demand legal tender and A cannot, as the lawyers say, "plead tender" in discharge of the debt.

The bankers have worked hard, ever since their system was established during the stress of the civil war, to destroy all the legal tender paper money and I believe have succeeded to the extent that there are now only $360,000,000 that have not been legally destroyed. How much has been destroyed surreptitiously we do not know.

We are plundered in many ways, but for bare-faced, high-handed, wholesale, unmitigated, inexcusable robbery of the people the National Banks can claim the championship. The system is based on debt and exists to perpetuate and create debt, public and private, and gather in the wreckage thereof. It has no other purpose. National bankers, literally, "live on the interest of what they owe"; while the rest of us must pay interest on what we owe. It is only ignorance on the part of the people that allows such a system to exist and fatten on their industry. So long as there are laws for the collection of debts (I would that every one were repealed) I think it the duty of the people, collectively, to furnish a legal tender for their discharge and do away with the "money of privilege" which at present constitutes nearly all of our currency.

I beg your pardon for taking up your time with this matter but I never think of the national banking system without a rising of indignation that must have vent.

LUCIFER: ITS MEANING AND PURPOSE.

LUCIFER—The planet Venus; so called from its brightness.—Webster's Dictionary.

LUCIFEROUS—Giving light; affording light or the means of discovery.—Same.

LUCIFIC—Producing light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing, and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. VII. NO. 23.

ERRATA: The signature to the comment upon the letter of Alfred B. Westrup in last LUCIFER should have been M. H. instead of L. H.

The installment of the series entitled "The Right to Be Born Well," in last issue should have begun with the words, "Continued From No. 1022."

TO FRIENDS who may feel interested will say that I still expect to go to St. Louis about the 15th of the month. My address will be in care of Geo. E. Light, 520 Commercial Bldg., St. Louis, Mo.

A WORD OR TWO FOR YOU.

Summer is now gone. Autumn once more is here. Autumn, brown and sere; autumn, crown of the year; autumn, season of reflection; of careful restrospection; of calmly searching introspection, and for laying of plans for the coming year.

Assuming that you—the reader of these lines, as well as I, the writer thereof, feel an abiding interest in the welfare of the paper a copy of which you hold in your hand, I ask you to give me a few moments of your time, valuable as that time may be.

During the great civil war in the United States it was the custom of the national congress at Washington, to resolve itself, now and then, into a "committee of the whole on the sttae of the Union"—or words to that effect. That is to say, each member of the two houses of the congress was then expected to speak his mind freely and without ceremony, upon any questoin pertaining to the common welfare.

Last May, after a suspension of nearly two months, the causes of which suspension need not be repeated here, LUCIFER was revived as a fortnightly, instead of weekly, as heretofore. This change to fortnightly was intended to be temporary, rather than permanent, while considering the following questions:

(1) Shall the paper called LUCIFER the Light Bearer be continued?

(2) If so, where shall it be published?

(3) If it is to live, what shall be its name?

(4) What shall be its price per annum?

(5) What its period of issue, weekly, fortnightly or monthly?

In other words the suggestion was made that the friends, subscribers and supporters of LUCIFER should resolve themselves into a "committee of the whole" and decide whether or not it were wise to continue the struggle to keep the paper alive in the face of obstacles that, to many, seemed very discouraging if not quite insurmountable; also, to consider the propriety of certain important changes, in case it is to be continued.

As the supporters of LUCIFER are widely scattered it was to be expected that several months would elapse before all could be heard from, and so it has proved. The list of answers is a long one, and still they continue to come. Under the head, "Answers to Questions," many of the responses have been published in these columns, but not near all; perhaps not half.

That it was a good thing to go into "committee of the whole" in regard to the continued life or early death of LUCIFER will, as I think, be conceded by all who wish to see the paper live. The affirmative answers were so tremendously in the majority that it may truthfully be said there has been but one opinion expressed on that point. A very large proportion of those who responded at all emphasized their opinion by a renewal or a liberal contribution towards paying the debts incurred during the late period of conflict with the postal authorities, and to offset the losses caused by cutting off the names of many hundreds of delinquent subscribers, in obedience to postoffice rulings, most of whom, judging from past experience, would have paid up and renewed their subscription if time had been allowed them, and if the paper had been continued to their address. While some of these delinquents have renewed and paid up arrearages the far greater portion seem to have taken offense at being thus peremptorily cut off, and have become indifferent or wholly forgetful of LUCIFER's existence.

To make good these losses a few of our old-time friends circulated a special call, an emergency call, which brought sufficient aid to pay off the debts aforesaid, and to furnish a little reserve to be used when subscriptions and renewals should become slack, as they always do in the latter part of summer and early fall months.

Another and perhaps still more important result of the discussions over the question of continued life for the paper is that those most earnest in their desire to see it live have made special effort to get new subscribers, with the result that, while a few have dropped out during the summer, the number of paid up, or paid ahead, subscribers, has been very materially increased; this, too, notwithstanding the fact that the present is what is called a "Presidential year," a year in which nearly everybody becomes more or less demented over the question as to who shall be our king for the next four years, and which of the great parties shall get the benefit of the enormous stealage from the pockets of the people, which stealage goes by the euphonious name of "presidential patronage"!

Another very gratifying result of the discussion of life or death for LUCIFER has been the rousing from slumber of a large number of our old-time writers. Many of these have surpassed their former record in the number and ability of their contributions, so that it is now a question of what to leave out, rather than what to insert, so many very excellent articles are being constantly offered. Not only have the old-time contributors been roused to a sense of their duty, but new ones also have been attracted by the earnestness and ability of the discussions on radical lines. Among the new candidates for a place in LUCIFER's columns are William Platt, author and publisher of London, and Professor L. E. Larkin, director of Mt. Lowe Observatory, near Los Angeles, Calif. One article from each of these distinguished writers has been printed, and more are promised.

A review of the discussions called out by the other four questions,—those relating to change of name, of place of publication, of frequency of issue, and price of subscription, these will have to be deferred till next issue.

Meantime, dear reader, now that our quadrennial political craze is nearing its close, when it is expected the average citizen will resume his normal condition and again become amenable to reason and approachable on questions of human interest on other lines than those of partisan politics, may I ask you, kindly patient reader, to make a little extra effort to extend LUCIFER's circulation?

Next year will be LUCIFER's quarter centennial; will you help it to begin its quarter centennial year with a much larger subscription list than ever before? Fall and winter are the reading months of the whole year. If people will not read these long winter nights they are not apt to read much at any other season.

Please let us hear from you. Write to us for subscription cards, for bunches of LUCIFERS for free distribution, also for leaflet literature. Perhaps a club to meet weekly for exchange of radical literature and for the discussion of reformatory topics, could be formed in your neighborhood.

Will you try to form such a club?

The Appeal to Reason is calling the "long roll," and is getting responses by the hundred, by the thousand and by the hundred thousand. It expects to have a million subscribers by the opening of the new year.

Is LUCIFER's educational work of less importance than is that of the Appeal to Reason?

Again, good friend, whoever you are, wherever you are, shall we hear from you?

Not to-morrow; not next week or next month, but now, shall we hear from you?

CONSCIOUS EFFORT IN EVOLUTION.

A SYMPOSIUM.

Two weeks ago, being laid up for repairs, I substituted a few paragraphs by Edwin C. Walker for my own intended reply to the article of Jonathan Mayo Crane on "Conscious Effort in Evolution" in No. 1022, page 167. The following letter, not intended for publication but sent with permission to publish, in part, if I should so desire, is herewith given in whole, as its own best explanation:

"My Dear Brother Harman:

"I am sorry you are ill again—or rather that you were ill again, for I hope you have recovered by this time. I regret that you did not feel well enough to answer my effort on 'conscious effort in evolution.' I think Walker made a poor job of it, his illustrations really supporting instead of refuting my position. He misrepresented me—doubtless unintentionally—in saying I was arguing against the position that conscious effort is a factor in evolution. On the contrary I maintain that it is a factor but that it cannot and does not either hasten or retard evolution. The idea that it does so, I believe, is merely an illusion, somewhat similar to the common illusion of sitting in a stationary car which a train is passing and feeling that the car in which you are sitting is the one which is moving. We see effects follow conscious efforts and imagine that those effects prove that our efforts hasten evolution, whereas our efforts are the effect of causes in the infinite chain of causes in evolution. But I have written to the Truth Seeker an answer to Walker and hope it will be published this week.

"I do not oppose conscious effort. I believe in it and urge it, but I know that causes which I may not discover compel me to favor it and urge it. The conditions of humanity as they present themselves to you through your vision have a material effect on the molecules of your brain, causing you to carry on your noble crusade. You may say, 'But it is a matter of choice with me; I could cease my efforts if I wished to.' But you cannot wish it—it is impossible so long as the causes exist which compel you to make what seems to you to be a free choice. Those who do cease their efforts are those whose natures are less responsive, less sensitive to the causes which formerly impelled them than yours is. In other words the causes for their ceasing to make efforts to improve the condition of humanity are just as real, fully as potent, as those which cause you to continue your efforts. We are part of nature.

"In nature there can be no sin. The blasted ear is as natural as the perfect one. Comstock is compelled by his nature to pursue his course by causes as irresistible as those which compel you to oppose him. The weed is as natural as the potato, but that is no reason why we should not remove the good potatoes. I am as much opposed to Comstock as you are. I wish it were in my power to undo the mischief he has done. My belief that he is compelled to do what he does, does not make me any the less opposed to him, for I am compelled by my nature to oppose him. I am heartily in sympathy with the cause for which you are battling; my nature compels me to be so.

"It may seem paradoxical to you and Walker and Barnard that a man who believes that all things are what they must be would feel any interest in trying to bring about better conditions. But to me it is not paradoxical, because I feel the need of better conditions and am compelled to work to secure them. Although all things are now and have been in the past what they must be, or had to be, they are not now what they must be to-morrow and I am working for to-morrow; so are you. So you see I am not the least bit pessimistic. I have yet great confidence in evolution. I believe your efforts, and my efforts and Walker's efforts and Barnard's efforts are factors in it. I believe you are doing a good work, that it has had good effects and that it will have still further good effects, but all these efforts are part of evolution and the causes of them extend so far back that we cannot discover their origin—if they are not eternal.

"This letter is not meant for publication, but I have no objection to your quoting from it if you wish to write on the subject. I simply want to impress you with the fact that a belief in a continuous chain of causes and effects does not destroy incentive to action, as Barnard maintained that it did. I wish Barnard would write something for LUCIFER on this subject. Kind regards to the rest of the household. Sincerely, your friend,

"JONATHAN MAYO CRANE."

If the reader will kindly re-read the symposium begun in No. 1021, in the paragraph entitled "Incentives to Action," appended to the article "Heart to Heart Talks," he will see that there is not much, if any, real cause of antagonism between Bros. Crane, Walker and myself on the question at issue. If there be a real difference it would seem to be as to whether evolution can be hastened or retarded by conscious human effort. So far as the logical argument is concerned, the mathematical argument, so to speak, I am willing to concede that Bro. Crane has the advantage, but so far as the concrete facts are concerned, it seems to me my position is the more tenable.

But truth is many-sided, nature is full of paradoxes, and hence it may turn out that we are both right and both wrong.

I have myself often argued precisely as Bro. Crane argues. I have likened each human being to a planet in its path through the skies. While the planet is drawn and driven, pulled and pushed, by a multitude of conflicting forces, attractions and repulsions, these conflicting forces are so well known that the astronomer can predict with certainty the hour or even the minute the "wanderer" will return to a given relative position to other bodies in the solar system. That is to say, by long observation astronomers have learned to foretell where a planet will be and how it will behave itself at any given time, though it be years or even centuries ahead.

Reasoning from analogy we argue that if we could see all impelling causes of action, all the links in the chain of causes, dating back millions of centuries perhaps, as Brother Crane says, we would be able to predict with equal certainty where any particular human being would be, and how he would behave, at any given time in the future—on the theory that, like the planet we all do as we must, and cannot possibly do otherwise; that all the secret springs of action, our desires, likes and dislikes, our innermost thoughts, ideals and aspirations, are as much the result of inexorable "causation" as are the forces that pull and push the planet in its march through the heavens.

This is the theory to which I gave the name "materialistic." Perhaps the term "physical" would suit it better, for, with Brother Crane, "I know not the boundary between the material and the immaterial." I do not, however, say the "ego, the conscious man, is immaterial," as he seems to infer that I do. While waiting for "more light" I think it best to confess my ignorance and call myself simply an inquirer, a pupil in life's great school. All I wish to say just now, in this connection, is that the physical theory, founded on the analogy drawn from the planet in its celestial orbit, does not fully satisfy me. It is good so far as it goes, but, as I now think, it needs to be supplemented by the "psychic" side, the metaphysical side—not the immaterial side, of the problem of life.

I shall doubtless be asked, "What evidence have you that there is a psychic side, a metaphysical side, to Nature?"

Well, this is a long story and I doubt the propriety of entering upon an elaboration of the psychic theory in this article. Later on I may try my "'prentice hand." Just now other things seem more important.

I am glad to know that his view of evolution does not prevent Brother Crane from working for radical reform, as it certainly does in multitudes of cases. A year ago I was the guest of an old-time friend and helper in Kansas City, Mo.—a man of rare learning and possessor of great powers for logical argument. When asked why he no longer takes LUCIFER, though abundantly able to do so, and why he no longer works for radical reforms, his answer in substance, if not in exact words, was as follows:

"What's the use?. By our own puny efforts we may make ourselves and our neighbors miserable but we can neither hasten nor retard evolution. All in good time these radical reforms will be here. When the earth is ripe for them they will come, and not before. So long as Mother Earth murders her children, as she now does by storms, drouths, earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, etc., etc., just so long we may expect her children to murder, rob and enslave each other. Take things easy. Don't worry. Take care of yourself by taking advantage of Nature's opportunities, including, of course, the laws and customs and vices and follies of your fellow men."

Everywhere on my western trip I found Freethinkers of this type; men of keen intellect, ready at any time to "throw a stone at Jehovah," and show the folly and absurdity of all theologies. This was and is easy, and also quite safe, for, have not Hume, Voltaire, Paine, Ingersoll and a multitude of liberal clergymen, made it popular to do so?

But when asked to carry the logic of freethought into the realm of social and creative life; when asked to do battle for the central Demand of Liberalism, namely, that "all laws enforcing Christian morality be abrogated, and that all laws be made to conform with natural morality, equal right and impartial liberty"—when asked to help educate the public mind in the direction of impartial liberty for the affectional nature, as well as in the realm of the religious nature—Oh! Ah! that's altogether different. To advocate freedom in love as we advocate freedom of worship, would bring us into conflict with our neighbors and with the laws, and might land us behind prison bars!

Much in the same way do these self-seeking champions of Evolution talk and act when radical reforms in economics and politics are proposed. To advocate radical reform in finance and economics is to be known as a "Socialist," a "Single-taxer" or "Communist," and to advocate radical reforms in politics is to be called an "Anarchist," a "Revolutionist," a "Terrorist," and our ease-loving Freethinker shuns all suspicion of taint of any of these heresies with almost as great care as he shuns the suspicion of being a "Freelover."

A few months ago the oldest of the papers known as organs of Freethought, the Boston Investigator, went out of existence. As a champion of Freethought on the line just described, the line that excludes all radical reforms except the theological, the Investigator was perhaps the type, leader, unless perhaps the Freethought Magazine, also deceased within the past year, should share that distinction. With none of the feeling of rivalry supposed to be inseparable from the business of journalism, and while freely giving all due honor to these two deceased contemporaries for the good they did while living, I will venture to ask if there is no connection between the easy-going, self-satisfied philosophy of the Evolution-will-do-it-all Freethinker and the untimely death of these two representatives of conservative Freethought?

Several other points in Bro. Crane's letter tempt a brief comment but will only notice one more for this time. As to "illusions." All illusions are not delusions. Take the mirage in the desert or on the trackless ocean. It is an illusion, but it is also a true picture of a concrete reality existing in nature, and if it has the effect of reviving hope in the breast of the fainting and despairing beholder, and if it inspires renewed effort to obtain the attainable, the useful, the desirable, then the illusion is not to be despised or sneered at by coldly severe mathematical science.

LUCIFER'S HELPERS.

Since last acknowledgment the following names have been added to the list of those who have sent help to keep receipts equal to expenditures during the summer and fall months:

Tom Swinburn, $1; Fred. P. Young, $1.50; R. J. Warp, 25c; C. M. Smock, 50c; P. R. Skinner, $2; John S. Barber, $3; H. Celler, 50c; Belle Chaapel, $1; E. C. McDonald, $1; Ed. Wenning, $1; Morris Scheibel, $1; R. H. Walker, $1; Irene Ewbanks, 50c; Bertha Moore, $1; R. C. Clymer, $1; E. M. Taber, $1; John Cameron, 25c; M. H. Coffin, 25c; Dora Forster, $2.50; Adler Jorgensen, $1; G. W. G. Wright, 50c; E. M. Dewey, $2.

Many if not most of these helpers when sending financial aid sent names of friends to whom they wish LUCIFER sent for a longer or shorter term. A few sent a dollar each for an extra copy to be sent to themselves for distribution; others again, whose names do not appear, sent a few stamps each to swell the "sample copy fund."

To all who in any of these ways have identified themselves with the work to which LUCIFER is devoted, sincerest thanks are due from those upon whom the chief responsibility falls of seeing that the inevitable monthly bills are paid.

Subscribers who receive more than one copy of Lucifer, when not ordered, will please use the extra copy or copies to induce their friends to subscribe, if only for a trial trip of three months for 25 cents. Stamps received in payment. As the paper weighs less than one ounce a copy can sent to a friend in a common 2 cent letter, with an ordinary sized sheet of note paper.

The preservation of health is at least not less important than the preservation of Hebrew mythology; and communities who force their children to sacrifice a large portion of their time to the study of Asiatic miracle-legends might well permit them to devote an occasional hour or two to the study of modern physiology.—Felix L. Oswald.

P. R. Skinner, Albany, Ore. "I enclose five ($5.00) dollars to extend my subscription to LUCIFER, the Light Bearer. Long may it continue to shine. Are Mrs. M. E. C. and Mrs. M. A. P. subscribers to LUCIFER? If so, extend their subscriptions one year. If not, send it to each of them one year, and credit me with the balance."

Bolton Hall, New York. "I am surprised at Alexander Horr in his otherwise excellent article on Hertzka's 'Free Land'—writing of wages, interest and profit Mr. Horr must know that 'profit' is compounded only of wages, rent, interest and the exactions of monopoly. . . . But it was probably a mere slip, for Mr. Horr is a keen thinker and no Socialist."

B. F. Hyland, Corvallis, Ore. "Enclosed find P. O. order for $5. Send me "The Cost of Something for Nothing," by John P. Altgeld, and credit the four dollars on subscription. Then, if you please, give this question a prominent place in the dear old Light Bearer: "Is it possible for life of any kind to exist where oxygen, nitrogen and hydrogen do not exist? In other words, where none of the elements of air and water can be found, or where either of these elements are lacking? Ask everybody to answer and answer yourself."

F. S. Weaver, Coe, Ind. "Please step me up another 50 cents' worth. My wife and I visited the Fair, finding Mr. R. H. Walker and wife, 1903, St. Louis avenue, pleasant people, and their home a desirable stopping place. If you ever noticed, animals with comparatively small testes, are, and ever have been, doomed to extinction, while the bi-products of the sheep, cow, and others of strong virility secure immunity; it is no less true with mankind, and thus the injunction against lust, sexing for amusement, which deprives man of his manhood, and woman of her senses. The cultivation of passion has deprived many women of the ability to know their period of greatest desire, while few men are able to distinguish this period as readily as the ordinary brute does of his females; and the unsatisfying debauchery upon unripe female leads to divorce, suicide or insanity. . . . The study of sex freedom is one of race continuance or race extinction."

Katharine S. Fry, 333 South Hope street, Los Angeles, Calif. "You wish to know something of the Club [Los Angeles Light Bearer Club]. We are holding the meetings every two weeks at the home of Mrs. Spaulty, on East Fiftieth street. Our aim is to discuss timely topics, exchanging ideas as to theory and practice. This we do in an informal way that I enjoy very much, and believe to be very beneficial not to myself alone but to others as well. I gave you Mrs. Bensen's name as secretary, but as the dear little woman is sick you may give my name and address and say that anyone desiring information concerning the club can obtain it by writing to me. LUCIFER reaches us the day we hold our meetings and thus comes in for immediate consideration."

[It is encouraging to know that the Los Angeles Light Bearer Club is still keeping up regular meetings. Mrs. Fry says the attendance fell off somewhat during the summer months. This was to be expected, but now that the long evenings of fall and winter have come again it is hoped our friends and readers in Los Angeles and vicinity will not forget the fortnightly meetings of the Light Bearer Club. That this club and similar organizations all over the country might become the means of extending and making more effective and more permanent LUCIFER's educational work needs not to be said. Is there not in every large city and town in the United States one woman or man who will take the initiative in forming a club similar to that in Los Angeles, whose chief purpose is to discuss questions of reform that are ignored and tabooed by the conventional society? A few have lately volunteered, in more than one great center of thought, to do this, who do not wish their names published just yet.]

BOOKS RECEIVED.

The Physical Culture Pub. Co. has issued a new book by Margaret Grant. From the announcement we quote:

"'A Child of Love' is the life history of a girl who comes into the world marked by the bar sinister of love out of wedlock, and who makes a brave fight for existence without asking any favors from the world because of her sex. Some of life's problems are brought home to her and she is compelled to try to solve them.

"Which is nobler, motherhood in love or legal prostitution? Is nudity nasty, or is it pure and sweet? Must a girl be a weakling just because she is a girl? Is a man a woman's natural enemy, or her natural friend? Must a woman traffic in her body in order to live? These and other questions come into her life, as they come into the lives of all women; and bravely, nobly, she tries to solve them; bravely and nobly she tries to live a sweet, pure life.

"Born in a workhouse in New England, of a union unsanctioned by the law, she is left an orphan at a tender age and puts on boy's clothing in order that she may earn a living. A sea voyage and a shipwreck take her into old Japan before the days of its modern civilization. There startling ideas of nudity, marriage, divorce are brought to her attention; and she is taught to see that many of the ideas prevalent in her own land lead to impurity instead of purity. Finally, filled with notions which are in direct variance with those of her own country, she returns home to fight for her existence, friendless and endowed with that beauty which is considered the lonely girl's curse in our land of boasted civilization. But she is well equipped for the struggle. She is physically as strong as a boy, so that if need be she can give blow for blow. Love may lure, but she walks through dangers with a firm step, guided by the light of knowledge. Sex has no mystery for her; she is pure and strong because she knows. Three young men, fighting like herself for life, become her companions. She shocks them. They live alone without chaperon. They try to force their moral system on her; she teaches them hers. Moral health contends with moral disease.

"The adventures of little Margaret in old Japan, being authentic, hold the reader entranced. It is a strange and new story she tells of the startling ways of a race which within twenty-five years has leaped from world obscurity to a first place in the ranks of world powers. She found herself in a land where all the men were gentlemen, all the women ladies; where marriage and divorce were private affairs; where nudity was commonplace—men and women bathing together—but where a woman would be disgraced who exposed any part of her body to attract the notice of men; where children were never struck in anger; where sex matters were no more mysteries than food matters.

"This story is a help to mothers and fathers; it is a guide for girls."

A PROTEST.

As I think the readers of LUCIFER know I do not believe, and seldom indulge, in prolonged controversy, but when I am so hideously misunderstood as instanced by a communication signed Ada Wright in LUCIFER, No. 1023, I make one despairing effort to set myself right. What have I ever said that could lead anyone to think I believed in having a woman "forced into motherhood without her consent or desire"? Not only do I view enforced motherhood with utter abhorrence but I look with the same detestation on the forcing of a woman to an act which, naturally, leads to motherhood even though the natural consequences be prevented. I would have woman wholly free—not simply free not to be a mother.

I would not have her precious time devoted to securing any such sulking, makeshift, half-way freedom as is offered by preventives.

Nothing, to my mind, can be more horrible, more debasing to both participants, than for a woman to be forced, either physically, or from "a sense of duty," to take part in the sexual act when "soul, mind and body cry out against it"; but what alleviation of this common outrage is offered by preventives of conception? None at all that I can see.

I pity, sincerely, the woman who has been "forced to be the mother of ten children," but she must pardon me if I cannot respect or admire her. Nor would my feeling be any different towards her if no children had resulted and yet she had been "forced" into a relation which no woman should enter except when her whole "soul, mind and body" desire it.

I want women to have more courage, more self-respect. The use of preventives, I care not of what sort, tend to impair these qualities, lower the vitality and general tone and leave the woman still slavish.

Wake up, sisters, and assert your freedom.

STANDARDS OF VIRTUE.

Helen Philbrick's mind must be in a chaotic condition. She has just enough light to upset her equilibrium and not sufficient to give her self-poise.

When she has that she will not trouble very much about society or what it thinks.

At present she is like a self-conscious girl who is afraid everybody is looking at her, when really no one is interested the least bit as to how she looks.

What is society but an aggregate of human beings, who are or should be a law unto themselves individually? I am a unit of the whole, but, provided I do not trespass on the rights of others, where is their right to trespass on mine? I owe allegiance to none save my own highest ideal. My own conception of right is my guide.

No, no, Helen, do not teach your child that law is her savior. Teach her to be a law unto herself. Teach her to do right for its own sake.

All civil laws are man-made institutions, therefore, very fallible things to trust your child's salvation to. Men individually and collectively are a great deal better and far more humane than the laws they make. If women trusted to civil law to save them they would fare very poor. True, it will step in sometimes and force a man to marry a girl he has seduced, but does that save her? No, a thousand times no. There is no love where force is the lever that joins a man and woman in marriage.

I consider the English system of making the man contribute to the support of the child a number of years more satisfactory than forced marriage, if we must call on civil law to adjust matters of this kind.

This system may not save the girl's name, but it saves her body and mind from being invaded by a man who does not care two straws for her only as she is a means of gratifying his lust.

The highest law is love and love worketh ill to none. Physical attraction is not love, though it is often mistaken for it. Go down into the depths of your own being, Helen, and find yourself. Your unworthiness to society and lack of virtue have no existence save in your own mind. You have simply exchanged the orthodox hell for one of your own creating.

Sometimes reading such works as Paine's and Ingersoll's cause too great a revulsion of feeling. They are like strong liquor to a total abstainer; they affect the brain and should be taken in smaller doses. The reader, however, as a rule is so fascinated that he burns the midnight oil to get more of it with the result that he finds himself in deep water. Like a mariner at sea who has lost his compass he is apt to get reckless and drive his bark on the rocks.

I am led to think this must have been Helen's condition, for neither lack of faith, delusive faith, nor the exercise of reason could have led her to the portals of death.

Reason leads to light, which is life.

"WHO IS THE ENEMY?"

Hugh O. Pentecost writes thus to Edwin C. Walker about the latter's new work, "Who Is the Enemy: Anthony Comstock or You?" "Your pamphlet is a strong discussion of the question at issue that one could give to a conservative friend with some hope that he might read it through."

Dr. R. W. Shufeldt, biologist, author of several scientific works and of more than seven hundred articles on medicine, travel, science, sexual problems and other subjects, writes to E. C. Walker: "I thank you very much indeed for the copy you sent me of your valuable pamphlet, 'Who Is the Enemy: Anthony Comstock or You?' I have read it from cover to cover with the utmost satisfaction and unqualified approval. It is one of the best and strongest things you have put out, and I am with you solid in both the letter and spirit of it. I prize the copy most highly." Ask for table of contents and specimen pages of "Who is the Enemy?" or send 20 cents to this office for the pamphlet.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

With Macaulay, Rosa Graul would say: "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman would be less loving and lovable, or that man would be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish.

LIFE OR DEATH.

A soul, half through the gate, said unto Life,
"What dost thou offer me?"—And Life replied,
"Sorrow, unceasing struggle, disappointment; after these Darkness and silence."—The Soul said to Death,
"What dost thou offer me?"—And Death replied,
"In the beginning what Life gives at last."
Turning to Life: "And if I live and struggle?"—
"Others shall live and struggle after thee, Counting it easier where thou has passed."
"And by their struggles?"—"Easier place shall be
For others still, to rise to keener pain
Of conquering agony!"—"And what have I
To do with all these others? Who are they?"
"Yourself!"—"And all who went before?"—"Yourself."
"The darkness and the silence too have end?"
"They end in light and sound; peace ends in pain,
Death ends in Me, and thou must glide from Self
To self, as light to shade and shade to light again.
Choose!"—The Soul, sighing, answered, "I will live."

SEX RADICALISM.

VIII. WHAT IS MARRIAGE?

The best way to be true to the future is to be just to the past. Whatever great defects we now see in the marriage and family system in its present form and as being ill-fitted to our present society, it must surely have been of use to our ancestors.

Even now we are not so far removed from the time when a common danger from flood, fire or human foe would make the small groups within the tribe or clan a very useful organization in saving life. Even a child could act as sentinel for its own family in times of constant warfare.

And if there were good reasons for early man to become a family man, there were additional reasons for early gentleman to be so. Instances of this can still be seen. The Highlander's wife and daughter draw the plough while he guides it. Such a one was "the laird"; all the pride of the family centered in him. The men fisher-folk of Newhaven, in Scotland, do no work on land; the fishwives draw the boats to shore, unload, and hawk the fish round Edinburgh in creels so heavily laden that not seldom it takes two railway porters to hoist the weight on to the fishwife's shoulders. The African woman is and has been for long ages a beast of burden. The hairy Ainu gentleman of northern Japan is clothed in embroidered robes made by his hard-working, plainly-dressed wife and daughters. And among ourselves contrast the work and short hours of a professional or small business man in his office with those of his wife in a small home—cooking, cleaning, scrubbing, washing, sewing, for many hours a day, and often having long spells of broken nights, too. Woman is the first slave and the last. Yet there is a power that will make this slave a queen in time to come.

What the essential points of marriage are in the mind of the orthodox may be noted when they are occasionally caught uttering home truths. After going through the mill of marriage, the average puritan woman's highest ideal of married life is of a well-settled home, social position and good upholstery. Not far removed from the type was the mother who, when hopes were expressed as to the welfare of her recently married daughter, replied cordially in the affirmative, adding, however, as an afterthought, "She can't bear her husband, but there's always a summat." And the man's standpoint is well given by Mr. Crosland, who in his last book condemns the wife in the same spirit in which Adam complained of "the woman whom thou gavest to be with me," when he found the apple which grew in his garden was indigestible—"she can't even cook," says he. For my part, I sometimes wish that woman were even less of "a cooking animal" than she is. Is it not largely this culinary knack that makes us slaves? At least I would say so did I not know that it is our unfortunate habit of being in love with our tyrants that is half cause of the trouble!

However it behooves sex-radicals to examine this mix up of love and cookery, marriage and its social functions. For the custom of home partnership cannot be suddenly abolished though it is being greatly modified.

Marriage in the legal sense may be dismissed in a few words. Only in the worst marriage failures or crimes are the legal bonds felt at all, for we are far more rigidly ruled and regulated by social unwritten laws.

The original principle of legal marriage is no doubt the ownership by the husband of the wife's person, and of every kind of servitude that she is able to render. In England and her colonies very little trace of this is left, and a man can now neither hold his wife a prisoner nor claim her earnings. In fact, the legal tie is chiefly felt as being a "knot there's no untying"; and this difficulty vanishes in America, which gives every opportunity for divorce. In most of the States a husband can still send a constable in pursuit of a fugitive wife, if he is foolish and brutal enough to do so; but public opinion less and less supports such doings.

The social utilities of marriage are still, however, many, though its uses are of a curiously different kind to the man and the woman. Perhaps the only advantage they get for certain in common is the gain of a certain amount of social respect, which to each, is some compensation for the loss of popularity which is experienced by persons of either sex when they cease to be prospective marriage partners. To this we may add the strong and abiding affection which persons of constant character always put into the marriage union, though it is not an essential part of conventional marriage.

What does marriage give to man? It gives him the services, without payment, of a housekeeper who has no interests apart from his; it secures him in the constant submission of a sex-slave, who, in case of his excesses, has no protection, either legal or social, and who has purposely been kept in ignorance beforehand of her obligations; it ensures him a careful nurse in sickness and old age. These would be very costly to him if otherwise obtained. The church, with the keen eye for the material side of things which characterizes it, formerly insisted on the wife promising to be "buxom [bowsome, obedient] in bedde and at the borde." The newer promise of general obedience, substituted, is perhaps more unreasonable as well as less candid, though it satisfies modern puritan delicacy. To gain the advantages of marriage the man need make but few sacrifices; nor if he leads a riotous life beforehand will he thereby fail to secure a good partner.

The woman obtains fewer advantages and has to make more sacrifices for them. In fact the chief gains of the married woman are due to the deprivations forced on the unmarried; for now she is not despised as an old maid, and may hope to be neither unmated nor childless. If she is fortunate the domestic work she accepts in marrying will not prove harder than the business or professional work she gives up. But it is almost necessarily more solitary and less varied; and her independence is considerably curtailed. She is, however, saved the anxiety of seeking for work.

The sexual association in its most intimate form is no doubt the crux of married life. In its health aspect, the fulfilment of it may be a trifle, but the omission of it is a tragedy. Even puritans recognize this, but only as regards man; yet there is no double standard in health laws, though there is in puritan morality. And the pair who treat this thing as a trifle have not attained to the fulness of life and happiness. In this, while married men almost always obtain satisfaction of a kind sufficient for health, a great many married women, probably more than half, fail to do so. Absolute sexual negation on the physical side of sex is but rarely the fate of a married woman. The case of Mrs. Carlyle is exceptional; she was never freed from it, and no doubt the hysteria she suffered was a consequence. A marriage of a contemporary, that of Ruskin, was dissolved owing to a similar circumstance; and his wife subsequently married his friend the painter, Millais. Such cases are rare, but false mating is frequent, and the woman usually suffers far more than the man from this cause.

The contest between the old and new ideal may here be seen. The puritans deny or forbid sexual reciprocity; and while they grudgingly allow enjoyment to the man, because this is obviously inevitable, they would deny participation in enjoyment to the woman, and teach her that her sexual submission must be bartered for material good for herself and her children. And all the sensual, brutish, coarse-fibred natures are on the side of the puritans, and the childish, undeveloped minds. The finer passional forms of love are incomprehensible to them and they despise them.

And even when temperamental adaptation to begin with is, by a happy chance, complete, it may easily happen to the sensitive that a physical repugnance may arise and disturb happiness greatly, however carefully concealed by principle or affection. This is caused by the too close and exclusive association of marriage, the bad effects of which are well characterized by "Subscriber" in LUCIFER No. 1020.

We must make the conventional bond much lighter, and then sexual kindness, affection and courtesy will be there when passion weakens.

The poets have recognized the facts which the moralists have failed to see.

> Love's wing moults when caged and captured,
> Only free he soars enraptured.
> Can you keep the bee from ranging,
> Or the ringdove's neck from changing?
> No! nor fettered Love from dying
> In the knot there's no untying.
> Campbell.

> Like chiefs of faction
> Love's life is action—
> A formal paction,
> That curbs his reign.
> * * *
> Repose but cloys him,
> Retreat destroys him,
> Love brooks not a degraded throne.
> Byron.

I believe that our path of both probability and practical improvement lies in recognizing whatever good there is in domestic partnership for many, while at the same time honoring all other forms of sexual and social friendship and love. With full experience and knowledge of life before choice, and with riddance of the inhuman exclusiveness now the rule in marriage, the home partnership should not be such a failure as it often is. And until all social love has room to grow and become stronger and more expansive, such a home partnership seems almost essential to many, amid the warring elements of our present society.

A gentle and pleasant evening of life seems hard to attain, for the man at least, in this cold world of to-day, without the settled comradeship of a home; and I believe for a long time to come the love and compassion of woman will wish to provide him with it.

> Creep home and take your place there,
> The maimed and spent among;
> God grant you find one face there
> You loved when all was young.

At least one friend in old age was the aspiration here expressed by Charles Kingsley. Our hopes may take a higher flight, but let us not fall short of his in attainment.

Bonded sex service in domestic partnership must be abolished. The power that has made our marriage system anything but utterly intolerable in its present form is the power of sex love. The varied forms of sexual comradeship which will blossom in the future will be developed and kept up by this same force of love.

DORA FORSTER.

INTELLIGENT SURVIVAL OF THE FITTEST

I see that in LUCIFER, No. 1023, my good friend, William Platt, voices once more his horror at the present prevailing sterilization of marriage. This to him is the acme of social crime. I do not agree with him.

I believe there are very few healthy, well-sexed wives, well and happily mated, and financially able, who refuse motherhood. Few women to-day are sexually healthy and well mated, astonishingly few. But millions of mothers there are who are every way so unfit that their "unfaith" to the race is proved by their accepting parenthood, not refusing it.

The women who refuse motherhood are usually of these classes:

1. Those too sensuous and selfish to want the bother of children. It seems to me very well that these should not be mothers.

2. Those so poor, timid or pessimistic that they fear they will be unable to properly care and provide for a child, or feel life not worth living or giving. It is well, too, that these refrain. We do not want paupers or cowards.

3. Those on whom conception is forced by brutal husbands without their consent. These, too, are right. A child undesired should never be born.

4. Those who know themselves physically diseased and unfit. Refusal here is wise, motherly and kind. To consciously bestow weakness or disease on a child is a crime, and even the risk should never be lightly taken.

5. Those who feel their lives might more usefully be devoted to some other service than motherhood. And who shall say these are wrong? Here is where Platt's question comes in, but it seems to me a very foolish one. A woman who raises a large family is neither better nor worse than a woman who has deliberately avoided motherhood, if each is equally conscientiously trying to do her best service to humanity as she sees it. Because a woman has reproductive organs she is no more obliged to be a parent than she is obliged to be a singer because she has a voice. She may wish to devote herself to some great work to which she feels a call, and to which motherhood would be a hindrance. It is for her to decide, and her decision on such a matter is quite outside the pale of legitimate criticism.

I claim that the knowledge of contraceptics is a good thing and still better the knowledge of methods of sexual relationship that can satisfy without incurring risk of undesired pregnancy, and the sooner every woman in the world knows all about these things the better, Platt, Roosevelt and Bernard Shaw to the contrary notwithstanding. Where the seed is poor let marriage be "sterilized" to the limit. It is a proof of evolution that our women are using their brains, not merely their impulses and emotions about this matter. But the race is in peril, not of too few, but of too poor children, and I would briefly present a remedy.

Let us suppose that without other social change the State proclaims motherhood a profession, for capable women, and offers State education, State support and State compensation to those who will enter it. Suppose the State appoints a board of scientific examiners to examine every young woman candidate who offers, admitting none deformed, in poor health, lacking intelligence, or with a history of crime or hereditary taint.

Let these young women now be trained and educated for their profession by the best teachers procurable. Not in fancy "accomplishments," but in that which will make them really fitted for their sublime work. Let them be trained physically for practical health and usefulness—to ride, to run, to swim, to row, to dance, to sing, to work; not to the excess of muscle-bound limbs and hypertrophied hearts, but to normal fullness of life. Let their physical culture, like the jiu-jitsu of Japan, aim to develop the finer muscles and bring the whole organism into harmony and health, rather than to rob the Peter of one organ to pay premiums to the Paul of another. And let each candidate be taught a trade or occupation by which she can earn a livelihood and on which she must work several hours a day. This to the end that if she ever preferred to resign she would be able to support herself. Also that her practicality might affect her child and influence it to usefulness.

In mental education, after the sound rudiments, let the chief attention be paid to sexual education. Let everything that modern science knows about sex be taught her with utmost thoroughness, and especially let her know all that can be taught as to wisdom in the choice of a father for her child.

When ready to graduate, that is, to become a mother, she should be in perfect sexual and general health, symmetrical, graceful in development, well-read, with a mind scientifically trained, free, fearless, reasonable, practical in thought, and deeply imbued with the sacred seriousness of her calling. She should regard herself, and be honored by others, as one of the mothers of the nation, one of the begetters of a new and greater race, and always as a student and teacher of sexual science.

If of independent fortune the State should not be expected to support her, or compensate her, but it should guarantee that if her means failed she would be fully provided for. If poor, the State should provide her a home of her own, either a separate dwelling or rooms in an institution as she chose, food, clothing, medical attendance and nurses' assistance; pay her a moderate salary and a pension when too old for duty or incapacitated by accident. But she should, all her life, be under constant observation of the examiners, and required to make frequent and minute reports to them of her condition, that of her children, and of all new or interesting sexual facts observed by her. All her reproductive lifetime she should be required to keep up her physical training and mental education. If possible, as the years went on, she should become a highly accomplished, highly educated and brilliant woman, refined, artistic, philosophic, that her children might thus inherit from her. But none of these things should be "crammed" into her, or made a devitalizing drudgery. Health is first. A woman might be a fine mother who could never be an artist, or a scholar, and too much of the mental might weaken the physical.

When about to enter her profession she should bind herself, on her honor, never to have a child by a man "unfit." This requires explanation.

Parentage requires fatherhood as well as motherhood. Now every man who would be a father by one of these Professional Mothers should be required to procure a certificate from the board of examiners, knowing him to be in perfect mental and physical health, a good citizen, and without hereditary taint. This certificate should be renewed annually by re-examinations. These men would constitute the "fit," all others the "unfit." A man unfit might perhaps be the lover of a mother, but he should never be the father of her child.

From the ranks of the fit, then, the mothers would be expected to choose their lovers, usually and always, the fathers of their children. Within this limit their lives should be left perfectly free, to be monogamous or varietist as they chose, to permit the father or fathers to be co-residents of the home, or to admit them only as visitors, as best suited the mother's ideal.

The children, if necessary, should be guaranteed food, clothing, education, until trained in some occupation to the point of self-support.

I cannot go into all details, but this is the general plan.

I have spoken of the "State" because I wanted to show it practicable under present conditions, if made legal. It could just as well, or better, be adopted under libertarian conditions, in some voluntary, co-operative form of society. The essential point is that the collectivity make motherhood a profession and guarantee the mother ideal conditions as far as possible.

In any case I would say there should be no interdiction upon the child-bearing of the outside "unfit," that being left to the moral sense of the community. If the Professional Mothers and Fit Fathers proved themselves as superior as I think they would, it would not be long before the conscientious part of the community practically left parenthood to them, as well as all the unscrupulous who preferred personal ease and pleasure to the care of a family—in other words, they would soon secure a natural monopoly, for outside competition would not be arbitrarily excluded.

There are millions of girls to-day who would love to be mothers of families, but they reasonably shrink from being bound to a thoughtless or brutal man and obliged to bear children whether sick or well, fit or unfit, able or disabled, till death gives release. They reasonably shrink from bringing children into the world with poor prospect of properly providing for them, or probable certainty of their suffering great hardship. They reasonably shrink from even the pain of ordinary child birth. If these knew that they could have children under such normal conditions that parturition would practically be without pain or peril, without bondage to any man, with personal control of time and frequency, with the certainty of a comfortable home, personally controlled, of all necessary attendance, of the children being provided for, educated, and started fair in life, of having all this under conditions of honor, emolument and security, we would soon see how many girls would shrink from motherhood. I predict that four-fifths, at least, of all capable girls would eagerly enter such a profession, the remaining fifth being those so intellectual they would prefer some other profession.

The number of children born by any mother I would say should be left to her, but if her pay was increased a little for every child begotten, the chances are her family would not be very small. Beside the members of all professions seek fame, and the honor of bearing the largest number of finest children would be coveted. Resignation should be permitted at any time, however.

The effects in a few generations could not but be wonderful. The world would be filled with healthy, intelligent, well-behaved people, instead of the diseased, unbalanced, criminal multitudes now desecrating the face of the earth. While the cost of paying these mothers and supporting these families would be large, it would be repaid in the saved expense on asylums, workhouses, jails, hospitals, dispensaries and more than made up in the extra productive power of such efficient individuals over the poor workers now struggling to exist. Any single nation adopting this method under present conditions would produce such superior men that the others would be swiftly compelled to follow suit from military necessity alone.

The effect of the required "fitness" in the fathers would be tremendous also. Men would be proud to be able to display such a certificate, eager to be eligible to the love of such superior women, proud to be the fathers of their children, and would everywhere put themselves in training for the required fitness. The difference in morals would appear everywhere; drunkenness and venereal disease would largely disappear, and clean, athletic men take the place of the rotten lot now contaminating every society.

Nor could such a thing be without the ban being taken from sexual knowledge and its diffusion everywhere to the incalculable advantage of human progress.

In barbaric times the fit survived to propagate the race because no others could endure the hardships. But nowadays we carefully preserve the unfit and breed from them to the damnation of the race. But under this plan, which I have submitted, intelligent selection on one hand, and intelligent sterilization on the other, could produce a race physically, intellectually and morally superior to any ever on earth.

To-day we Japanese have battleships, torpedoes, cannon. The China Sea reddens with the blood of our killed and of those we kill. Our torpedoes roar, our shrapnel shriek, our cannon breathe slaughter, and we die and are the cause of death. And you occidentals say to us: "You have won your rank; you have civilized yourselves." Centuries upon centuries we have had artists, painters, sculptors, philosophers. In the sixteenth century we had published in Japanese the fables of Aesop. Were we then barbarians?—Hayashi.

"Rabbi, who is happier, the man who owns a million dollars or he who has seven daughters?" "The one who has many daughters." "Why so?" "He who has a million dollars wishes for more—the man who has seven daughters does not."—The Philosopher.

NOTES AND COMMENT.

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT.

Leaving Chicago at 9 o'clock Saturday morning, Oct. 15, arriving at the Union Depot, St. Louis, Mo., at 6:30 p. m., same day, one hour behind time, I found my way as best I could to the home of Dr. McCaslin, on Indiana avenue, having failed to meet friends at the depot on account of lack of punctuality on the part of the railroad management.

So far as I could see, there was not the slightest excuse for the delay of one hour in a run of about three hundred miles. The weather was simply superb, no storms, no floods, no unavoidable delays at crossings, etc., nothing whatever to cause the loss of one hour of time to each of, say, one thousand passengers—one thousand hours in the aggregate, or about one hundred days of working time, to say nothing of loss of time of friends waiting to meet the travelers at the point of destination, nor of further loss of time, by failure of making connections with other trains or boats, which would not or could not wait.

If this experience—with the management of the Chicago & Alton Railway—were exceptional it might be passed over in silence, but when it is known to be so common as to be the rule rather than the exception it seems time for the traveling public to speak out in language not to be misunderstood. At least such has been my own experience for many years, and that of my friends traveling over western and southern roads. With eastern roads I have had little experience.

Looking for causes, I can see none for the delay on my trip to St. Louis except that the iron horse, the engine, was overloaded—too many cars, too many passengers, for one horse. To put on another engine and another train would have cost money and would have cut down the day's profits to the railway management by so much. That is to say, the demands of commercialism, the ever-present, the all-controlling necessity that interest on money—dividends—must be paid at whatever cost of time, convenience or safety of the traveling public.

The subject of railroad management, or mismanagement, is too large to be elaborated at this place, and as the time for sending in my report of meetings, the fair, etc., for this issue of LUCIFER has expired I must excuse myself for this time, simply adding that the week has been filled very pleasantly by and in attendance of the sessions of the Freethought Congress, by social calls and by one visit to the great Louisiana Purchase Exposition. In our next it is hoped there will be something in the shape of an account of the two Congresses of Freethinkers, also of visits to the fair, and perhaps visits to localities in the vicinity of St. Louis where attempts are now being made to practice the plans of those who hope to introduce the Co-Operative Commonwealth.

VOLTAIRINE DE CLEYRE.

The news of the death of this staunch friend of freedom comes to us by way of the Demonstrator. We have not heard directly from her friends in Philadelphia since her death, but know that the end was expected. More will be said in a later issue. For the present we give the following from the Philadelphia Press of September 28:

"Voltairine de Cleyre, once nurtured of nuns, then successively atheist, anarchist, poetess and author, is dying in the Medico-Chirurgical Hospital from tuberculosis, aggravated by three bullets which a pupil in anarchy sent crashing into her body two years ago.

"For two weeks she has been lying listlessly, impenitent, upon her cot. Clergymen come and go and blue-robed Sisters pass noiselessly down the ward, but she merely turns her eyes, bestowing an indifferent glance.

"Friends of the creed she taught fearlessly and with the eloquence of defiance come every day and bring her flowers. Each day she tells them that her faith is changeless.

"From her home on Fairmont avenue, near Eighth street, where she has taught music and languages, she was conveyed in a cab to the hospital. When she learned that she had consumption she smiled and said: 'It is foolish to worry.'

"Dr. James M. Anders, who is treating the patient, is of the opinion that the disease developed from a general breakdown of the system. There was no hour in the day that she was not busy either with pupils or with her pen. She supplied prose and poetry at one time or another for every anarchistic periodical in this country and Europe. The disciples of the red flag have treasured her productions the world over.

"Reared in a convent conducted by Carmelite nuns in a Michigan village, she absorbed the reserve of her tutors and became trained in delicacy of expression, which, applied to the promulgation of the Anarchistic creed, became a two-edged sword of effectiveness. No champion of the faith in the three big cities, New York, Chicago or Philadelphia, made so many converts as she.

"In the spring of 1901 a youth of 17 years, Herman Helcher, became her pupil at music. He had really gone to her for the purpose of adding the accomplishment to his social repertoire. The woman infatuated him. He remained to adore her. For her sake he professed Anarchy and proclaimed his new faith braggingly throughout the city. It was in vain. Voltairine de Cleyre sought converts, not sweethearts. She told him so. For a year he followed her and then, heavily armed, lay in wait for her opposite the Fairmount avenue house. He came up to her on Fourth street and fired three shots into her breast ere two pedestrians overpowered him. For weeks the woman hovered between life and death. When at length she grew better she was summoned to appear against her would-be slayer. 'Oh, let him go,' she said softly to the magistrate. 'He did not mean it.' They sent him to jail for seven years. He is still in prison."

RESTRICTING PEOPLE'S LIBERTIES.

James L. Cowles is secretary of the "Postal Progress League," 21 Park Row, New York. I see him in the New York World and Chicago Record-Herald. In the latter he says: "The development of our domestic postal service implies its extension over the whole field of transportation and transmission."

Exactly! And what will we get when we get merchandise and people transported by the United States? Of course, everything will be carried as the mails are carried now—according to certain "rulings."

Therefore, every package and every person not up to a certain supposed moral standard will be excluded, or, if carried, will be confiscated, fined or jailed afterward.

What will those now crying for "free mails" think of this? It will be only a more complete fastening of official tyranny upon the people.

The "Postal Progress League" makes no fight for "free mails." It wants the mail system extended to cover everything. Not a vestige of individual liberty would be left. Rather than this we better not only leave transportation where it now is, but we better get the mails in the hands of railroads and express companies also.

The first thing every such thing as a League needs to work for is the elimination of "executive orders," Comstockism, and petty sleuth work. Without this every liberty-lover must repudiate it.

A WOMAN PROTESTS.

In a recent number of our Light-Bearer the men are requested to "keep from the sex-question their profane and polluting touch." Consulting my dictionary, I find that profane comes from pro—before or outside—fanum—the temple; hence not initiated, ignorant, unlearned. Pollute is derived from polper—forth—fuere—to wash; to wash or smear over; hence, to soil, to defile.

Assuredly, then, the sex-question has been more profaned and polluted than any other question, for it has been handled most audaciously in all ages by those whose ignorance was densest, and it has been smeared over with floods of hypocrisy and of baseless theorizing. But I am not aware that such treatment of the question is characteristic of the columns of LUCIFER, nor that the men who write to our little paper are particularly or exclusively guilty in this regard. It seems to me the question has been treated, on the whole, with earnestness, sincerity, and a desire for real knowledge and understanding and the betterment of conditions. I am sure the women writers have displayed quite as much ignorance of physiological and biological fact as have the men. And as for washing the subject over with extraneous matter, with metaphysical theories and hysterical emotionalism—the men have no monopoly of that.

Of course, the writer who used those terms did not employ them in their derivative sense. Doubtless she meant to imply that men are too course and vulgar to deal with so sacred a subject, and therefore should leave it to the finer and "holier" sex. Her referring to men's writing on this line as a "pastime" further emphasizes her contention that it is a matter of little consequence to them.

And here I wish to enter a protest, a threefold protest; first, against the idea that the sex-question is any more sacred than any other question of human health and happiness; second, against the claim that women are purer than men; third, against the supposition that the sex-problem is of small moment to men.

There is a deal of nonsense extant as to the sacredness of sex. This may be of value as an offset to the common idea of the nastiness of sex, but the truth is neither here nor there. Sex is a simple physiological fact of animal life. Its human importance lies in the pleasure derivable from the natural function, and the havoc that may result from its suppression and misuse; as well as from its relation to the continuance of the race.

To those who have lost or discarded their orthodox God, but who must have something to worship, sex will do as well as anything else, and is attractive from the mystery of its processes and its profound psychological manifestations. But there is mystery in Nature everywhere. There is wonder and mystery in the glory of a mid-summer sunset, in the incoming tide, in a starlit sky, and in the profound emotions awakened in the soul of the beholder.

Yet all of these, and the beauty of flora and fauna, and the delight of sex are subject to the same natural laws. There is nothing in sex to set it apart from the other facts of life, or to remove it above the desire and the use of the lowest among us. There is nothing in sex to demand different treatment in investigation and argument from that accorded any other human phenomenon. We do not approach the subject of diet with bated breath and clasped hands and a holy hush and blush lest some common creature should profane and pollute it. And yet to errors of nutrition may often be attributed the worst crimes of adults and the inborn weaknesses of children. We have not got down to "bed-rock" until we have stripped the sex-question of its "spiritual" incubus as well as of its ecclesiastical and other authoritarian encumbrances.

As to the superior purity of women, that, too, is a myth. It probably originated in the ecclesiastical worship of the Virgin, and in the chivalry of the middle ages, which sought to atone for the enslavement of women by pretending to exalt them to a spiritual elevation. To-day this spurious worship is very much in the way of rational adjustment of human relations. All the absurd deferences to women as a sex belong on the rubbish heap of outworn superstitions.

These men who are so profane that they must be excommunicated from radical discussion of sex—who are they? They were all born of women. From women as well as from men they inherited their mental and "spiritual" qualities. They passed their infancy with women, receiving their earliest impressions and tendencies in the home and school, largely with women. Where have they obtained their ideas as to women and sex? From men exclusively? Have the women with whom they have associated, both casually and intimately, had nothing to do with forming their ideas and ideals?

And these same ideas and ideals, how are they so inferior to those of women? Is it men or women who are most responsible for prostitution? Is it the men who insist on paying for a natural gratification of natural desires, or is it the women who insist on rejecting gratification until persuaded by some form of payment? Is it the men or the women who insist most strenuously that sex is vile and nasty? Is it the men or the women who do most to shroud the subject in obloquy, to bury it in ignorance; who seek to regulate a natural physical function by a hypothetical and impossible "spiritual" morality?

Balancing knowledge against ignorance, purity against hypocrisy, reason against superstition, frankness against prudery—say, have the women anything to boast of? Is it "pure" to be ignorant, undeveloped, physically and emotionally defective? Is it "profane" to be well-sexed, to have needs and to recognize them? Is it "pure" and "holy" to seek to thwart and to starve natural needs and functions? Is it "profane" and "vulgar" to seek to gratify them? Yet I submit the assertion that where men and women are equal in physical development, in knowledge and understanding, and in freedom from superstition, they are not found making claims of superior "purity," or fearing from each other profanation and pollution.

Furthermore, even were the men so unworthy, they cannot be excluded from the matter. It is their question as well as ours. The mere act of begetting a child is much less than gestation and parturition, it is true; but is that all of it? Is that man's only concern in the matter? Is the man's function no more than that of the stud-horse, that it is of such "infinitesimal consequence" to him? It is, then, of "infinitesimal consequence" to the boy to be brought up in ignorance of his own nature; lied to in behalf of "virtue" by his guardians; lied to in behalf of "vice" by his associates of school and playtime. It is, then, of "infinitesimal consequence" to the youth to find himself beset by desires and needs which he cannot satisfy without loss of self-respect, since all the "pure" women of his acquaintance ignore such needs, while he is surrounded by "impure" women whose trade it is to stimulate and to gratify such desires. It is, then, of "infinitesimal consequence" to the man that he may not enjoy fatherhood with honor unless he is willing to purchase and maintain for life a female slave, and bind himself to equal slavery. It is, then, of "infinitesimal consequence" to the father to find in the mother of his children ignorance, superstition, ill-health, a starved and apathetic nature. It is, then, of infinitesimal consequence" to the man to be regarded as a mere means of support and adjunct of propagation.

Is it so strange that a man should presume to "meddle" with the sex-question? "Meddle," indeed! With what can he better "meddle" than with the health and happiness of himself, his sexual partner, his offspring? With what can he better concern himself than with the sexual sanity and purity of the race?

LENA BELFORT.

A PLEA FOR CALM DISCUSSION.

It appears to me that the cause might better be served if some of LUCIFER'S writers would restrain their asperity and refrain from personalities. In my opinion, greater good would result if a small part of the earnestness and energy which they devote to an exploitation of their powers of sarcasm were given to the promotion of the propaganda of liberty and reason. The piling up of words is not worth while except it strengthens the fortifications of Freedom. Furthermore, a less profound consideration of the personal problem might tend to an expansion of the mental horizon and bring the controversialists into closer agreement.

The foregoing is anent the argument engendered by Mrs. Whitehead's rather intemperate expressions. I have met Mrs. Whitehead, and I should judge she is one of those decided characters that are liable to incline toward dogmatism. Surely she has never given the question of which she writes the benefit of calm philosophic consideration, else she would not deliver herself of such illogical utterance. However, as our always temperate and tolerant patriarch of progress, Bro. Harman, has so well said in the matter, "no one has a monopoly of truth and no one's views are wholly erroneous," I concur with Mrs. Whitehead in some parts of her contention, but with her assertion that "the settlement of the sex question belongs to women" (alone) I vigorously disagree. Also I regard her characterization of man's concern in the matter as "profane and polluting," as being itself a most pronounced profanity.

So long as there is differentiation of sex and a vital duality of the sexual function, there must imperatively be a division of responsibility in the solution of the sex problem. Otherwise we might expect a cessation of evolutionary process, and Nature's reversion to the hermaphroditic form of the protoplasm. It is reasonably certain that at the division of physical forms and functions in primordial life, there was also a division of moral duty.

In declaring that the settlement of the sex question belongs solely to women, Mrs. Whitehead makes an assertion that she at least has the wisdom not to attempt to prove. The facts of history and the philosophy of those facts render her position utterly untenable. While the obligation does not rest exclusively with either sex, the larger part is placed upon man. History gives no instance of the self-emancipation of any considerable class. The reason for this is readily discerned. It is one of the most pitiful penalties of servitude that the enslaved one learns to caress his chains and to consider his bondage as blessed. You will recall how many of the negro slaves refused to accept Lincoln's liberation, regarding the emancipation proclamation as a blasphemy, and insisted upon remaining with their masters. So woman, saturated with sex superstition, timid of new forms, her self-reliance reduced to latency, robbed of all intellectual independence, rejects freedom, clings to Tyrant Custom, kisses her shackles and prays to be spared deliverance.

For every woman who wishes to be free, there are a hundred men who desire that she shall be free. Thousands of men are unwilling masters. These exercise a domestic tyranny solely as a concession to woman's demands and to perpetuate her allegiance. Many men repress their impulse for gentleness because women mistake it for weakness and despise them for it, while they respect, admire, worship the brute in their mates.

All that is needed to make woman free is to arouse in her a desire for freedom. In fact, the desire for freedom really constitutes the condition of freedom. No large number of persons can long remain enslaved without their consent.

The conclusion toward which the foregoing arguments infallibly gravitate is that without the aid of men, the sex question must forever remain an unsolved problem.

Dr. C. S. Wood, in his reply to Mrs. Whitehead, does not prove himself a logical disputant. He assumes that gratification of the sexual appetite is the paramount reason for the procreative act, and that its consequence is purely incidental. He must know, as well as anyone can tell him, that this is an argumental absurdity. He can find nothing in the entire province of philosophy that does not oppose the idea that an act is greater than its object, that the process is more important than its purpose.

Throughout all nature runs analogy's unbroken serial in unanswerable argument. With the sex appetite and with the gustatory appetite it is the same. Pleasing physical sensation is a bribe given by Nature to induce its creatures to perform those functions necessary to the preservation of life and the perpetuation of the species. Without the palate, man could not be depended upon to take food sufficient to properly nourish his body and prolong life to its normal period, especially as the acquisition of that food entails exertion. So, without that "pleasing sensation" which accompanies the culmination of the sexual act, there would be lacking a sufficient incentive to propagation, with the added duties and labors it imposes, and the race soon would become extinct.

Herein we perceive the sole utility of the sex appetitite. Notwithstanding this, I am to a considerable degree a disciple of Aristippus, and I hold that a reasonable indulgence in rational carnal pleasures is necessary to the proper development of human character. I believe in aestheticism instead of asceticism as a means of self-discipline.

I would like to hear from Jonathan Mayo Crane on these points. He is a logical thinker and a convincing reasoner, and I am confident he will agree with me, as, indeed, will that sound old philosopher, Moses Harman himself.

VARIOUS VOICES.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

J. A. E., Cripple Creek, Colo.—Outrages of a less virulent character still continue in Cripple Creek. Arrests of reputable citizens on the charge of vagrancy have taken place within the last few days; but even the assistant district attorney asked for acquittal.

P. V. C., Little Rock, Ark.—Inclosed find $1.25 for subscription and postage on samples to names sent herewith. Will say that I am very much pleased with LUCIFER and its corps of writers. The women seem to understand the free womanhood question better than the men, for the reason that they are the ones most directly affected.

Belle Chaspel, Pa.—"I am always interested in everything in LUCIFER and miss it when it does not come; always read it through and feel that I can see many things more clearly now than I did before. It is certainly a great educator in a line of thought in direct need of the searchlight of truth. Enclosed I send a few names to which to send sample copies, selected from acquaintances and lifelong friends."

A. F. Hill, Boston, Mass.—Marriage laws of men are the cause of divorces and hells and misery on this earth. We can regard marriage laws the same as men made laws about human slavery. Woman should be free to select the man she wants to be a parent by her. See the population in prisons, hospitals and asylums for imbeciles, drunkards, criminals, insane, cripples, etc., made and born in lust or hate in slavery by marriage laws.

John Guntz, Jr., Wausau, Wis.—Your book notices, criticisms, etc., are first-class; keep on. I am waiting to get some next month, viz., "The Child of Love" and "The Sexuele Physacterna," or what the name is, I have forgotten. "The Child of Love" fairly made me fall in love with "Old Japan." Nothing is so sweet to me as the natural, as Nature; she is my mother; why should I feel ashamed of her or of myself? Thanks to the author for this work, and thanks to you for helping others to get it. I lend my books out and they will reach many, I assure you.

D. Webster Grob, Hagerstown, Md.—Though on some points I diametrically oppose your views yet on others I so heartily agree that I consider your work in the main extremely good, and therefore wish you and LUCIFER unbounded success, and often advise those whom I find inclined to be liberal minded in your line to subscribe for and read your paper and books, and am pleased to know that in some instances at least they have subscribed and read. . . . Personally I am an unorthodox in medicine as I am in theology. Nature-cure seems to me the only rational cure. My remedies are hydropathy, fasting, exercise and deep inhalation. I approve McFadden's "Physical Culture" and "Health and Beauty" magazines and books (New York City), and C. C. Carr's "Medical Talk" (Columbus, Ohio). They teach more fact and common sense in a day than all the orthodox physicians teach in ten years.

"Neither vegetables, plants, trees nor grass can grow without water, nor can animals thrive without it. Water is the greatest solvent in nature, preparing and dissolving plant food as well as animal food. Hence animals and men should drink plenty of water to be healthy and when sick it should be soaked into them through the stomach, pores and warm injections to flush and clean the bowels thoroughly and carry off rapidly all impurity. Exercise sets the blood in motion and helps the cleaning process. Fasting relieves the stomach of labor it cannot do perfectly any way when sick, and leaves so much more vitality to be used in the cleansing process. Inhaling much pure air also aids in purifying the blood and increasing strength. . . . As you are getting up in years you should study and observe the laws of health even more closely than in the past, so as to lengthen out your life and happiness to the utmost. . . . I enclose a few stamps I have handy to use as you prefer."

THE OLD SHOEMAKER.

BY VOLTAIRINE DE CLEYRE.

He had lived a long time there in the house at the end of the alley, and no one had ever known that he was a great man. He was lean and palsied, and had a crooked neck; his beard was gray and ragged, and his eyebrows came too far forward; there were seams and flaps in the empty, yellow old skin, and he gasped horribly when he breathed, taking hold of the lintel of the door to steady himself when he stepped out on the broken bricks of the alley.

He lived with a frightful old woman, who scrubbed the floors of the rag shop and drank beer, and growled at the children, who poked fun at her. He had lived with her eighteen years, she said, stroking the furry little kitten that curled up in her neck, as if she had been beautiful.

Eighteen years they had been drinking and quarreling together—and suffering. She had seen the flesh sucking away from the bones, and the skin falling in upon them, and the long, lean fingers growing more lean and trembling as they crooked round his shoemaking tools. It was very strange she had not grown thin; the beer had bloated her, and rolls of weak, shaking flesh lapped over the ridges of her uncouth figure.

Her pale, lack-lustre blue eyes wandered aimlessly as she talked. No, he had never told her—not even in their quarrels, not even when they were drunk together—of the great Visitor who had come up the little alley yesterday, walking so stately over the sunbeaten bricks, taking no note of the cheers, and coming in at the door without asking. She had not expected such a One; how could she?

But the old shoemaker had shown no surprise at the Mighty One. He smiled and set down the teacup he was holding and entered into communion with the Stranger. He noticed no others, but continued to smile, without speaking, into the dark, fathomless Face. He was smiling still and the infinite dignity of the Unknown fell upon him and covered the wasted old limbs and the hard, wizen face, so that all we who entered bowed and went out and did not speak.

But we understood, for the Mighty One gave understanding without words. We had been in the presence of Freedom! We had stood at the foot of Tabor and seen this worn, old, world-soiled soul lose all its dross and commonplace and pass upward, smiling, to the Transfiguration.

In the hands of the Mighty One the crust had crumbled and dropped away into impalpable powder. Souls should be mixed of it no more. Only that which passed upward, the fine white-playing flame, the heart of the long, life-long watches of patience, should rekindle there in the perennial ascension of the great Soul of Man.

PARTNERSHIP MARRIAGE.

Having but recently returned from a visit to the home of Frank Weller and Myra Pepper, at Mitchell, S. Dak., a few lines may be of interest. I like to chronicle these propitious partnerships that are not dependent upon what some minister "jines together" and some "God" so often puts asunder.

Mr. Weller is known to many as a wealthy, liberal worker in the cause of freedom and progress and now that he has formed a co-partnership with that bright, earnest, lovable Myra Pepper, they should enjoy the spice of life to their entire satisfaction, for both have been through the marriage mill and come out on top of experience hill. This means that experience is a dear and progressive teacher, and so these two friends have entered into a business partnership whereby the care and labor of a home, looking after the health of both, the talent required to do bookkeeping, etc., all have a value in a woman-wife and put her in an independent state that is very gratifying to a freedom-loving woman. The purse is as free to one as to the other, and no questions asked. These friends have many plans to work out for the betterment of humanity, and I feel sure much good will result.

Now a word about the corn palace, which was quite a novelty. It was about 150 feet square. The designs were varied and worked out of natural colored corn, grasses and cereals. It required over 800 bushels of corn alone. The artist, Mr. Rohe of Lawrence, Kan., received $10 per day. This is the sixth corn palace erected at Mitchell, and when comfortably seated inside and listening to the inspiring strains from the sixty musical artists of Sousa's band, it seemed something akin to heaven.

Each person is an artist in some capacity and sex cuts no figure. Happy is the one who finds out early in life the labor best suited to unfold the whole being. Will Socialism meet this demand? Perhaps. Anent the article of "Subscriber" in No. 1020, I will take twenty-five copies if you put it in leaflet form.

FLORA W. FOX.

SHALL WOMEN GO WEST?

Editors Woman's Journal:

In the last number of your paper Mrs. Charlottee Perkins Gilman advises the surplus woman of the East to go West in search of a husband. Her advice would be a slight modification of that of Horace Greeley, "Go West, young woman, go West."

Now, as a New Englander by birth, and a Westerner by many years' residence in different states, from Ohio to California, I wish to say something on this question. In the first place, I would rise to explain that there are great patches in the wild and woolly West that are wild and woolly no longer, and that pianos and autos, telegraphs, telephones, railroads, fine houses, all sorts of schools, and numerous graduates of the same of both sexes, are so common as to excite no comment except in the mind of the benighted Easterner who goes West to investigate, and occasionally is wise enough, like Walter Wycoff of "The Workers," as his imaginary West recedes from view, to grow "ashamed of that provincialism that thinks all the education and refinement are on the Atlantic coast."

But it would do the surplus woman no good to go to those places, as the men there are already pretty well mated, for good or ill as the case may be. She must go to the lumber camps and mines, the great ranches and shipping towns, to find the lonely man in any great numbers.

Does she want him when she finds him? That is the question. I think I can best give the answer by relating an incident illustrating the point, told me by a Massachusetts woman who has lived long on this coast and knows all the parties.

The man was also from Massachusetts. He came out to this coast and stayed till he had accumulated the usual number of vices; then he suddenly realized that he was lonely, and went back to his native state for a wife. Handsome, of fine physique, intelligent, educated, he had no trouble to find her. He brought her out here; then, after a short interval, returned to his usual ways. She endured the sprees, the gambling and immorality, as long as she could,—then died. Again he crossed the continent, and reduced the number of surplus women in his state by one more. She went over the same road. When she had been in her grave a proper time, he made trip for the third time, bringing back a third woman, who, like her predecessors, was refined and well educated. At the time the story was told me, she still lived, but in a purgatory that completely shut the gates to any paradise of which she may have dreamed; and he, poor fellow, was cursing himself for having caused such misery to such noble women, and fighting a losing battle to free himself from the giant that gripped him.

Homes and marriages and reforming men and uplifting humanity are all right, but the woman who undertakes to do reform work by marrying a man will be apt to wish she had stayed in the East and dug clams for a living.—Emma Harriman in Woman's Journal.

DON'T FORGET, good friends all, to send us names of independent thinkers—New Thought people, Rationalists, Agnostics, Spiritualists, Materialists, Free Religionists, Theosophists—to whom we may send sample copies of Lucifer, "Son of the Morning," "Herald of the Dawn," "Harbinger of the Good Time Coming"! We have some hundreds of copies printed extra each issue for the express purpose of sending them out as samples, and, if possible, we want several hundred new names each week, or each fortnight. And if with the names a few postage stamps can be sent to help pay the cost of wrappers and of mailing, all the better, but send the names!

Sexual abuse is the one source of woe that writers shun to explore, and the ills are generally suffered without an intelligent understanding. It is an evil thing to look upon the sexual relation as something vile or lowering. This puts it in the category with indulgence in alcohol or narcotics and has the influence to make individuals reckless after having once trespassed.—Dr. Wilder in "Stuffed Club."

"WHO IS THE ENEMY?"

Hugh O. Pentecost writes thus to Edwin C. Walker about the latter's new work, "Who is the Enemy: Anthony Comstock or You?" "Your pamphlet is a strong discussion of the question at issue that one could give to a conservative friend with some hope that he might read it through."

Dr. R. W. Shufeldt, biologist, author of several scientific works and of more than seven hundred articles on medicine, travel, science, sexual problems and other subjects, writes to E. C. Walker: "I thank you very much indeed for the copy you sent me of your valuable pamphlet, 'Who Is the Enemy: Anthony Comstock or You?' I have read it from cover to cover with the utmost satisfaction and unqualified approva.. It is one of the best and strongest things you have put out, and I am with you solid in both the letter and spirit of it. I prize the copy most highly." Ask for table of contents and specimen pages of "Who Is the Enemy?" or send 20 cents to this office for the pamphlet.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

With Macaulay, Rose Graul would say: "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman would be less loving and lovable, or that man would be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish.

LOVE'S COMING OF AGE.

BY EDWARD CARPENTER.

A treatise on Sexual Science and Marriage, rich in thought and strong in expression. Emphatically a book for the thinker.

Carpenter holds that woman's freedom is based upon economics; she must be independent financially that she may not be forced to sell herself in or out of marriage. He also makes a strong plea for a motherhood of freedom and thoughtful preparation.

SEX RADICALISM.

IX. WHAT MADE EMANCIPATION POSSIBLE?

This chapter in history might well be headed "The American Woman to the Rescue," so entirely is this epoch, in which all thoughtful people are earnestly desiring a science of sex as a guide to conduct, bound up with the circumstances, social prestige, and aspirations of the feminine portion of the great western nation.

Jane Bull has fought a good fight too, for the education and larger life of women, and thus also of men; and this in spite of every drawback of surroundings and tradition. The average Englishman has hindered her in every way; but according to a characteristic of that singular nation, that its exceptionally able men are distinguished by exactly the qualities in which the generality are lacking, the chivalry, imagination and clear-sighted logic of Shelley, John Stuart Mill, the still unknown medical author of "The Elements of Social Science,"—a book of many editions and often translated,—Edward Carpenter, and, to include an Irishman, Bernard Shaw, have been an inspiration both in and beyond their own country.

America, however, is the field in which the sex problem will be worked out both theoretically and practically. "Westward the course of empire takes its way," but it has been left for the conquerors of the most western continent to exhibit a conquest not before known in the history of mankind; for the character, the future, and the very existence of the American nations will be, and largely is, in the power of women. And if this power proves blind at first, and hostile to the interests of the race, the man's weapons—fist, rifle, treachery or diplomacy—will not avail him; the woman's weapons must be borrowed, patience and moral suasion, in the use of which man is yet but a child. He may hope to share the throne with her in guiding the destinies of mankind, but only on her own terms.

Trace the history of these things. We have the sturdy colonists of a northern race, with whom the moral equality of men and women was still a truth, and who believed in the religion of Jesus who also taught this moral equality, though the church had done its best to lower the position of women by ecclesiastical law, and to corrupt the religion it professed to hold and teach. With pioneers settling a new country, there is no talk about superfluous women; they are too valuable. Moreover, with a constant excess of men immigrants, women were at a scarcity value, and this they have retained ever since over the greater part of America. They have not succeeded in altering the iniquitous marriage laws in many of the states, but they have to a great extent got round them. The practice of divorce is certainly due to the influence of women, and is modifying marriage as it was never before modified. It is clearly the first expression of the demand of women for the right to own their own persons, and to bestow their favors where they see fit.

The stimulating climate of the new country, and its largely southern character, have certainly also had an effect on the Anglo-American temperament. And the careful observer, to whom nothing is a trifle, will also note various circumstances of heredity and of social custom which bear on the question. Among social conditions is the greater freedom in comfortable American homes resulting from the absence of servants.

At the same time has come the custom of limiting the family. This custom, practiced in various forms in many countries, has been adopted by American women with characteristic thoroughness. The men cannot reasonably complain of this. They denied citizenship to women and gave them no stake in the country, to borrow a phrase from conservatives, and told them that minding their own families was enough for them. The American woman replied with unanswerable logic: I can attend to a family of two much better than to a family of six or twelve. The men would now teach the women a different lesson, in the name of patriotism. But we will not help them to do it. I hope the scarcity of children will go on till maternity is honored at least as much as the trials and hardships of soldiers campaigning in wartime. It will then be worth while to supply the nation with a sufficiency of children. As Lois Waisbroker suggested, a world of the war and lust of men, regulated by men legislators, is not worth supplying with children. Be this as it may, it is certain that woman is mistress of the situation now that she can choose whether or not to exercise the maternal function; and that every civilized nation, having lost the power to enslave woman as mother, will be compelled to recognize her voluntary exercise of that function as by far the most important service of any class of citizens.

This control of the propagation of children has brought out another truth, which was also emphasized by the experience of the Oneida community, though it was one that nature so clearly points to, that none save puritans could have been so obtuse as to fail to perceive it before.

This truth is the distinction between the amative and reproductive power of sex, or as Lois Waisbroker (I think) called them, regenerative and generative. The organs of each, in each sex, are distinct. The amative instinct is present in each sex, but usually more constantly and markedly in the male; and as regards amative power, I suppose it must be universally conceded that men make the better lovers. Whether the jealousy and tyranny of men have operated to suppress amativeness in women, by constantly sweeping strongly sexual women from the paths of life into infamy and sterility or death, we do not know.

The puritans have concerned themselves chiefly with the propagative function. This, to borrow one of their own expressions, is the animal side of sex. Plenty of children is the plan of the lower animals, and of early man, to hold their own against outsiders. "Happy is the man who hath his quiver full of them." But we have now found other things better than our children to hurl at our enemies; and military skill first, and general scientific ability later, are more valuable than prolificness in the competition of races. Not children in quantity, but quality in children.

The yearning for children belongs almost exclusively to women; and the desire for maternity is not strictly speaking, an instinct. This feeling is never experienced at the same moment as sex-passion, (as Mrs. Whitehead recently seemed to imply), though exceptionally strong manifestations of passion may indicate to the reasoning woman a favorable period for propagation.

The recreative, inspiring side of sex in its most intense passional form has been the theme of poets and artists in all ages; and because it is not utilitarian and will not submit to rules, it is hated by puritans. No doubt its expression is more obviously important to the individual than to the race; and the puritan has not yet learnt that even if it may be only the individual who is directly defrauded when love is suppressed, the injury re-acts upon society, and that race will soon be the poorer which remorselessly inflicts deprivation and suffering upon individuals.

This recreative "magnetic" function of sex extends over nearly the whole of life, while the procreative power belongs properly to a much briefer period. In its health aspect it is recognized by various writers, and is discussed, up to the limit of our present knowledge, in Dr. E. B. Foote's books. Dr. Alice Stockham recommends the Oneida method of its exercise in "Karezza." A more developed method of the same sexual art is described fully in "Right Marital Living," by Ida Craddock—that noble woman who was hounded to death by the arch mail spy.

While it seems unlikely that the Oneida method in its entirety will become universal, it has certainly been adopted with success by many. Meantime, the important lesson is being learnt that the regenerative, "magnetic" power of sex has its great importance, apart from the generative power. This philosophy was very well stated in "The Truth About Love" (New York, 1872), an important work which should not be forgotten, the authorship of which was ascribed to the late Mrs. Croly ("Jennie June"), an Englishwoman resident in America.

The twentieth century has thus brought the most civilized nations face to face with two problems, corresponding to the two functions of sex, the regenerative, recreative function, instinctively desired, and the generative, procreative function, socially desired. First, how best to use the power of sex love, and waste none of it; and secondly how to encourage and reward women in the reproductive function so that they may be willing to bear more than two children each.

The true solutions to these two problems will involve the emancipation of men and women from the sexual superstitions now causing so much misery, and pave the way to a yet larger issue—the right breeding of the race.

My next and last subject of the series will be "An Ideal of Sex Life."

DORA FORSTER.

THE FUNCTIONS OF GOVERNMENT.

Criticisms of government by avowed Anarchists are likely to be regarded by the average person as being biased by an antagonism to government which may not be well founded. In view of LUCIFER'S recent experience with one branch of the government of the United States—the postoffice department—it is interesting to read the article on "Government" in the Encyclopaedia Britannica, written by Edmund Robertson, LL. D., professor of Roman law, University College, London. A cyclopaedia, by its very nature, is supposed to be fair and impartial, and no one will accuse Dr. Robertson of making the claims of government too strong. He begins his article with John Austin's statement "that a law is a command issued by a superior to a subject and enforced by a sanction or penalty."

Clearly legislation is not necessary to make such a law. It is merely the command of a superior to a subject. Madden is the superior and LUCIFER is the subject; ergo, Madden's command is law to LUCIFER.

"A sovereign is a person, or a determinate body of persons, to whom the bulk of the community is habitually obedient." According to that statement, obedience to law is merely a habit of the "bulk of the community." From the sovereign's point of view, a habit is bad when it does not enslave the "bulk of the community." LUCIFER advocates doctrines which are new to the bulk of the community; it advocates the habit of thinking instead of the habit of obeying; therefore LUCIFER'S habits are bad, in the eyes of the sovereign, and he sees in it a menace to his existence.

"Besides commanding the conduct of individuals, besides regulating the various relations of members of society, government may be conceived of as merely the instrument of society."

"May be conceived of!" How admirably cautious that statement! Notice that Dr. Robertson does not say that government is—not even sometimes—the instrument of society, but merely that it "may be conceived of" as such an instrument. In other words, we can make the idea of government more endurable by conceiving of it as an instrument of society, but even the learned professor of Roman law has carefully refrained from making the statement that such a conception of it would be correct.

Two of the functions of government, according to the paragraph quoted above, are "commanding the conduct of individuals" and "regulating the relations of the various members of society." Nothing is said there about the "consent of the governed." Yet if the bulk of the community habitually obey such commands and regulations, that is tacit consent.

But LUCIFER is opposed to "commanding the conduct of individuals" and to "regulating the relations of the various members of society." In fact, many defenders of government also deny its right to exercise these two functions, unless it be to a very limited extent. For this reason much legislation has for its object, not the regulation of the relations of the various members of society, but the restriction of the invasive tendencies of government. Men and women of intelligence know that commanding the conduct of individuals is detrimental to the individual as well as to society, except in cases where that conduct is invasive. They realize that it checks individual development and tends to degeneracy; that it is a menace to the development of society. Many persons who are not Anarchists believe that all attempts to regulate the relations of the members of society, unless such relations are those of master and slave, or are otherwise manifestly invasive, are unjustifiable and are fraught with grave danger to the welfare of the people. Hence these two functions are clearly invasive and are endured only by the sway of habit over the bulk of the community.

So strong is this habit that the bulk of the community in every government under the sky has imagined that its government was the best possible government. Dr. Robertson does not say this in so many words, but he does say: "Ideal constitutions have a suspicious resemblance to the constitutions with which their authors are most familiar. The political speculations of Plato and Cicero are based on the state systems of Greece and Italy. Cicero's ideal code in the treatise De Legibus is simply an adaptation of the Twelve Tables."

In discussing the logical or metaphysical account of the origin of government, Dr. Robertson says: "The phenomenon (sic!) to be accounted for being government and laws, it abstracted government and laws, and contemplated mankind as existing without them." In similar manner the defenders of government point to the crimes which exist under government—ignoring the fact that nearly all of these so-called crimes are the result of governmental restriction—and imagine that these crimes would increase to an appalling extent if the cause of them should be removed. Dr. Robertson almost sees this fallacy, for he continues: "The characteristic feature of this kind of speculation is that it reflects how contemporary men would behave if all government were removed, and infers that men must have behaved so before government came into existence." But he himself infers, seemingly, that all contemporary men, or at least an enormous number of them, if they were not restrained by government, would behave as so-called criminals behave now. He continues:

"It is easy to see how this kind of reasoning should lead to very different views of the nature of the supposed original state. With Hobbes, it is a state of war, and government is the result of an agreement among men to keep the peace. With Locke, it is a state of liberty and equality—it is not a state of war; it is governed by its own law—the law of nature, which is the same thing as the law of reason."

Yet, think of it, this same Locke—dear old John Locke, the master mind of the England of his day—held that his theories of civil government were sufficient "to establish the throne of our great restorer or present king, William, to make good his title in the consent of the people, which, being the only one of all lawful governments, he has more fully and clearly than any prince in christendom."

But, returning to the habitual obedience of the bulk of the community, it will be seen from Dr. Robertson's statements, that the nominal sovereigns are very careful to encourage this habit. He says: "However well it may suit the purposes of analytical jurisprudence to define a law as a command set by sovereign to subject, we must not forget that this is only a definition, and that the assumption it rests upon is, to the student of society, anything but a universal fact. * * * The absolute master of millions of men never dreams of making anything in the nature of law at all. * * * We shall have occasion to show that the popularization of government in England has up to this time been attended by a striking increase in the sphere of state action."

The nominal sovereign holds sway by letting the people believe they are governing themselves. Notice that it was not Sovereign Roosevelt who commanded the Chicago postmaster to refuse LUCIFER at second-class rates; it was a petty bureau lord, Madden. Of course, Madden defended himself by saying he was obeying the law made by the people; that LUCIFER did not comply with the requirements of the law in regard to advertising. But he refused to tell LUCIFER how much space it could give to advertising, and said it was not his business to do so. It is his business to command; it is LUCIFER'S business to obey. Mr. Madden is the officer of the bulk of the community who habitually obey.

There will be Maddens and Comstocks just as long as the bulk of the community keep up the habit of obeying them and believe that it is the proper function of the government to command the conduct of individuals and to regulate the various relations of the various members of society.

JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

SOCIALISM AND WOMAN'S EMANCIPATION.

Editor Lucifer: The two last issues of LUCIFER came to the new address on Monday last, the 17th. My reading of them had to wait a little, and so I have only just discovered Brother Kerr's reference to myself in his article on "The Economic Emancipation of Women." That is a subject in which, as a woman, I have always been deeply interested. In fact, I have felt that one of the chief reasons why I am a Socialist is that it seems to afford the only satisfactory solution to a difficult problem. Brother Kerr puts the matter so much better than I could that I feel I cannot improve on it. I did not know that the Socialist party in America was so extremely Grundy-ridden, but I have found that, drawing so largely from the foreign element, many of its members have a view of women considerably lower than that of the average American, not to say Socialist. There are some indeed whose only idea of the emancipation of woman seems to be that she is to go out to work and hand over the money to them. That is probably the exception, but it is true that so far as they are concerned, they are like the people Brother Kerr talks about who "really believe in the continuation of the present system" so far as concerns women, and do not realise that Socialism is concerned at all with their emancipation. This is, probably chiefly among the foreign element, for the native-born American has usually much better opinions where women are concerned, even if he is still as Brother Kerr says, Grundy-ridden.

Now as to the committee named in Brother Kerr's article, let me say Elsie Wilcox, Adeline Champney and myself have one qualification for the task in that all being I think mothers, we know our position practically. I have always read with care and generally agreed with what both my fellow nominees have written in LUCIFER, but I am pretty certain that Adeline Champney has not, if Elsie Wilcox has, such views on Socialism as would lead her to sympathize with much in Brother Kerr's article and I doubt if such a committee as he names would find enough common ground to work on. Certainly I think Dora Forster's name should be added, and why not Lillian Harman? If anything could be done, I would try to do my share, though out here in the backwoods with two small children I am somewhat handicapped.

AMY LINNETT.

Hot Springs, Ark., Oct. 21.

Dear Lucifer: In No. 1024 R. B. Kerr honors me by suggesting that I act with Adeline Champney and Amy Linnett in preparing a "manifesto demanding practical guarantee for the economic independence of women."

The wish does him credit and the subject is very near to my heart, but I fear there is little to be done at this time that will be effective. We women who believe in the justice of Socialism regard it as the only avenue of escape from the slavery that now binds us. And so fearful am I that by agitating any of our more advanced ideas we may frighten the timid conservatives and thereby lessen our chances of seeing Socialism established, that I hesitate to make any demand other than those already contained in the party platform. If we can once get control of the means of production and distribution it will be a simple matter to adjust the question of support for mothers and children. At least it seems so to me. But if we who call ourselves radical women push ourselves to the front and make such unusual demands we run great risks of defeating the entire project. It is better, I think, for us at present to "keep still and saw wood."

We can work quietly among our sisters, using every endeavor to arouse them to a sense of their position, to make them "class conscious" and to point out the best remedies for existing ills; but I fear the time is not ripe for an open demonstration of our feelings and convictions along sex lines.

Men are usually very hard to convince of the fact that a mother is nearer to her child than a father can possibly be, and so far as I can see, it would be utterly useless to attempt to make the average man see the justice of making the mother the sole guardian of her children

I am doing all I can in my quiet way to open the eyes of individuals to such facts, but when I see the dense ignorance that clouds the minds of even advanced Socialists I am almost discouraged.

Before closing I want to express my appreciation of Lillie White's "Nor Psychic Marriage Laws." There is no set rule that can govern love. There is no royal road to happiness, and, as Mrs. White aptly expresses it, "it is a dangerous thing to meddle with the love affairs of others." Advice, warning, education, above all things, education may be given the fledglings who are passing through the vagaries of "Love's young dream," but after all each afflicted one must "work out his or her own salvation," and must learn from experience to a great extent. Liberty is the one thing needful.

ELSIE COLE WILCOX.

A WOMAN'S DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

I have read your little pamphlet on "Institutional Marriage" several times and will say that I think it not a bit too strong when you say that our present system of marriage is a curse and a slavery.

I have become acquainted with about 800 or 900 children in my eleven years of teaching and I would not be afraid to venture that not even one dozen of these children were conceived in love and planned for. Most children are accidental, few are welcomed, and loved into life.

I used to wonder why men and women ceased to grow after marriage but it is plain enough to me now. If marriage were what it should be, and what we free people hope it will be in time, it would be the beginning of the sweetest and best of our lives.

The sex problem is the great question of the age. I can see in my experience with the world, that it is the well sexed men and women who have accomplished things worth while. But how much of this precious energy is wasted, simply because we were not taught to honor and hold as sacred our sexual nature.

We were taught to think of the sexual needs as vile; the normal man and woman have yielded to their passion, at the same time feeling that they were committing a sin, hence they degraded themselves by such act and such feelings.

I know in the eyes of society I have committed the unpardonable sin, but I can bear the sneers and jeers of the narrow minded conventional people and prove to them I am still honest and true. I will be true to my soul's desires and guidings and endure bravely whatever comes. Fear does not belong to my vocabulary.

I shall do my utmost to live the pure, free love-life that I know to be right and good, no matter what others think of me for it. I have six sisters who are married to good, kind men, yet they do not own themselves any more than the slaves of the South did before the war; and they must every little while commit the crime of abortion or else have a large family of unloved and unwelcome children. And because I do not believe in this sort of a life society would deprive me of my right to the love relation and a child or two if I see fit to have them.

I simply refuse to live the, to me, unbearable life of the conventional married woman. I do not intend to barter myself for a home nor be deprived of the rights of a human being. I will have them at any cost.

I am young yet, and may live to see the day when women will have the brains and positiveness to demand liberty for themselves, in the love relation as well as in other things.

I shall go on and live my free life in spite of public opinion. I shall do my share towards liberating the world from its silly superstitious ideas of sex and marriage.

I will not be daunted by slurs and sneers and persecutions of the ignorant people who are bound by creeds and dogmatisms, but it would be a genuine pleasure to meet some liberal minded people.

GEORGIA REPLOGLE,

Anarchist, Atheist, Materialist, Freelover and Beautiful Soul.
DIED, DENVER, COLORADO, OCT. 22, 1904.

DEDICATED TO HENRY REPLOGLE.

The doors have opened, they have shut,
And thro' their valves our friend has gone;
A gentle woman, brave and straight,
A friend to be depended on.

Life is a mystery to all,
The strangest part of life is death,
But deem you then that all is done
Because the lungs no more have breath?

But she was wise and she was sweet,
And, whether death be death or no,
She lived a life worth while and great,
And that is why we loved her so.

J. WILLIAM LLOYD.

IN MEMORIAM.

Georgia E. Replogle passed into the unknown Oct. 22. Her life was a beautiful one, and despite the years of illness she never lost her beautiful character, her superb charity and patience. LUCIFER readers are numerous who knew her well; they will feel the loss as much as can be.

Her funeral was a beautiful one; her dear friends said the things they thought, read her favorite selections, sang her songs.

Now that it's over, that Our Georgia sleeps forever in the cemetery—under a beloved elm tree—where the mountains keep a vigil—we who remain have nothing left but the memory of her who lived so well, so beautifully. She cherished her friends—she loved nature, her life was a poem—to emulate her would be farcical—to remember her as she was is our boon.

Many who see this will say, "Dear Georgia," and, after all is said and done, can any better tribute be offered?

B. F. BUKK.

It is with a feeling of sadness for myself and for all who loved and needed "Our George," and yet with joy for her release from her long agony, that I give to our readers the news of the death of Georgia Replogle. She was one of my earliest and dearest friends; one who had a very great influence on my life. She was one to whom, as a young girl, I could talk of my hopes, my ambitions, as I could to no one else—one with whom I could "think aloud." Many years have passed since we parted, but it has seemed good to know that she lived and that I had her sympathy and her love. And now—well, she is released from her suffering, and I know that if conscious existence continues, her true, loving spirit is the same.

Her enthusiasm for her work was so great that she ignored her physical needs, working long and steadily, with insufficient care for herself. The result was that she has been an invalid for many years, though continuing to work as long as it was possible to do so. Everything that could be done by her friends for her relief was done, but without avail—so now the end has come. A biographical sketch will probably appear in our next issue.

VOLTAIRINE DE CLEYRE.

It is a source of great pleasure to me to be able to correct the statement that Voltairine de Cleyre is dead, which statement was made in LUCIFER No. 1025. When last heard from, she was slowly improving. I found the news of her alleged death in the Demonstrator, of Home, Wash. I do not know where it obtained the information, but probably from some daily newspaper. While I am very sorry to have prematurely announced her death, I am very glad indeed to be able to state that it was an erroneous announcement. May she live for many years to continue her work for the world, and may the years bring renewed health and augmented happiness to herself.

JUST A WORD.

St. Louis, Nov. 5.—Contrary to expectation I am detained here beyond the time of going to press for No. 1026. To-night I had the pleasure of meeting and addressing the St. Louis Co-operative League at their hall, corner of Locust and Eleventh streets; subject, "Voluntary Co-operation vs. Compulsory Morality." The audience was not equal in size to the average crowds at the various congresses I have seen during the past three weeks, but in point of earnestness and of intelligent understanding of the basic causes of our social, political and economic ills I place the membership of the St. Louis Co-operative League far in advance of that of the larger aggregations—as I see and read them.

To-morrow night I am invited to address an organization called "The Brotherhood," at the same place. Have been kept pretty busy the past week, too busy to put my notes in shape for publication, and now that the hour is here, the last half hour, in fact, in which copy can be sent to Chicago in time for next LUCIFER I must say good night, hoping to do better when No. 1027 goes to press.

GETTING BACK TO THE WORLD OF REALITY.

Perhaps the most astonishing and wonderful feature, among so many astonishing and wonderful features, of Mrs. Whitehead's crusade against prevention of conception save by total abstinence, is her quiet and persistent assumption that only men desire association when children are not intended. Reading her communications, the conclusion is irresistible that she thinks men always are wholly responsible when there is association for non-propagative purposes. Seemingly, she actually believes, and wants the world to believe, that men have to use force of one kind or another whenever women join with them, except the one time, or perhaps as many as six times in life, when concrete results are desired and deliberately planned. Sam Walter Foss tells us of "The Man Who Knew Men"; certainly Mrs. Whitehead is not "The Woman Who Knows Women."

Does Mrs. Whitehead—excellent woman—always reason subjectively, or is memory playing her sad tricks? Has she no outlook? Knows she nothing of the objective world? Is it possible that the women of her acquaintance, without exception, or even a considerable minority of them, the women who are of average sexual development, are in fair health, are not mismated, and are between eighteen and fifty years of age, furnish the data for Mrs. Whitehead's amazing assumption and generalization? If so—and it is a large "if"—then all that needs be said is that her experience with her sisters is out of the ordinary, is as astonishing and wonderful as is her preconception concerning the whole of womankind.

"The New Lights," a drama in four acts, by Hugh Mann, is intended to be a parti-historical sketch of a sect called the New Lights, or New Mennists, which was established early in the nineteenth century by schism from the Mennonites of Pennsylvania in the interests of greater religious purism. The adherents of this sect are non-resistant. They take no part in politics—not even to the extent of voting. They refuse to go to war; they also refuse to "go to law," even to recover stolen property. Like other sects, they regard themselves as the only true church of Christ, looking upon all other sects as heretical. Their children are not members by birthright, and, as they make no effort to proselyte, the sect is slowly dying out. The author assures us that the descriptions of dress, manner, and customs, religious doctrines and practices, are transcriptions from life. The incidents which make the plot are founded upon fact, and occurred in the generation preceding that of the author; but so little has the life of this exclusive sect changed in the past century that these incidents might have taken place within the past year.

In the course of the play two "maid servants"—Hannah and her sister Ellen, the latter a new arrival in the community—are discussing their respective masters and mistresses (a not unusual occupation) and their religion as well. Hannah is thinking seriously of embracing this religion, as her master is a widower—and interested in the welfare of the girl's soul. Which is also not strange or unusual.

Ellen—"He might treat you like Mr. Eichberger treats his wife."

Hannah (surprised)—"And how's that?"

Ellen—"Why, she never dares to set down to the table with him. She makes me eat with him, and she goes off by herself until we're done. Now, ain't that awful! What's the reason, do you think?"

Hannah—"Oh, that's what you mean! Why, she's been turned out o' meetin'."

Ellen—"Turned out o' meetin'! Well, what's that got to do with it?"

Hannah (solemnly)—"The scriptur's says, 'With such an one, no not to eat.'"

Ellen—"My! My! Does the scriptur's say that? There's a lot in 'em that I don't know anything about."

Hannah—"You'd better learn a little more."

Ellen—"My! My! And his own wife, too—and can't eat at the same table with him! But she sleeps with him."

Hannah (sententiously)—"The scriptur's don't say nothin' agin that."

Later it develops that Mrs. Eichberger's crime was her desire to have Venetian blinds at her windows, in which desire she "doubly sinned. She had been guilty of the lust of the eye and of disobedience to her husband." She had not been allowed to defend herself against the accusation because "the holy Paul enjoins upon women to keep silence in the church,—to let their husbands speak for them." And in this instance the husband himself was the accuser.

The book is interesting as a view of the narrow lives of the members of a narrow sect. It contains 51 pages, is beautifully printed and bound, and will be sent by the publisher, Richard G. Badger, The Gorham Press, Boston, Mass., for $1.

"Who Is Responsible for the Colorado Trouble?" by Joseph Shatz Shatzke, is a statement of the case by one who claims that he was there during the trouble, and that he belonged to neither the Miners' Union nor the Citizens' Alliance. From the introduction we quote the following:

"There are people who claim they are doing a just act by exiling the miners from Cripple Creek or from Telluride. They claim the miners are a lot of murderers and dynamiters. I was up there from the 10th to the 20th of May, 1904. The striking miners seemed to get along very peaceably; they were assisted by the outside world; they had plenty to eat, and most of them claimed they were fighting for a principle. I am well acquainted all over the district—in fact, all over the state. Of course I was told, but never met the individuals, that there were people who belonged to the union who exercise violence against the non-union men. I was told they drove out a few non-union men from the camp. Suppose that is the case; a man who will try to use violence against his fellow men is very ignorant. A man must recognize the fact that he has no right to take life which he cannot give back. Did the Citizens' Alliance do any better; did it show a better example to the Federation? No, they did not. I believe in order. If I committ a crime I want to be tried by a jury and if found guilty I want to be punished. But I do not believe in mob law. And there are some people who claim that the exile method was necessary for the public safety. I claim it was not. There was nothing in the Cripple Creek district to be destroyed by the miners, and they never had any intention to do so. I have been among them, talked with them, and the actions of the Citizens' Alliance is actually a disgrace to the American flag. I write the following without prejudice to either side and I hope the reader will be the judge and the American people shall see that such lawlessness and mob law shall be abolished, and law and order, liberty and justice, shall be established."

The pamphlet may be ordered from this office. Price, 5 cents per copy; $2.50 per 100.

"Mother-Soul" is the title of a collection of poems pertaining to motherhood—the conscious joy of motherhood—by Laura Smith Wood. They are written in a style somewhat similar to that of Walt Whitman. Some of the titles are: "Every Stitch Is a Benediction;" "The Little Outfit;" "The Quickening;" "Unto the World a Child Is Born;" "Madonna;" and "I Only Know That It Is Well." An attempt to voice the inexpressible pathos of the loss of a little one is called "Gone"—

I stand apart—
I approach not—
My head is bowed—
The faint strange perfume in the room.
The tiny, tiny blossom in the long white baby clothes.
The silken petals of the casket enfolding.
And the pallor!
In an upper chamber a woman rests heavily on the pillow;
The blue veins show in her wrist.
She is not weeping—she is just tired, tired,—
Her Soul is away for a little while.
A man, alone, looks out over a new grave.
His eyes are wide and very still.
His cheek bones show.
And oh,—the void! the void! the void!

It may seem strange that I have given this poem after saying that the poems embody the joys of motherhood. But this is the only sad one in the collection.

The copy before me is inscribed "To Moses Harman, Noble Struggler for Woman. With Appreciation from the Author."

The price is not given, but I presume it is 25 cents.

J. William Lloyd announces the publication of the second edition of his "Dawn-Thought on the Reconciliation; A Volume of Larger Religion." "Touching with insight and solution all questions of life, love, soul, and society. Simple enough for a child to enjoy, deep enough to make a philosopher think. The largest creed, the most generous theory, the gladdest gospel. A book of Life. A Religion of Growth and Freedom." Edward Carpenter has written:

"I am much indebted to you for your book 'Dawn-Thought,' which I have been reading with great interest. I think you have expressed in short compass, and very pithily, the philosophical ideas which have underlain the best modern literature....and I don't know where I have found these ideas formulated so thoroughly, with a good deal of evidently original thought in places ....I think your expression of Separateness as the 'working fiction' of the universe is excellent. That is, of course, the keynote of the whole. And of individualities attaining to Divinity, all along different lines, and of Love as the process of growth: and of the reconciliation of opposites....I like your treatment of Spiritualism....Also your treatment of Sex."

"Dawn-Thought" is printed in old style antique type, on specially made paper, with rubricated initials and side titles and a half-tone portrait of the author. It is bound in green cloth, and is sold for $1 by the author, J. William Lloyd, Box 511, Westfield, N. J.

Any of the foregoing books may be ordered of L. Harman, 500 Fulton street, Chicago.

When a writer once asked Mother Jones why it was she stirred up the women, she replied that it was because every drop of their blood was precious, that they were the inner life of the race, and that every nation was but the reflex of its women. "No nation," said she, "will ever get beyond the development of its women. Lift up the women, make them intellectual; thus will great sons be born, and men find true comrades in their wives."—Ex.

LOCATIONS FOR COLONY.

Bro. Harman: If the friends of LUCIFER desire to make a home for the paper, and themselves, as has often been suggested and as I wrote you a short time ago, there is at the present time an opportunity for them to do so. I have looked up three properties near this city, one of 335 acres, mostly hill land, suitable for fruits or grains, while 100 acres of good bottom land can be used for vegetables, etc. About 100 acres cleared, the rest has wood enough on it to pay the cost of clearing. There are seven or eight small cabins and houses on this land that could soon be repaired, to house 12 to 15 families, two large barns, probably 50 by 100 feet each, one of them in good repair, the other not so good, probably the buildings upon this tract cost $3,000 to erect. This tract lies six miles east of Santa Cruz, about two miles from Monterey bay half a mile from a good country road. This tract will not be suitable to divide into acre tracts but could be worked co-operatively to much better advantage. Price $8,500.

Another tract joining the 335 acres on the east, has 140 acres; 60 cleared, no house, but a large barn. Water piped to where house was burned. A good view of bay and of this city can be had from this tract. Can be divided into acre lots if desired. Price $7,500.

The third tract lies three miles east of Santa Cruz, 106 acres, all level land; all cleared and tillable. Is used at present as hay and stock farm. All fenced but poor fences. Santa Cruz, Capitola and Watsonville electric line passes through the center. Southern Pacific R. R. about 20 rods to the north of the tract. This land extends to the bay of Monterey and has perhaps 300 feet frontage on the bay. House and barn worth probably $2,000. No fruit on the place but fruit can be grown, except grapes.

Under intensive farming one-half acre ought to produce all an ordinary family would need in the garden and fruit line, as crops can be grown here the year round. One mile from Capitola. Good county roads. Price $150 per acre.

This last tract is a good bargain, taking a commercial view of it, as it is located favorably for an advance in price. A good place for a summer resort; and that might be one of the paying industries.

DEFENSE OF SINGLE TAX.

I think you will find the reason that children are not well born is that they have not their equal right to the land, the source of life.

Alfred B. Westrup thinks that our arbitrary money system is the cause of poverty. Money is an idea, just as a yardstick or bushel measure is an idea, each having a part in facilitating trade or barter. Under our land tenure if barter could do the trading fast enough without the use of money we would still have poverty. The land problem must be settled before we can have true freedom and then sex and industrial slavery will settle themselves easily.

The rent of land is the difference betwen valuable land and the best land to be had for nothing. As population comes to settle, or moves away, this rent rises and falls. It causes no labor effort, therefore is unearned. In political economy it is called "the unearned increment of value which attaches to land." Evidently this great public fund comes to us as cheap as air or sunshine.

But what do all governments do with this fund that of right belongs to all just as much as air does?

They make it private property. How?

By making land the same as a hat or peck of potatoes. But this breaks the fundamental law of rent, for this rent attaches to nature's bounty and is a public fund. Hence the landlord as such has a legal steal of public rent.

This legal steal of the rent is the least part of the crime, for it deprives the people of their equal right to land the source of life, and therefore our equal right to be well born.

Just tax this rent into the public treasury, making it impossible for any one to hold much more land than he can put to best use. Who but a fool would be burdened holding more than that?

When government collects the rent, year by year, he would soon tire of holding only for best use.

The Creator has given land abundantly for best use, but not enough for land speculators; at least not enough of valuable land.

Land has utility everywhere but no money value attaches till people settle down to make homes, farms, etc. But this restoration of rent to the people eliminates the land speculator.

I have written enough for anyone to see that this restoration will give to each an equal chance to land and therefore put us in our right relation to the earth. Hence each child would be well born because it would have this great inheritance and no fear of poverty.

No fear of poverty means that each would serve the other for esteem, as that is the dominating desire when justice is done. Then our mothers and sisters would be truly free for the first time in the history of nations. No woman would scheme to feather her nest by capturing a rich man for she would have an equal chance to produce wealth with men, and would only marry or mate for love, and since there would be no worry about poverty, no matter if they had twenty children, therefore their children would be well born. All this is brought about by an economic reform which is simply to tax the rent of land into the public treasury instead of into private pockets, as is done now and always has been done in the past.

Settle the land problem and the race, the labor and the sex problems will be settled. People will be in their right mind because in their right relation to land, the source of life. Yours for justice,

C. B. PONSER.

"WHAT FOOLS THESE MORTALS BE!"

[Beaver Falls, Pa., Oct. 23.—Dear Friend: Enclosed find editorial from the Minneapolis Tribune, a conservative paper, edited and managed by a Catholic. Several dozen more such editors and in a few years Anthony Comstock and his gang would have to "take to the tall timber." Yours truly, E. K.]

After all we are not very wise in dealing with obscure but vital questions that underlie the very foundations of civilized society and affect the spiritual and moral health of the race. We wrangle in public over the responsibility of the law and its ministers for the disasters that overtake uncared-for youth in the congested and vitiated life of cities. Then we shrink in private from the frank warning and careful guidance of ignorant children and the social education of parents almost as ignorant.

We lament the domestic unhappiness that fills the divorce court with wrecks of families. We deplore the errors of hot young blood that wreck so much raw material for families before it reaches the supreme fulfillment of nature's purpose in marriage. But we send authors and publishers to the penitentiary when they try to naturalize in this country some of the scientific knowledge of the laws and conditions of vitality which European experience and investigation have gathered into books of supreme utility.

We pour out money like water to endow colleges and universities to teach everything under the sun from Sanscrit to making mud pies, excepting the knowledge of the laws and conditions of that on which the vitality and perpetuity of the race depend. We teach sons and daughters everything on earth except how to be fathers and mothers. We shun this supreme subject like the plague. We crucify those who would enlighten the ignorance of the mature and shield the innocence of the young.

We drive our sons to advertising harpies to be poisoned and fleeced. We throw our daughters into the streets with less protection from the temptations that assail youth than we give our domestic cattle. Then we denounce law and government for not doing the work we have lazily shirked, and think we can save children we have doomed to ruin by voting for some glib-tongued moral reformer for municipal office. "What fools these mortals be."

DON'T FORGET, good friends all, to send us names of independent thinkers—New Thought people, Rationalists, Agnostics, Spiritualists, Materialists, Free Religionists, Theosophists—to whom we may send sample copies of Lucifer, "Son of the Morning," "Herald of the Dawn," "Harbinger of the Good Time Coming"! We have some hundreds of copies printed extra each issue for the express purpose of sending them out as samples, and, if possible, we want several hundred new names each week, or each fortnight. And if with the names a few postage stamps can be sent to help pay the cost of wrappers and of mailing, all the better, but send the names!

VARIOUS VOICES.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, step at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and step at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

[Full name and address of writers in this department can generally be obtained on application to the editor.]

F. H. McGowan, Safford, Ariz.—I have been an interested reader of the discussion of the name, and think R. B. Kerr's ideas on that subject are O. K., as they seem to be on about everything else of which he writes. Inclosed find renewal of subscription.

Geo. E. Bowen, St. Louis, Kirkwood Station.—LUCIFER has lately assumed a mighty strength in the logic, the living force, of its well timed and well chosen arguments. When will the blind come out of the night they have adopted?....Am glad you could be here to reassure the timid, the uncertain, and bestow upon the awakening ones the aid of your wisdom, your patience and loyalty.

Wm. Fretz, Trenton, N. J.—About four or five weeks ago I sent you notice of death of Hulda G. Heacock of Vineland, who died Aug. 29 last. I supposed you would make mention of it in LUCIFER, but I have looked in vain for even one line of such notice. She was a well known radical and had many friends among LUCIFER'S readers. Perhaps you will make some mention about it yet. If you can consistently I wish you would give me address and name of Mrs. "B. M.," who has an article in last LUCIFER entitled "Will It Break Up Homes?"

W. H., Camden, O.—I see that the series of articles on "The Marriage Problem" continues in The Public. Post writes me that he expects to publish them later as a monograph. While he is not radical, neither is he ultra-conservative. I believe him to be honest, and he is undeniably able. I think we should welcome any concessions, however slight, from the conventional-minded as evidence of an awakening sense of right in the sexual relation. I but so recently succeeded in ridding myself entirely of the sex superstition that I know how to be lenient with those who still are benighted. However my conversion is complete.

Lona R. Mathers, Okla.—We have secured a little home here and think we can soon renew our subscription, as we can be permanently located for a few years. We feel that the old contributors to LUCIFER, as well as yourself and Lillian, are our dear friends, and long to have the paper coming on its regular visits once more. Enclosed find twenty-five cents in stamps to pay for a copy of LUCIFER and for a copy of "Motherhood in Freedom" and also "A Free Man's Creed." I well remember when "A Free Man's Creed" was called out by the death of May Collins, and when we were requested not to place LUCIFER on the reading table of our Freethought Society at Wichita, Kansas,—when you so ably took up the controversy with the result that we were invited to return and place LUCIFER on the reading table again....We have met here Mr. Jacob Wise—the man who had to stand suit for mailing a postal card to a preacher—who gave us your present address.

[Very glad to hear from our old-time Wichita friends once more. They have spent several years in search of a better location for a permanent home, and now that they think they have found it we shall be glad to send them the paper regularly as of old....I was present at the trial of Jacob Wise at Topeka, Kan., for mailing a verse copied from the prophet Isaiah, for which offense he was imprisoned a short time and compelled to pay a fine of $50, besides expenses of prosecution. He was tried before Federal Judge Foster, the same who had, some years previously, in the same court room, condemned me to five years in the penitentiary and to pay a fine of $300, for publishing the "Markland letter," which letter was simply a manly protest against the crime of marital rape.—M. H.]

J. W. H., Bellingham, Wash.—I have often paid subscriptions to LUCIFER—for other people—and now I will send one dollar to have it sent to my own address, hoping to remain a subscriber so long as the paper retains its present size and name. The contents of LUCIFER for some weeks past, as you have remarked, have shown a "revival of learning" of well spent effort at common-sense thought and expression along sex lines. Dora Forster's "Sex Radicalism" articles are fine; Lillie White in No. 1024 hits vital truth—but I can't name all the good things. In No. 1025 J. William Lloyd has some excellent ideas anent motherhood—"Intelligent Survival of the Fittest," and a sufficient answer to William Platt's article. Regarding this topic of evolution, I agree with friend Crane that, speaking of those who have progressive ideas, or think they have, to place before other people, "all these efforts are a part of evolution." More, they help; are necessary! Every person who thinks he or she has possession of truths someone else has not, owes it to himself and humanity to try to explain, to educate, using their best judgment as to when and how. The effort will develop their own character and help along the general evolution of society to a higher, broader conception of natural law or nature's ways. As regards unprogressive Freethinkers who "do not see the use" of study and expression on sex lines, they are following their bent, doing the best they can, going as far as their inherited tendency, and ability or opportunity for development will allow. Many, like Livesey, who contend against government ownership or control of postal system, think all organization as at present constituted, is worse than useless, but is it so? Is it not all a necessary part of social evolution? Organization is necessary—the use the people make of it depending upon the development of the average mind. The same power, the same minds who control the wealth of the world—the railroads, the mines, the manufactories—control also the governments at present. What difference then, if individuals, or a trust in private hands, handles our mail, etc., or a so-called "government" handles it, controlled by the same money power? Where do the capitalists get and keep their power? From the fact that the average mind has not evoluted above the commercial idea—of being also a capitalist, of getting something for nothing in a customary manner! The average person is uninformed as yet along these lines. When the majority get their eyes open do you suppose capitalism will continue? No more than chattel slavery did. Yet so long as conditions continue wage and sex slavery, that slavery will, in some respects, get more degrading, until its final overthrow, just as a useless organ gets more in the way the less used till finally atrophied. Rational sex knowledge is highly needed by millions of people, but there is much religious superstition and commercial superstition to be eradicated before—well, before babies can be born with the proper mental trend to learn to understand what sex means."

LACK OF LOVE NO CAUSE FOR DIVORCE.

Editor Lucifer: The following is an extract from the court report of the Los Angeles Examiner, Oct. 18:

"My wife does not love me." That was the wail of George I. Machris to Judge Allen yesterday in his endeavor to secure a divorce from Myrtle E. Machris. The judge looked over the papers in the case and then frowned down on the attorney and plaintiff, and said: "The question of love doesn't enter into this at all. If this love question did enter into the matter of giving divorce decrees, 40 per cent of our marriages could be annulled and the very foundation of society would be undermined."

The Examiner adds: "That ended it. Machris will have to find some other ground for a separation."

Perhaps that is law, but is it common sense? If a man and woman form a partnership to raise chickens, and find they cannot work well together, they are at liberty to separate. No court can compel them to continue the partnership, and society would not suffer if they did. But when a man and woman form a partnership to raise children, and afterwards ascertain that mutual love—the only true basis of such partnership—no longer exists, and that society will be injured by the addition to its members of the ill-born offspring of such a loveless marriage, then courts and the church hold that annulment of marriage for such cause would undermine the very foundations of society. Neither judges nor clergymen satisfactorily explain such an anomaly, but possibly LUCIFER can throw some light on the subject.

"WHO IS THE ENEMY?"

Hugh O. Pentecost writes thus to Edwin C. Walker about the latter's new work, "Who Is the Enemy: Anthony Comstock or You?" "Your pamphlet is a strong discussion of the question at issue that one could give to a conservative friend with some hope that he might read it through."

Dr. E. W. Shufeldt, biologist, author of several scientific works and of more than seven hundred articles on medicine, travel, science, sexual problems and other subjects, writes to E. C. Walker: "I thank you very much indeed for the copy you sent me of your valuable pamphlet, 'Who Is the Enemy: Anthony Comstock or You?' I have read it from cover to cover with the utmost satisfaction and unqualified approval. It is one of the best and strongest things you have put out, and I am with you solid in both the letter and spirit of it. I prize the copy most highly." HILDA'S HOME.

BY ROSA GRAUL.

With Macaulay, Rosa Graul would say: "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that women would be less loving and lovable, or that man would be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish.

LOVE'S COMING OF AGE.

BY EDWARD CARPENTER.

A treatise on Sexual Science and Marriage, rich in thought and strong in expression. Emphatically a book for the thinker.

Carpenter holds that woman's freedom is based upon economics; she must be independent financially that she may not be forced to sell herself in or out of marriage. He also makes a strong plea for a motherhood of freedom and thoughtful preparation.

SEX RADICALISM.

X. AN IDEAL OF SEX LIFE.

It is unfortunately impossible to live an ideal life in the society of to-day; but the clearer our ideals are, the nearer we shall ourselves get to them, and the sooner will those who come after us be able to carry them out completely.

The great evils resulting from our present sex system fall under the heads of the three parts of that system, celibacy, prostitution and bond marriage; and while whole classes are the special victims of one or other of these nearly all their lives, each individual, even among the more fortunate, usually suffers to some extent from each. Instead of these three we should aim at securing that: (1) Education and training in sexual and emotional life should be combined with intellectual training for youth of both sexes; (2) men should not be driven to associate with hirelings by being forbidden intimacy with women of their own social standing, and women should be allowed to exercise the maternal function in comfort and honor, without the sex bondage which is practically a form of prostitution; (3) home partnership should not imply too close or exclusive association nor exclusive rights in the person of another.

I venture to make the following suggestions for an intelligent plan of life in relation to sex, based on the needs of three successive periods of life, contrasting them with our present methods. These three periods are, by a rough but sufficiently correct division, (1) beginning about the age of fourteen, (2) after twenty-one, and (3) after twenty-eight.

1. Celibacy with its ignorance and false mental and physical habits is forced upon our boys and girls after they have entered upon adult life, and this childish mental state is made compulsory upon all girls and women outside marriage, and without their own choice may be prolonged for their lifetime.

The whole of the bulwarks of hypocrisy and falsehood which the Puritans have raised around their system must be destroyed; and our first reform must be to abolish the Puritan idea that sex is sinful, and this will make it possible to give children necessary knowledge in their early years, and thus save them many misgivings when they reach the trying years of the first teens. The commonest decency and humanity should dictate that knowledge of health should be given at this juncture; yet under Puritan rule, and honor of ignorance, this is very often omitted or given too late, in the case of both boys and girls; and the instruction, when given, is unsympathetic, unintelligent, inaccurate and misleading.

I believe that boys and girls ought to have, and in the future will have, definite teaching, both theoretical and practical, in sex. It is not uncommon now for a father or elder brother to initiate a young man into natural sex habits by introducing him to a girl of lowly life, who however is not qualified nor expected to give instruction in this art of life. This is perhaps often the best that can be done, in the difficulties of Puritan surroundings; but who can doubt that association with a free woman and honored friend would be far better?

Sexual education was carried out successfully in the Oneida community. To train the young girl, to enable her to command her own passions, to tranquilize her emotions, she of her own free will was allowed to choose such of the elderly men for her partners as were personally most agreeable to her. * * * So also the young men. * * * These loves were social not propagative. (Truth about Love, p. 128.)

The youth, boy or girl, would be encouraged to choose an adviser and friend from among trusted friends of the family. How soon he or she should take the "first communion" of love would depend on temperament and inclination; but it should usually come not later than the age of sixteen. A girl should have one preparation for this first occasion; and surgical skill of a simple kind will save her suffering, and save her the unfortunate mental associations of pain. This should always be attended to, but rarely is. And the unpreparedness, both mental and physical, with which girls are allowed to plunge into all the doubtful chances and serious certainties of married life is among our worst social cruelties.

When the true idea of the responsibilities of love and friendship is fully established, it will be impossible to drift back into the carelessness which so many of us have suffered from, and seen and deplored.

The earliest friendships, though not the best, are made before the age of twenty; and this is also the time to form the intellectual habit of life which should be the counterpoise to the emotional.

2. Prostitution exists more especially for men between twenty and thirty, and according to Puritan rules is justified by their needs, though involving, also by Puritan rules, the degradation of large numbers of women. But the man who has in earlier youth formed love relations with one or more educated and responsible women, his equals, under a code of freedom, will not need to resort to prostitutes.

In another form, prostitution invades marriage; and the wife, even when engaged in maternal functions, has to render sexual service in return for maintenance of herself and her children.

Between twenty and thirty is the best age for many things; and these years, with their energy, will hold many projects and their fulfilment; but by far the most important one for women is maternity, and this period of life is the safest for it. A girl trained to know the responsibilities of love relations will have learned to exercise a wise choice in her men friends, and in her lovers, one or more; and she will thus be fit for the further responsibility of choosing well for fatherhood of her children,—a responsibility which many of us now see is so vastly important, and the principle of which has been long and courageously advocated by Moses Harman. No woman leading a natural life will be without associates, both men and women, at this time; but the cares of rearing and tending young children should not be combined with the daily care of having to wait on and amuse a man, as so often at present; nor should a man in ordinary daily work be troubled by having to live with babies.

Puritan society appears indifferent as to how men of twenty to thirty amuse themselves, but accords praise to those who are soonest driven into matrimony by their discomforts, and isolation from all cultured women. By social freedom in love, this isolation is made unnecessary.

We cannot lay too much stress on the value of friendship as an educational force, and as a means of forming strong social fibre. Friendship may be described as a bond of intellectual interests and of work in common, blended with sentiment, and differing from more distinctly emotional and sexual comradeship. It is the only true basis for the sexual relation. Yet it is made almost impossible, by our social laws, to form this link before the sexual partnership of marriage is entered into. One of the worst crimes of Puritanism is that it throws discredit upon friendship between the opposite sexes, and practically makes it impossible. And it is a matter of the commonest observation that conventional marriage is hostile to friendship of every kind.

The poets of the past have been more clear-sighted than are the educationists of to-day as to the value of friendship.

> Scorn no man's love, though of a mean degree;
> Love is a present for a mighty king.

Most of our sex problems begin in false custom, but some are natural difficulties, and one of these needs special attention, as while it is not caused by custom, it is certainly increased by it. It arises from a divergence in the emotional tendencies of men and women. It seems strange that the quicker-thoughted sex should be slower in passional feeling and in the culmination of natural association; but so it is; and I believe the difference arises from the only real mental difference between the sexes,—that women more readily respond to many different suggestions or mental stimuli in succession, while men have a tendency to greater concentration of thought. Each kind of mentality has its merits, and no less in sexual association; but since the sexes are to tread a measure together, the training of each should not be such as to increase the difficulty of their keeping in step. The woman has only known diffusive sentiment, and she is apt to fatigue the lord of her heart by it. To her all the pathway of love is beautiful, and she loves to gather flowers up to the very gate of the shrine. Her sense impressions are usually more diffused, and may involve all the nerves, and under some circumstances she experiences sex trance, a state which is probably more rarely felt or approximated to by men. The man concentrates his thoughts; and his experiences have usually accustomed him to seize his sex joys hurriedly. He loves in the same manner as some of our northern barbarians drink,—he tosses off the wine of life in one fierce draught, caring only that it quenches thirst, instead of sipping its delicious fragrance. More complete knowledge for both sexes, and more worthy experiences and training will do much to adjust this discrepancy.

2. While the intellectual life is well established in middle youth, the emotional life continues to develop much later. The age of twenty-eight to thirty seems especially to bring stronger and more intense feelings, though these, I believe, should not come in a sort of burst, as they often do with our celibate men and women, sometimes rushing them into ill-considered marriages.

It is doubtful whether the majority will or will not enter into home partnership, when not compelled by the disagreeable conditions attendant upon bachelorhood, which seem purposely promoted by Puritan custom. For those who have a genius and desire for domestic life, and I believe very many have, the age of twenty-eight or thirty seems the best for entering upon home partnership.

I believe no one who has deeply studied the philosophy of sex will endorse the view formerly prevalent that sex relations should be wholly and rigidly restricted to the one partnership. Little as we know of the exact nature of sex "magnetism," all experience goes to show that at least occasional variety is very beneficial, both mentally and physically. Great improvement in the standard of sex relations results; and while the frequency of the sexual association may become less, there is gain in its quality. All the domestic couples I have known, who have thus eliminated prejudice, jealousy and deceit from their lives, have reaped the reward of increased happiness.

To many, the best and least alloyed happiness of love comes in the later half of life, and the power of the love sentiment should be life long.

When we have a real desire for knowledge, we shall learn how to love, and how to go on loving throughout life.

DORA FORSTER.

Men are not superior by the accidents of race or color. They are superior who have the best heart—the best brain. Superiority is born of honesty, of virtue, of charity, and, above all, of the love of liberty. The superior man is the providence of the inferior. He is eyes for the blind, strength for the weak, and a shield for the defenseless. He stands erect by bending above the fallen. He rises by lifting others.—Ingersoll.

SOCIAL AND ANTI-SOCIAL ELEMENTS.

My Dear Mr. Marman:—In LUCIFER No. 1024 Mr. Bolton Hall makes the startling statement that I am "a keen thinker but no Socialist," with the obvious implication that the one excludes the other. My bump of modesty is not sufficiently strong to make me silly enough to claim that I can not think, and as I am undoubtedly a Socialist I submit the following definition from the text books, to alleviate somewhat Mr. Hall's embarrassment:

"Socialism is the belief that the next important step in progress is a change in man's environment of an economic character that shall include the abolition of every privilege whereby the holder of wealth acquires an anti-social power to compel tribute."

This brings me to the occasion that called forth Mr. Hall's suggestion; that is, my use of the term "profit," which Mr. H. supposes to be a compound of rent, etc., etc. Nothing of the kind. As a matter of fact I am very easily pleased as to definitions so long as they are consistent. My notion would be that product is divided into social and anti-social elements, and while rent, interest, profit and taxes are usually anti-social in effect, some forms of wages are also anti-social and so the use of these terms are not always exhaustive.

Lack of space forbids illustrating the matter, but I may say that Freeland would eliminate all anti-social elements in product and thus eliminate all anti-social effects, which makes Freelanders eo ipso Socialists instead of anti-Socialists—what Mr. Hall seems to wish to remain.

ALEX. HORN.

SOCIALISM AND THE HOME

The opponents of Socialism have lately been making a great outcry that Socialism will abolish the home and family. To justify this statement they quote passages from eminent Socialist writers, such as Fourier, Owen, Marx, Engels, Bebel, Eleanor Marx Aveling, Morris, Hyndman Bax, Pearson, Carpenter, Grant Allen and Bernard Shaw. The following are some of the passages quoted:

"Abolition of the family! Even the most radical flare up at this infamous proposal of the Communists.

"On what foundation is the present family, the bourgeois family, based? On capital, on private gain. In its completely developed form this family exists only among the bourgeoisie. But this state of things finds its complement in the practical absence of the family among the proletarians, and in public prostitution.

"The bourgeois family will vanish as a matter of course when its complement vanishes, and both will vanish with the vanishing of capital." (From the Communist Manifesto, by Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, the founders of Scientific Socialism.)

"With the transformation of the means of production into collective property the monogamous family ceases to be the economic unit of society. The private household changes to a social industry. The care and education of children becomes a public matter. Society cares equally well for all children, legal or illegal. This removes the care about the 'consequences' which now forms the essential social factor—moral and economic—hindering a girl to surrender unconditionally to the beloved man." (From "The Origin of the Family," by Frederick Engels.)

"Man will be in a position to satisfy his strongest appetite as freely as any other appetite. The satisfaction of sexual desire will be exactly as much the personal affair of each individual as the satisfaction of every other natural desire. No one will have to give an account of himself in such matters, no outsider will have any right to interfere." (From "Woman in the Past, Present and Future," by August Bebel, leader of the Socialist Party of Germany. In this case I have translated from the original, in the others I have used the standard translations.)

Many passages like these have been quoted from other Socialists of international fame, but Marx, Engels and Bebel are so generally regarded as the most representative Socialists that it is enough to cite them in order to show the Socialist attitude to marriage and the family.

Socialists who take little interest in the sex question are greatly disgusted at the dragging of that question into the discussion by the old parties. Many indignant articles are being written, and a very typical one is that of May Wood Simons in the "Appeal to Reason" for Oct. 29. Mrs. Simons makes no allusion to any of the passages I have quoted, or to any of the similar passages which are scattered through Socialist literature. A reader of her article might be led to believe that on the sex question Socialists were the most orthodox and conventional people in the world. "Never yet," says she, "have I heard a Socialist man or a Socialist woman say that they stood for the abolition of homes or of the family." That sounds very strong, but it is really quite a safe statement. Home and family are such wide words that they will apply to any form of domestic life that is likely ever to be established. LUCIFER voices many kinds of sex-radicalism, but I do not think any contributor to LUCIFER would say that he stood for the abolition of homes or of the family.

When ordinary people talk about Socialism destroying the family, they mean the "bourgeois family"—that is to say, compulsory monogamy and individual maintenance of children. Socialism does stand for the abolition of these, as anyone can see from the foregoing extracts. Socialism stands for collective maintenance of children. This will probably be effected by giving the mother an allowance for the keep of each child, and by paying from the public funds all expenses of pregnancy and maternity, including wages to the mother for her time spent in such matters. When children are thus provided for, the relations of the parents will cease to be a matter of public interest, and individuals will be left free to make any sexual or domestic arrangements they please.

R. B. KERR.

GREETINGS AND SUGGESTIONS FROM A WORLD TRAVELER.

Cape of Good Hope, South Africa, Sept. 28, '04.

Dear and Respected Comrades:

I am delighted to again be the recipient of your most thoughtful kindness, which, alas! I so little deserve.

My long silence was due to many causes, which may be easier explained than quite understood by you, perhaps. The vicissitudes of life may well rank first; then lack of a fixed address due to travel in the wilds of the Gold Coast, Northern Nigeria, the Transvaal, Basutoland and Pendoland; intellectual inertia produced by malaria—of which I nearly died—also to my utterly uncongenial surroundings; loss of a trunk containing your old address, and, what was more aggravating still, photos; then recently hearing of the suspension of LUCIFER and only within the last month of its reappearance. Friend Swartz apprised me of your whereabouts however, and I was on the point of writing when your very kind missive arrived.

I am amazed you have put up so long with the abominable climatic conditions of Chicago, and pleased to note your intention of perhaps launching out in the direction of a colony in California. Those who ridicule the colony ideal are usually, I have found, individuals who stick their elbows out too much, and so can't be really loved in the true comrade spirit. Jealous women, men of many prejudices and all "superior" persons generally come under this head. In a word it is they who are built wrongly, and not the ideal which they attack and instinctively feel themselves unfitted for.

It is truly refreshing after this lapse of time to again pick up LUCIFER and read your cheery, optimistic, but always well-weighed words. The dogged perseverance you display too in the face of almost chronic scarcity of funds and postal persecutions is beyond all praise. LUCIFER suits me personally "down to the ground." I know of no writers with whom I find myself in such constant agreement on such a variety of subjects as yourselves. Your extreme tolerance, unfailing urbanity and sound, broad views captivated me as far back as 1892; and every fresh display, such as footnote to Mrs. B. M.'s (New York) comments, page 143, in the No. 1019 issue, and editorial reply to M. G. W., in No. 1020, surprises as much as it pleases me, and I feel I want to shake you both by the two hands!

All the same, I am nevertheless convinced your capabilities and power for good in the world might be utilized to still better advantage. However, it is one thing to criticise, and quite another to be able to do even a quarter as well oneself what one points to as defective in another's work. Since you invite outside opinion, however, I would suggest that LUCIFER be made more of a World Paper, by only treating the one subject of Sex Reform, which the whole human race is at least curious about, if not interested in. Let "Liberty" and the "Demonstrator" continue the excellent work they are engaged in, namely that of all-round Anarchism, Individualistic Ethics, and Economics, for which but relatively few can ever be ripe enough to give ear. You will thus, it seems to me, better help the cause and at the same time advance true Anarchism—not labeled such perhaps,—under cover of Sex Reform. I find LUCIFER as it now stands a veritable red rag to the bull, and so fail to make converts with it. Now this is poor policy from any point of view, whatever. First things first! and one thing at a time, is safer procedure.

Get an individual first soundly saved on the great question of Sex, and I maintain he or she will be then the better prepared for a dispassionate consideration of other less basic reforms. Your journal run on such lines would hold an absolutely unique position in the world. Here in this Sub-Continent the people, to a larger extent than you suspect, perhaps, would support such a journal; so too in Australasia and all the English colonies, to say nothing of the great centers of Europe—for which it should later on perhaps be printed in Esperanto. Then would your treasury become as plethoric as it is now constantly depleted.

Think of the useful work too that might be done merely by establishing a means of communication between women who want to marry and women who are too much or unhappily married and thus giving both the opportunity of talking their cases over together. When we consider that fully fifty per cent of the women, who constitute the clientele of palmists and fortune tellers, are wrongly mated or unhappily married, it will at once be seen what useful work could be done on these lines alone.

A. WASTALL, Ex Editor
"Natural Food," London.

[Brother Wastall sends a postal order for one pound, English money, for LUCIFER and for some pamphlet literature to be used for propaganda work. Among the pamphlets ordered he selects "The Right to Be Born Well," "Creative Life," "What the Young Need to Know," and "A Sexual Creed." The first named is not yet published in pamphlet form, and the last named I have failed, after repeated efforts, to locate the author and publisher of. We are sending other pamphlets in the same line instead of these two.—M. H.]

COURAGE.

[Prompted by a communication in LUCIFER, No. 1026, entitled "A Woman's Declaration of Independence."]

O Bravery! The heart of you is woman's last despair!
Crushed low beneath the waste of wars, the bonds of brutal lust,
When, at the last, her shame grows strong, defiantly to dare
Assume the right to live and love, and rise above the dust.

The curse of Commerce, though it wraps its luxury and ease
About the civil state we serve, is in the deadly blight
That shuts the mind in dungeons deep and chokes its starving pleas,
When hopes oppressed by creeds and codes reach vainly for the light.

O Bravery! To other brave, intrepid souls your cry
Comes like the music of the morn to famished lives that wait
Because the conscience that they wear through tortures can not die,
But gathers from its misery the might to conquer Fate.

Hear them answer thro' the mists, O Bravery, your call.
I hear them laugh above their fright, cast all their schemes away,
And bring allegiance to the Will, strong with the sense of Right,
To strike Old Superstition down, and give to Love full sway.

O Bravery! A woman's heart is just your virtue told,
And men must hear its message clear before they are redeemed.
Her's are the fortunes more than all the minted wealth of gold;
Her's is the title to the joys the struggling world has dreamed.

THIRD SERIES. VOL. VII. NO. 26.

SEX RADICALISM.

With this issue of the series of articles entitled "Sex Radicalism" is ended. In answer to questions as to whether this series will be put into pamphlet or book form we answer, yes, provided there seems a sufficient demand to justify the expense of phamphleting. It is therefore requested that all readers who desire to possess one or more copies of this exceptionally able and timely series in a more suitable form for preservation, will write us at once and say how many copies she or he will be responsible for. The price will not exceed thirty cents per single copy, or five copies for one dollar, and may be twenty-five cents per copy or six copies for one dollar.

By many very competent critics it is believed Sex Radicalism, by Dora Forster, will prove to be one of the very best booklets for missionary work among those who are now for the first time beginning to inquire for light upon the ethics of sex, ever issued from the radical press. M. HARMAN.

WORK FOR THE WINTER.

The near approach of the close of the year makes it proper and timely to inquire what can be done to extend and make more effective the work that LUCIFER and its workers are trying to do. Winter is a time of comparative rest and leisure, at least for most people living in the country, removed from the turmoil and bustle of cities and larger towns, and hence winter would seem to be the time most favorable of all the year for introducing LUCIFER and its pamphlet literature in homes where such literature is yet unknown, or but little known.

Another reason for special effort in this line is the fact that after a period of craze, or of semi-madness, such as always characterizes more or less the quadrennial conflict known as a "presidential election" in the United States, there naturally comes a period of reaction, a period of comparative sober thought, of calm and candid investigation concerning the basic causes of sorrow and suffering, of wrong and injustice to the great masses of people in this "land of liberty and plenty," as well as in all other lands called civilized.

For all thinkers who are not content to wait the slow process of "natural evolution" so-called, unaided by man's intelligence, to remove or decrease the sum of human ills, now is certainly a propitious time to make a special effort, now that there is no distracting war of ballots or of bullets in near prospect in this country, except perhaps in the mining state of Colorado, where the election of a few weeks ago seems not yet decided.

That some of our friends have begun in good earnest the winter campaign of education along radical lines, the list of LUCIFER'S helpers, published in this issue, gives evidence. Most of those whose names appear in that list have sent names of friends to whom the paper or pamphlets are to be sent. Those who have sent money but not names are earnestly requested to do so at once.

Again the plan of getting up clubs for mutual improvement, in cities and thickly settled neighborhoods, is earnestly recommended wherever practicable. For a comparatively small sum a library of radical literature can be purchased for the use of such clubs. We are sending LUCIFER to many libraries, and have a large supply of back numbers that we should be glad to send to all applicants, for the postage alone; also many pamphlets for a very small advance over the cost of postage.

Shall we hear from you, friends of progress and of rational enlightenment? M. H.

MEANING OF THE ELECTION.

Having no time to write on matters political I select the following from an editorial in a late issue of "The Public," Chicago, as expressing, in good part, my own view:

"The landslide for Roosevelt is not for him affirmatively. It is for him only negatively. It spells democratic discipline of the Democratic party. This is abundantly evident from the fact that the overwhelming pluralities for Roosevelt come as the climax of an apathetic campaign. Had the people intended to express admiration of Roosevelt by their votes they would have made their admiration apparent in enthusiastic campaigning. But the absence of banners, and buttons, and parades, and window pictures, and such other tokens as a character like Roosevelt would call out from enthusiastic admirers, testifies that there was no enthusiasm for him. The enthusiasm was against Parker, not for anybody, and was manifested in the way in which that kind of enthusiasm always is manifested—in an overwhelming but resentful and silent ballot on election day.

"This landslide is very much like that of 1894, when the people rebuked President Cleveland at the Congressional elections, and for much the same reason. Cleveland had identified himself with the plutocracy, and in 1894 the Democratic majority of 41 in the lower House of Congress gave way to a Republican majority of 74. Parker comes forward the branded candidate of Cleveland, Hill, Belmont, McCarren and other plutocratic elements of his party, and he has gone down to the most disastrous defeat his party has experienced for thirty years."

That a desire to rebuke the Democratic management was one of the causes, possibly the chief cause, of the "landslide" is no doubt true, but that there were other causes scarcely less potent, tending to the same result, is very probable if not absolutely certain. What these causes were is a question upon which each thinker and observer will have his or her own opinion; also as to what the effect of the election will be upon the peace and prosperity of our nation and country. LUCIFER IN ENGLAND.

A letter from J. W. Gott, editor and publisher of the "Truth Seeker," Bradford, England, says, in part:

"Please send LUCIFER for next six months to Mr. A. M. S., Cromwell Road, London. Stamps enclosed. Will you kindly see that I get LUCIFER regularly in exchange? I have put you down for twelve copies [of the "Truth Seeker"] free every month; so I hope you will try to find a sale for them in America. You might send sample copies of LUCIFER to the following: * * * All these names are of people interested in the questions dealt with in LUCIFER. I am running an advertisement of LUCIFER in the 'Answers to Correspondents' column, in the Truth Seeker."

Of the dozen or more contemporary foreign journals on our exchange list, none deserves more honorable mention than does the English "Truth Seeker." Having himself been "prosecuted for blasphemy"—blasphemy against the priest-born Yahvistic, or Jehovistic, superstition, Brother Gott naturally sympathized with the editor of LUCIFER when prosecuted for blasphemy against that other priest-born superstition known as sacramental or canon law marriage. During my last incarceration by the Federal authorities at Leavenworth, Kansas, one of the prison officials was an Englishman from Bradford, who seemed to be much interested when shown the ringing, manly protest by his brother townsman, J. W. Gott, against my prosecution and imprisonment under laws apparently enacted to bolster up the absurdly irrational, the mythologic marriage code now dominant in all countries called Christian.

The dozen copies of the "Truth Seeker" spoken of in the above letter, have been received at this office—a splendid number truly, a double number, of sixteen double column pages, filled in good part with matter pertaining to the "International Freethought Congres" held at Rome September 20 to 23, inclusive, to which Congress Brother Gott was a delegate. Though the pressure on our space is tremendous, just now, I hope to be pardoned for inserting just one paragraph from our friend's leading editorial:

"The magnitude and importance of the great gathering [at Rome] was mostly easily appreciated when, after the first sitting of the Congress, the whole of the delegates numbering nearly 4,000 from every civilized country in the world, formed themselves into a procession and marched through the principal streets of the 'Catholic City,' which were lined with a most orderly and apparently sympathetic crowd. The military band at the head of the procession led the way to Porta Pia, where some 10,000 people surrounded the platform from which M. Furnemont, the indefatigable secretary of the International Freethought Federation, made a great speech which raised the enthusiasm of his hearers to fever heat."

Among the contributors to this number of the "Truth Seeker" are George Jacob Holyoke, President of the British Secular League; Joachim Kaspary, who is writing a series of articles on the "Origin, Growth and Decline of Christianity"—very able and certainly of much interest to secularists; "Saladin,"—W. Stewart Ross, editor of the "Agnostic Journal," London; L. K. Washburn, late editor of the "Boston Investigator," and last but not least, Walter Hurt, of Camden, Ohio, one of LUCIFER'S appreciative friends and clear-headed contributors.

The price of Brother Gott's Truth Seeker is five cents per copy, or, to any one of LUCIFER'S subscribers only thirty-five cents for a whole year of twelve monthly numbers, if subscriptions are sent through this office.

Remembering with deep gratitude the fraternal sympathy and helpfulness extended by the editor of the Bradford "Truth Seeker" for and to LUCIFER and its workers, I feel like urging our readers to reciprocate this kindness by sending for single copies of his paper and also for yearly subscriptions to the same. So sure am I that all will be pleased with their investment that I hereby agree to refund the money to any who may find on examination that the paper does not fulfill expectations.

M. HARMAN.

CONVENTION NOTES.

The three weeks (including four Sundays) lately spent in St. Louis and Edwardsville, Ill., represent perhaps the busiest vacation I have ever taken in my quarter of a century (almost) experience as editor and publisher.

In these three weeks I attended four National and International Conventions; spent three afternoons at the "Louisiana Purchase Exposition"—so-called, but really the greatest of all the international or world's fairs ever held, so far as authentic history allows us to judge; attended one grand rally of the Socialist party at the largest hall in St. Louis, with seating capacity of twelve thousand persons, most of which space seemed to be compactly filled. The Globe-Democrat of next morning, which paper is utterly opposed to the aims of Socialists, gave a fairly good report of the rally, saying in part:

"A mass meeting attended by over 5,000 men and women was held last night at the Coliseum under the auspices of the Socialist party, at which speeches were delivered by Walter Mills of Chicago and Thomas McGrady of Newport, Ky., a former Catholic priest, who, it was announced, would reply to Archbishop J. J. Glennon on the subject of free text-books for pupils of the public schools. * * * Mr. Mills spoke for an hour on 'Socialism.' He made a strong plea for a rational and impartial consideration of the principles of Socialism. He claimed that the Socialist party did not seek the destruction of the government, but sought to capture the control of the government for the benefit of the masses."

The contrast between the two leading speakers was very marked, not less in manner of speaking than in physical stature; Mills being far below the average in size, but a veritable electric battery of energy and impetuosity in arousing the enthusiasm of his audiences. McGrady, on the contrary, is large of stature and calmly deliberate in utterance. The applause with which he was greeted was not less emphatic than was that accorded the Chicago "little giant." His closing remarks on the school book question are thus reported by the Globe-Democrat:

"Socialism is opposed not by this church (the Catholic) alone, but by all churches and all religions, because the churches now, as always, have represented that conservatism which is based on superstition and ignorance. This move in St. Louis is a movement in favor of superstition and ignorance. The archbishop says, in substance, to his followers, 'we must not allow the people to think, for if they think, they will become Socialists.' We want every child, however poor, to have the same opportunity as the rich for an education, and if the church can't stand for that it must go down. If it can not stand for education, it can not stand for truth, and if it can not stand for truth, it has no right to exist."

Pretty strong language for one who still claims to be a churchman, as I understand the man called "Father McGrady" does. The Socialists—at least some of them—are now advocating the plans of supplying free clothing to the poor children, as well as free books and free tuition, all by the State. In connection with my report of visit to Leclaire College, I expect to have something to say in regard to the question of methods of educating the young, whether of rich or poor parentage.

Of all the conventions attended the most interesting to me was that of the aggregation henceforth to be called the "American Freethought Association," formerly known as the "National Liberal Party." In point of numbers the attendance at the sessions of this organization was not large, only sixty-nine members being reported as present, besides the contingent of local sympathizers and of curiosity hunters. Of these, however, the numbers were doubtless much smaller than they otherwise would have been had the convention been properly advertised. Why this was not done I failed to find out. The location of the hall, the Freie Gemeinde, or German Freethinker's Hall, was also unfortunate for convention purposes, situated on 20th and Dodier streets, an out-of-the-way place, though otherwise well adapted to holding large conventions.

The German Freethinkers of St. Louis are numerous and prosperous. They own the building in which this convention was held, a large building containing two large halls and several smaller ones, besides school rooms, etc. The management generously gave the use of their halls, well lighted and furnished, to the two Freethought conventions, the "International" and the "American Freethought Association" free of charge.

Saturday morning, October 22, the convention of the "National Liberal Party" was called to order by its president, Dr. J. B. Wilson, of Cincinnati, late a delegate to the "International Freethought Congress" at Rome, Italy. Lack of space prevents a full report of proceedings at the St. Louis congress, so I confine myself to what seems most important. Quoting from the report of the secretary, Morris Sachs, as published in the "Blue Grass Blade," Nov. 6:

COMMITTEE ON RESOLUTIONS.

"Dr. T. J. Bowles, Charles C. Moore, J. F. Linton, Moses Harman, W. C. Wagoner, Sander Soll and J. L. Peebles.

A recess was taken till afternoon.

The committee on resolutions submitted the following:

"(1) Resolved, That it is the sense of the National Liberal Party that its organization should be preserved intact, and that it is the duty of its members to oppose all political parties that believe in special privileges or any measures that oppress the masses. Carried.

"(2) Resolved, That a pure democracy, or government of the people, is the ideal state, to the achievement of which all Rationalists should contribute their time, money and energies. Carried.

"(2b) A minority report was submitted by Mr. Moses Harman of the committee, reading:

"Resolved, That co-operative individualism, otherwise called the co-operative commonwealth, eliminating all government of man by his fellowman, is the ideal state, to the practicalization of which all Rationalists should contribute of their time, money and energies.

"The minority report was not adopted.

"(3) Resolved, That justice knows no sex and that all Rationalists are in duty bound to aid in relieving woman of all her disabilities and placing her upon perfect equality with her brother man. Carried.

"Moses Harman offered a resolution to be added to the above. The resolution read:

"Resolved, That as Rationalists we recognize woman's primal right of control in the matter of creating new human beings, and in order that this right be practicalized we demand the abolition of all laws that deny to woman the absolute ownership and control of her own person Upon motion the amendment was laid on the table.

"(4) Resolved, That all Rationalists are in duty bound to oppose all wars except in self-defense and that the Hague movement for arbitration of all national controversies should be encouraged and promoted. Carried.

"(5) Resolved, That the National Liberal Party is in hearty sympathy with the Japanese people and that we believe that the triumph of Russia in the Japanese-Russian war would be a world-wide calamity to the moral welfare of the human race. Carried.

"(6) Resolved, That the beverage department of the liquor traffic is a great evil and that all Rationalists should labor for its abolition. Carried.

"(7) Resolved, That we deplore and condemn the practice and policy of President Roosevelt in seeking the aid of the ecclesiastic power of Rome for his re-election, by implied, if not expressed promises of special privileges in this Republic. Carried.

"(8) Resolved, That it is the duty of all Rationalists to oppose the horrible practice of lynching, and that we should use all legitimate means to suppress it, and further, we believe that all discipline for crime should be reformatory. Carried.

"(9) Resolved, That the aims and purposes of the late World's Congress at Rome to rid the world of superstition and ecclesiastical tyranny marks an era in the history of the race, and we hail with joy the glorious promise that dawned when this Congress convened. Carried.

"(10) Resolved, That Sunday as a holy day is absurd, and that the enforcement by the government in deference to the wish of priests and religionists should be combatted until every day in the week is regarded as equally sacred. Carried.

"(11) Resolved, That the exemption of church property from taxation is vicious and unconstitutional and a great injustice to a large portion of the citizens of this Republic, and we declare it to be our duty to make continued war upon this injustice until all church property is made to contribute a fair share of taxation for the support of the government. Carried.

"(12) Resolved, That all religious services in our public schools in deference to the demands of church dignitaries are a violation of the Constitution, an injustice to all non-believers in divine revelation and all Rationalists should exert themselves through the channel of legislation to have this practice discontinued in all the States and also in Congress, all legislative bodies and in the army and navy. Carried.

"(13) Resolved, Moreover, that we are unalterably opposed to the control now exercised by churchmen in the selection of text-books in the public schools. Carried.

"(14) Resolved, That it is the duty of all Freethinkers to encourage freedom of thought, freedom of speech and freedom of the press, and to assist in the defense of all persons or societies of whatever creed or party when persecuted for expression of religious or political beliefs. Carried.

"The following resolution was offered:

"Resolved, That we, as Rationalists, are unalterably opposed to all discriminations against foreigners in the matter of freedom of speech and of press on account of the accident of birth.

"Upon motion a vote on this resolution was laid over till next day. * * *

"Miss Elizabeth Wiley of St. Louis offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the name of this organization be changed from the National Liberal Party to the American Freethought Association. The resolution was adopted.

"Mr. Moses Harman of Chicago, thereupon favored the Congress with an interesting address."

The above list comprises all the resolutions offered and acted upon so far as I now recall.

It will be noticed, perhaps, that the secretary does not mention the subject of the address of "Mr. Moses Harman of Chicago," which address closed the proceedings of the first day. That omission I will now supply by saying that my talk to the Congress was in line with one of the resolutions recorded by Mr. Sachs as having been offered by me and "laid on the table" by the convention, viz:

"Resolved, That as Rationalists we recognize woman's primal right of control in the matter of creating new human beings, and in order that this right be practicalized we demand the abolition of all laws that deny to woman the absolute ownership and control of her own person."

My address—about one hour in length, and my reply to criticisms at the close, constituted, in reality, my defense and explanation of the amendment to resolution No. 3, that had been, earlier in the day, laid on the table by the convention.

From the reading of the secretary's report it would seem that no resolution offered by myself had been accepted. Such inference, however, is not sustained by the facts. The resolution in regard to "text-books" used in the public schools, was prepared and offered by me in "committee of the whole," and was unanimously adopted. Also the resolution that reads:

"Resolved, That we as Rationalists are unalterably opposed to all discriminations against foreigners in the matter of freedom of speech and of press on account of the accident of birth."

This resolution was framed and offered by me as a supplement to that numbered "14," and was intended to apply to cases like that of John Turner, the English Anarchist, who was arrested and imprisoned for no other reason than that he had acknowledged himself an "Anarchist" when questioned as to his political belief.

This resolution, or supplement to a resolution, regarding freedom of speech and of press, called out the most animated, not to say heated, discussion that was indulged in by the convention. Those opposed to its adoption condemned it as favoring Anarchy. The impression that the "American Freethought Association is composed of Anarchists "must not go out to the world"—or words to that effect, was the central contention of the opposition. The presiding officer, Dr. Wilson, could see no harm in the resolution. While not an Anarchist himself he confessed that his late experiences and observations in Europe had impressed him very favorably towards the people called by that name. Everywhere he found that the best informed, most influential and best behaved Freethinkers were avowed Anarchists. Dr. Bowles, of Muncie, Indiana, an ex-President of the "National Liberal Party," made the longest and most effective of the speeches in favor of my resolution. So determined was the attitude of the opposition, however, that on motion its further consideration was postponed till next day, and when called up in the regular order of business, Sunday morning, after a vigorous renewal of the conflict I had the satisfaction of seeing the "Anarchist amendment," as some would call it, adopted by an overwhelming majority of the members present and voting.

Lest I take up the greater part of our space for this issue with my convention notes I defer the remainder of my report of this and other meetings till another time. M. HARMAN.

LUCIFER'S HELPERS.

Since last credit LUCIFER's office acknowledges receipts from Helpers as follows:

Geo. E. Dennison, 25c; John Orth, $2; J. A. Wilson, 25c; Dr. L. M. Hammond, 25c; E. A. Stevens, $1; James F. Clark, $1; Dr. M. Rowe, $5; Bertha Moore, $2; Helen Philbrick, $5; C. P. Betts, 75c; S. O. Bishop, $20; Arthur Wastall, $3; Social Science Club (Chicago), $5.

If any have been overlooked who should receive credit for money sent to help LUCIFER, whether as direct donation to expense fund, or as price of subscription for others, they will confer a favor by calling our attention to the omission. Once more, good friends and co-workers, kindly accept thanks for timely aid in keeping the balance on the right side of the ledger.

MAMMALS AND BIRDS.

In No. 1023 Steven T. Byington says: "R. B. Kerr asserts that birds are a lower order of life than mammals." I did not. I said that "all zoologists place mammals at the head of the animal creation, and all place birds on a lower plane." Not being a zoologist, I did not feel qualified to express any opinion of my own.

As I have not access to any zoological library, I cannot give many extracts to prove the truth of my statement. The following should suffice, however. In Chapter 2 of "The Riddle of the Universe" Ernst Haeckel, one of the greatest biologists in the world, says that "the mammals are the youngest and most advanced class of the vertebrates," and gives the reasons for that view. In Wood's "Natural History" I find it stated, under the head of mammalia, that "this class is naturally placed at the head of the animal kingdom as comprising those beings whose movements are most varied, whose sensations are most delicate, faculties most numerous, and intelligence most developed."

VARIOUS VOICES.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, step at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and step at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

[Full name and address of writers in this department can generally be obtained on application to the editor.]

Fred Weeks, Beckenham, Kent, England.—"Enclosed I send money order for $1. Kindly send me "The Right to Be Born Well," as soon as published; 2 copies of "Vice, Its Friends and Its Foes; LUCIFER, beginning with No. 1017, for six months. It is through our friend A. W. that I am subscribing."

[This letter is inserted in part to show how LUCIFER's subscribers can, with a little effort, do much to extend its circulation and its influence. If all would do as well as a few are doing our numbers would be doubled if not trebled before the opening of the new year.]

Vincent Pantin, Staple Grove, Beckenham, England.—"Many thanks for copy of LUCIFER received. I send you fifty cents for six months' trial. Will try to write you an article if I can find time."

[Not having a surplus of regular correspondents—though quite a "good few" regular subscribers on the other side of the "Herring Pond," LUCIFER's readers would probably welcome an occasional letter from Vincent Pantin, provided said letters are not too long. During the life of the "Adult," the organ of the English "Legitimation League," we often got letters from our British cousins, but since the untimely demise of that valiant defender of the right of private judgment in matters of sex morality, as well as in matters of religious worship, we seldom hear from Bedborough, Dawson, Wastall, and other old time champions of advanced thought on these lines. It is sincerely to be hoped that, since our cousins aforesaid have now no "journal of sex," as the "Adult" was called, they will join forces with LUCIFER and help to make of it a strong international evangel of freedom and justice to women, and of the right of children to be born well, if born at all.]

Mrs. E. K., Preston, England.—"Mrs. K. will be obliged if Mr. Harman will not send any further copies of LUCIFER. While earnestly desiring freedom and justice for woman and good birth for every child she utterly repudiates Mr. Harman's proposed remedy of 'free love' instead of marriage, believing that existing evils would but be increased thereby."

[At the request of a mutual friend in British Columbia LUCIFER was sent on trial, twenty-five cents' worth, to Mrs. K. of Preston, England, who, we were told, was interested in questions pertaining to sex and marriage. Such letters as the above are by no means discouraging to LUCIFER's workers. A woman who can write as Mrs. K. does, will probably not be long in coming to see that "freedom and justice for woman and good birth for every child" cannot be attained so long as mothers bow their necks to the yoke of institutional marriage, canon law marriage, an institution whose basic principles involve the surrender of woman's person to the irresponsible control of man; an institution whose etymology itself suggests the obliteration of woman's individuality, or its absorption in that of man—mari, "the husband!"—M. H.]

Geo. E. Bowen, Kirkwood, Mo.—"I have just been to church—with LUCIFER. Dora Forster's sermon is a splendid, sensible thing, and I fervently pray that it may, with others of the series, go into the homes and hearts of the land as a new and necessary bible.

"It has been a feast day for my hunger. I do not understand how honest minds can do without the substance and the sentiment you spread for them once a week, and for my own part I would like a daily delivery.

"In one of the communications I heard a cry to which all my nature responded, and it has pleased me to bring tribute to the spirit of independence so fearlessly declared.

"Hers is not only an unconditional ultimatum, but it demands unconditional surrender from the hosts of Unreason.

"I send you the verses which I have named "Courage," although that is only one of the vital elements contributing to the force that could unflinchingly and unhesitatingly declare its purpose, ignoring exile, condemnation and the malice that persecutes in its blindness, all variant ideas or unauthorized conduct.

"If this new mother of Freedom is not a regular reader of LUCIFER, may I ask you to send the lines to her, unless they appear suitable for publication, in which event she may enjoy a marked copy.

"I was very sorry my engagements kept me from your lectures in St. Louis, but I am equally thankful that many others could be benefited. And I hope your visit was a source of pleasure and information to yourself.

"Are the Forster articles to be published in book form? I hope so."

[The series of articles by Dora Forster entitled "Sex Radicalism" will be published in book form if the money can be raised to pay the printer and binder. The above letter is a fair sample of many, giving voice to what seems a very general desire among LUCIFER's readers to have this remarkable series of sex-reform articles reprinted in a more permanent shape. At least half the type has been preserved, so that the cost of booking the several chapters will not be so great as it otherwise would have been.]

"Old-Time Telegrapher," Carnegie Building, Pittsburg, Pa.—Here's 25 cents for LUCIFER; my mite for September to show the light in smoky, dark Pittsburg. Am distributing extra copies to friends and trust will do you good, and act as a calcium light on "the other side" of this "great" Carnegie town of steel (or steal). Have you copies of LUCIFER prior to No. 1012? If so, please send to me. Telegrapher C——— of our office, located at "Press" newspaper office, after "calling me down" for my "free love" advocacy of the absolute ownership by men and women of their own bodies, praises Ella Wheeler Wilcox, a leading champion of the idea. C——— (member of M. E. church), was much horrified by my showing to young girls Charlotte Eaton's book of poems—"Desire." Women are queer puzzles. They seem to enjoy chains, or wish to make poor man's life miserable by perpetual nagging, and where they have the right to vote the great majority are absent from the polls on election day. Modern marriage kills love, so that courtship is the happiest time. What do you think of Meredith's plan of limited marriage, say for ten years? What has become of our friends Maude Johnson and Kate Richards O'Hare?

[Limited marriage may be compared to limited restrictions on "Freedom of Trade," or to limited rule by state and church over Freedom of Choice in matters of religious belief or religious observance of holidays, etc. All limitations to freedom in exchange of commodities; all restrictions in regard to religious belief or observance, all denials of freedom in matters that concern the love-relations of women and men, are just so many invasions of the "right to life liberty and pursuit of happiness," for the defense of which right it is popularly supposed the war of the American revolution was fought. Maude Johnson and Kate Richards O'Hare are on LUCIFER's list of subscribers. They can answer for themselves.]

H. Scott Bennett, State Parliament House, Melbourne, Australia.—"Many thanks for the sample copies of 'LUCIFER.' Although I believe that an economic revolution must precede a change in the sex question yet I recognize the sincerity of your work and know only too well the persecution you must be subjected to. I cannot immediately subscribe for your paper but I am sending a small order for some literature. A subscription for your paper will come later. Please send Giordano Bruno, 5c; Rubaiyat, Omar Khayam, 10c; The New Hedonism, Grant Allen, 5c; Institutional Marriage, 15c."

[The books are sent except Institutional Marriage, which is out of print. As there seems quite a demand for this booklet a new and improved edition will be issued, provided sufficient orders are sent in before Jan. 1st. * * * As to the economic revolution: Can a better argument be urged for this revolution than the need of better conditions for motherhood? Once get women to take hold of the question of economics, in the name of freedom for motherhood and better birth for children, and the economic revolution—a peaceful, bloodless revolution—could not long be delayed.—M. H.]

Helen Philbrick, Etna, Mont.—"Dora Forster: You say—No. 1025—, 'Woman is the first slave and also the last. Yet there is a power that will make this slave a queen in time to come.'

"I suggest: The power will be man's love for the woman who, for love of him, will of her own free will keep secret from him no fact concerning the sacred relation (see 'sac' and sacrum) which is sanctified to his will, because of that deep and pure devotional love that she, the 'queen,' feels for him—her king, his 'spirit' in a present or future child, and which devotional love is warranted by his love for and devotion to her and to her spirit in said child.

"The principle which makes possible this 'power,' is justice to love, which, when meted as per partnership marriage (see Pepper and Weller, Mitchell, S. D.) will take from it the bastard tie made by civil law and clinched by money value—Mammon, the 'root of all evil.' Can God, who or which is love, grow upon a stalk the root of which is D-evil, the personification of hate and the opposite of love? Ask orthodox capitalism now wild to check divorce.

"Brothers and sisters who wrote to Helen, am I progressing?"

Abbie Walker Gould, Le Claire, Iowa.—The copies of LUCIFER containing the articles on "Sex Radicalism," which I asked you for some time ago came to me and I thank you for them. They are well written, and like Lawson's articles on "Frenzied Finance" in "Everybody's Magazine" should set the people thinking, if nothing more. I am a natural mother of four well raised children, by the term natural meaning I wished the children, as motherhood is the predominating element in my nature. (Guess I must have re-incarnated from a hen—who knows?) I had few rules, but an ideal which I supplemented by "Suggestion," and help of my angel friends, and all is well. You have had a martyr's time in free speech for truth; so has my friend, Leroy Berrier of Davenport, Iowa, whom of course you know. It is easy to put one behind the bars for supposed errors of law—but for what the law of retributive justice shall do for the Anthony Comstocks in another phase of their existence, I would not like to exchange shoes with them. "Truly they cannot escape until each has paid his uttermost farthing." I hope you are well. With best wishes.

Volney Abbey, Wathena, Kan.—I hope you will be able to publish Dora Forster's articles in book form. They are the best I have seen for many a day, and I want a few for missionary work.

"WHO IS THE ENEMY?"

Hugh O. Pentecost writes thus to Edwin C. Walker about the latter's new work, "Who Is the Enemy: Anthony Comstock or You?" "Your pamphlet is a strong discussion of the question at issue that one could give to a conservative friend with some hope that he might read it through."

Dr. R. W. Shufeldt, biologist, author of several scientific works and of more than seven hundred articles on medicine, travel, science, sexual problems and other subjects, writes to E. C. Walker: "I thank you very much indeed for the copy you sent me of your valuable pamphlet, 'Who Is the Enemy: Anthony Comstock or You?' I have read it from cover to cover with the utmost satisfaction and unqualified approval. It is one of the best and strongest things you have put out, and I am with you solid in both the letter and spirit of it. I prise the copy most highly." Ask for table of contents and specimen pages of "Who Is the Enemy?" or send 20 cents to this office for the pamphlet.

THE WHOLE SEX QUESTION

Solves itself when you eat right, think right, and trust divine instinct. If Humanity were natural, man would be more pure and woman more passionate—both of which conditions are required for a perfected progeny. Naturalness means sweetness, sanity, beauty, power, contentment—all the real things. The quickest way to get natural is to read and live "Return to Nature." This book teaches the mode of healing Nature practices on her children—with the kind of child-culture Omniscience intended for humans. Simply a revelation regarding the cure of all forms of disease. Advanced doctors are practicing it. New Thought leaders are proving it. Prominent editors are devoting whole pages to it. Everybody is asking about it. Won't you send a stamp for a circular? Or ten cents for additional Naturopathic literature. I'm waiting to love you into wholeness.

THE RIGHT TO BE BORN WELL.

In her reply to President Theodore Roosevelt's anathema against those who refuse or neglect to become parents of large families of children, Lady Florence Dixie, of Glen Stuart, Scotland, says, in part:

IMPORTANCE OF SANE AND RESPONSIBLE PARENTHOOD.

"Motherhood should not be forced either on the unwilling or the unfit, or by the unfit; and it does not follow that because men and women marry, they should commit the crime of bringing unhealthy offspring into the world. To produce a diseased child is an act of concubitus and therefore immoral, and the time shall come, when the production of diseased human beings shall be looked upon as a sin against society. The first consideration by man should be health. Parents have no right to bring diseased human beings into the world. Thousands of men and women who desire to live together and to marry, are nevertheless unfit to become parents. Thousands are unable to rear even of healthy offspring more than one, two or three children, and do justice to these children. It is ridiculous, therefore, to say the least of it, for President Roosevelt to anathematise such men and women, as refuse to burden society and themselves with superfluous offspring. What should be a greater reproach to parents than an unhealthy child, and what greater disgrace can there be than to be parents of such? Yet the world is teeming with cripples and diseased children, whose existence is a reproach to humanity and a curse on society.

REPRODUCTION OF THE UNFIT BY THE UNFIT.

"Too long have these facts been ignored by mankind, throughout which license runs rampant. What greater crime is there than the horrible custom of child-marriage permitted in India by the great British Government? What more disgusting act than the reproduction of the unfit by the unfit? What cruelty more callous than to give life to a child, to which you can neither give health nor happiness after production? And what object is there in the creation of thousands of human beings merely to live, suffer and die, leaving behind them their legacy of disease and misery? It seems to me that men in Mr. Roosevelt's position, before lending the weight of their influence to words so rash, impulsive and unstatesmanlike as those promulgated by the President in his letter to Mrs. Van Vorst. What should constitute the object of life? My answer is happiness. Can that be attained by women constantly in a condition of pregnancy? Can it be realized by diseased human beings? Can it be enjoyed by those who lack the means of making life one of comfort and enjoyment?"

Few, if any, writers of the present day have had better opportunities for observing the bad effects of bringing children into the world without first securing conditions that will make it reasonably sure that birth will be a blessing and not a curse to all concerned, than has the writer of the paragraphs just quoted. Another Englishwoman exceptionally well qualified to give advice and instruction upon the subject of parenthood is Agnes Benham, of Adelaide, South Australia. From her book, "Love's Way to Perfect Humanhood," lately issued from the press I take the privilege of quoting a few characteristic paragraphs:

THE INITIAL BLUNDER OF THE AGES.

"It cannot be too clearly or too strenuously pointed out that mothers, not necessarily wives, are reckoned in Nature's great cosmical scheme; and man, in putting wifehood first, has made the initial blunder of the ages, and one that more than anything else, has thwarted Nature's own plan for improvement, and hindered the rapid progress of the race. In all the vast domain of Nature we see no one entity, flower or animal, subsidiary to another to the extent of merging therein its own identity and yielding its right to individual expression for itself—nowhere, that is, outside of Man. . . . . Among the whole animal creation, a woman is the only female who may be called upon to give life reluctantly to another when she has not life enough to maintain her own existence; and men are the only animals who weaken, burden and oppress, and so render unequal to themselves the mothers of the race.

RESPONSIBILITY OF FATHERHOOD.

"Scarcely a man in a million can say that he has honestly considered the great responsibility of parenthood; that he has looked upon the great work of procreation as a solemn thing demanding the utmost consecration of preparation and purpose. . . Man respects not the springs of life, but corrupts them at their source.

DEFEATS EVOLUTION.

"I have shown that Man, in all artificial marriages sets aside the principle of free sexual selection, prevailing in all the kingdoms of life below him; in which, as a rule, absolutely free choice is left to the female of the species. That in doing this he interferes, with what serious results we can only guess at, with the greatest principle of Evolution (sexual selection). Nor has he yet attempted, in any efficient way, to apply his reason, or the methods of scientific research, to grapple with the problem of how to have the best children born, even within the pale of legalized marriage. Yet, in applying himself to this most supreme question, he will learn how to attack and render nugatory all the evils that afflict the human race. For he will bar them at the very fountain head of Being.

LIGHT—LOVE.

"But, as in order to bar darkness we do not attempt the impossible task of chasing shadows—we simply bring forward Light, so in endeavoring to avoid evil we act with positive Love—Love that is directed, when we think of becoming parents, to securing in every possible way the chances for happiness of our children.

UNWILLING MOTHERHOOD.

A cruel wrong is perpetrated upon a woman when she becomes an unwilling mother. How far-reaching its consequences none can say, since it may blast the whole earthly life of the babe who is born under its awful shadow. Is it possible that a man can ever realize the dreadful feeling of despair that comes over a woman when she first knows that she is enceinte against her will! The emotions of a trapped and tortured animal must be nearest akin to those she feels. Nature's due instinct of cherishing and tenderly providing for the little life so bound up within her own is turned ofttimes to the deadliest hatred and she will shrink from no danger, not even from the risk of death to herself, to get rid of what she regards as an unwelcome burden.

AFTER CONSEQUENCES.

"With regard to the after consequences, should the attempt at destroying the unborn be unsuccessful, they are likely to be far more disastrous to the child than even to the mother herself. Dr. Holbrook says: 'Some of the most wayward persons I have known were born of mothers who tried unsuccessfully to destroy them before birth.'

THE CASE OF GUITEAU.

Quoting the words of Dr. Barrington Elliot, our author here introduces one of the most noteworthy as well as most terrible of all the historic cases of bad prenatal influence and their effects upon the unborn, that of Charles J. Guiteau:

"His father was a man of considerable intellect and integrity, though there was evidently an insane tendency in the family. The children were born quickly [in quick succession], his mother was weak, they were in poor circumstances, and she was forced to work harder than she would have done for want of means to get proper help. Before the birth of the particular child she had resorted to every possible means of procuring abortion but without success, and during the latter part of her pregnancy she had brain fever. When the child at last came into the world it was weak and puny, and for many months its life was one continual wail. Guiteau's whole life was full of contradictions. There was little controlling power in him, no common sense, and not a vestige of remorse or shame.'"

Commenting on this oft-quoted historic case the author of "Love's Way to Perfect Humanhood" adds:

"We can trace in this one instance somewhat of the working of cause and effect. But who can tell what adverse prenatal conditions may not have been at work ere such terrible moral outcasts as Deeming and Butler, and many others who may be classed in the same category, were ushered into this world? As well send a rotten ship to sea, laden with precious cargo, as launch forth a soul upon life's rough ocean so poorly provided for the voyage. Is it any wonder so many become not only moral wrecks themselves, but the source of infinite danger to others? In China, if a man commits a public crime, they have a peculiar custom of holding the schoolmaster responsible, and cut off his head for not having taught the man better. Perhaps we also, bye and bye, may look a little nearer home for the cause of social mischief than even the schoolmaster."

Evidently the writer means that the first schoolmaster for every child is the mother herself, and it may be added that the first schoolhouse is the creatory—the little crib that every mother carries beneath her heart, in which crib the child grows and receives impressions for the first nine months of its mortal life. This is the first and vastly the most important of all schoolhouses, and in this house—over this school—there is practically but one teacher, the mother herself. That the mother organism, mental and physical, itself receives impressions from a vast number and variety of sources is a matter of secondary or incidental moment to the child, since no impression from the outside world can reach the embryonic pupil except through the mother organism.

The temptation to quote other paragraphs from "Love's Way to Perfect Humanhood," and also from the pamphlet entitled "President Roosevelt's Gospel of Doom," is very great but the selections just given must suffice for this issue.

DON'T FORGET, good friends all, to send us names of independent thinkers—New Thought people, Rationalists, Agnostics, Spiritualists, Materialists, Free Religionists, Theosophists—to whom we may send sample copies of Lucifer, "Son of the Morning," "Herald of the Dawn," "Harbinger of the Good Time Coming"! We have some hundreds of copies printed extra each issue for the express purpose of sending them out as samples, and, if possible, we want several hundred new names each week, or each fortnight. And if with the names a few postage stamps can be sent to help pay the cost of wrappers and of mailing, all the better, but send the names!

When writing on business of any kind, please do not forget to enclose a stamp for catalogue of books and pamphlets on sale at this office.

MORE THOUGHTS ON SEXOLOGY.

I agree with C. S. Wood, M. D., as against Celia B. Whitehead, that it is the pleasant sensation that is sought and not conception. I doubt if there is a child in the world to-day because it was really wanted or thought of at the time of conception.

But there is a "possibility and a desirability of the conjugal embrace not being allowed to go beyond the bounds of a love embrace and become propagative. In this sacramental blending there should be no haste, no animality, just a quiet exaltation of the entire being of the two. The nervous spasm called the orgasm is avoided, therefore all danger of conception is forestalled. This alone is immeasurably desirable to woman and should be equally so to man. Given abundant time and mutual reciprocity the exchange becomes satisfactory and complete without emission or crisis by either party. When people once learn how to enjoy the sexual association according to this method they will not wish to do otherwise excepting by design for the purpose of securing offspring."

I do not altogether agree with Mrs. Whitehead and Mrs. Walsbrooker that the sexual question and the settlement thereof belongs wholly to woman, for, like Adeline Champney, men are necessary to my happiness. I do not know and do not want to know how to get along without them, and to leave them entirely out of the greatest of all questions would be a very unfair, impossible and undesirable thing to do. I vote for woman and man to confer together and come to a satisfactory understanding and agreement concerning this most important and far-reaching question of sexual association, the flower of love. Some men expect love to bloom into a perfect flower with no bud to begin with. There is a cause to produce the bud—the caresses that should always precede the culmination. Women enjoy caresses from the men they love. The moss rose-bud when about half open is much more beautiful than the full blown rose. So it is sometimes that women need the caresses and other endearments from men with no thought of the sexual act, and men must learn self-control, and learn that the time has come in the evolution of the race for women to rule in the kingdom of love, not unjustly and unkindly, as man has hitherto done, but lovingly, for the good of humanity and the immediate good of man as well as woman; and man must learn that to woman there are bushels of other things that go to make up the sum total of love besides the sexual act, and that this act per se is not love, but lust, the greatest enemy and greatest hindrance to love, and must be controlled before man can love in the way woman must be loved to be fully satisfied.

The endearments must be an every-day business, and without which the sexual act is worse than nothing to woman and the love act an utter impossibility, for the love act can be only between lovers. No one seeking physical relief need ever try the love act; it is not for them. The old erroneous doctrine that semen is waste matter, and must be thrown off, is now by sex radicals supplanted by the more rational idea that, if retained during sex relation, it renews the body and mind, and man is never justified in throwing it out of his system unless to beget children. Every time he does so he throws away that much mental or physical strength.

I agree with Mr. Harman, our Moses, that we all are part of evolution and are in duty bound to do what we can to help bring about a better state of affairs on this earth and in this life, and that part of the work to be done before we can hope to have a better humanity, and consequently a better world, is to teach men and women that there are two distinct methods of sex association—primarily, the love relation, which builds up, renews, regenerates the mind and body of the participants, and secondarily, the propagative, to be used only when a child is really wanted.

The wrongs that have grown out of a misuse of the sex nature, more than anything else cause me to believe that there is no intelligent power higher than man and woman. No intelligent power would make a humanity and endow it with a sex nature and let it use that nature to create the idiot, the insane, the murderer, the thief, the deaf, dumb and blind, the deformed and all the other human failures.

There is no intelligent power above man. But evolution, that irresistible force in nature, of which humanity is a part, will in time create a new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness; and humanity, now endowed with reason, must be free to solve all the problems of life.

SARA CHRIST CAMPBELL.

THE SUPPRESSION OF THE SEXUAL IMPULSE.

It is a German Philosopher who says:

It is a voluptuous illusion which leads the man to believe he will find a greater pleasure in the arms of the woman whose beauty appeals to him than in those of any other; or, which, indeed, exclusively directed to a single individual, firmly convinces him that the possession of her will insure him excessive happiness." (Schopenhauer, Bk. 4, chap. XLIV).

It is an American hedonist who says:

"I am to a considerable degree a disciple of Aristippus, and I hold that a reasonable indulgence in rational carnal pleasures is necessary to the proper development of human character." (Walter Hurt in LUCIFER, Oct. 27, 1904).

It is not without design, perhaps, that the word "character" is qualified by the word "human." And yet unless man and the lower animals are subject to different developmental processes, that which is true of my friend Walter Hurt is also true of my pet Thomas Cat. I (oo believe that "throughout all nature runs analogy's unbroken scrizl," but I do not believe that sexualism is in any way contributory to the development of character. Neither do I believe that the "sex and gustatory appetities are bribes" given by Nature to man for the preservation of the species. When we speak of Nature in this way, we personify her; and nothing is more certain to the mind of the consistent anarchistic thinker than that Nature is wholly unconscious and thoroughly ateleological. If Nature bribes man with the sex appetite, she also bribes the animals; and if she bribes the protozoa to feed and propagate, then why should we not say she bribes the rivers to run to the sea, the stone to fall through the air and the vine to clamber about the oak? Does not Nature act the same in both the organic and inorganic, the conscious and unconscious worlds?

I think man takes his food and nearly everything else he can get hold of for the same reason that the Pole attracts the Needle, and what that reason is no one can say. The tendencies of Nature manifest themselves to us in the form of desire or will or inclination. Behind this we can not go. We can not conceive of Nature teleologically, for by that very conception we would put an end to Nature. Purpose has altogether to do with the temporary. Man has his limitations and therefore his purposes. He seeks money in his youth that he may spend his old age comfortably. But Nature being indestructible and therefore incapable of change is through and through without purpose or design. She accomplished nothing when she brought my friend Walter Hurt and my pet Thomas Cat into the world. They came for the same reason that water runs down hill and fire burns.

Hurt contemplates Nature entirely from the subjective plane. He does not seem to realize, which is no discredit to him, as there is nothing so difficult as a true metaphysical insight into Nature, that Nature is brainless and therefore thoughtless, a blind and perpetually moving automaton that is ever the same secula seculorum. Reason and with it design and purpose are peculiar to the brain alone. I find all three of these in "A Plea for Calm Discussion." There is the same difference between myself and Nature, in one sense, as there is between myself and the typewriter. Now, if the typewriter were an automaton, producing Ms. spontaneously, despite its voidness of sensibility and intelligence, it would exactly parallel the process of Nature in her production of puppies and philosophers. It is nothing that we cannot conceive of the possibility of unconscious causation, for we can not conceive of the ultimate possibility of anything. For me to understand why matter exists, it would have to cease to exist that I might observe the process of nothing being converted into something; and even after that had taken place there would remain the process to be explained.

In my opinion, a rational regulation of the bowels is as conducive to character-development as rational carnal indulgence; and yet I conceive there could be such a thing as a constipated philanthropist, suffering with hemorrhoids. After thorough self-examination I find that I am impelled to the sexual the same as I am to cigarettes, philosophising or anything else with which I dissipate time. It might be truly said that carnal indulgence is conducive to health, but never to morality. For if the problem of ethics is the removal of misery from the world, it is evident that the basis of morality is the very reverse of this—the absolute suppression of the sexual impulse. Of course, this will never be done, as sexual desire is the very pith and fibre of our nature. We are the restless marionettes of lust that ceaselessly tortures the race the same as government, ecclesiasticism, et cetera. Lust is the source of cruelty and therefore tyranny, and so long as man is moved by the charms of woman he will wish also to stand on the neck of his fellow man. Sexual passion is the very essence of man's imperialistic tendencies; and until the multitude learns the lesson of asceticism slavery and murder will rule the world. The most refined passionate regard for woman is but a sublimation of the coarsest, and marriage is not very far removed from rape. The goal of our endeavor therefore should be the abolition of marriage, and after that should come the suppression of all sexual desire.

I myself am not going to do anything to bring such desirable conditions about for the reason that it is not worth while to sow seed in the desert. Existence is here and here to remain. The sexual impulse like gravity will never do away with itself. Nature produces conscious ratiocinative man, and then reveals her masterpiece to him as an utterly worthless, suffering incarnation of misery. An intelligent Cosmos would gather up its dollrags and throw them away, but it will not as it is nothing more than a blind and indestructible congeries of forces, where

> Upon a dim, stupendous throne,
> Mist-enshrouded, reigns alone
> The monarch Death. From out the West
> Deepening shadows still invest
> His dominions of silence, of peace and of rest—
> Within huge darknesses where flow
> Unrippled streams that stretch afar,
> Through vastnesses where never blow
> Revivifying winds. No star
> Gleams in upon the gloom, but flares
> The sombre light of Ruin's countless years. (Original).

The truth standing out like the lighthouse o'er the sea of storm is that man is born to hope, to suffer and to die. It is even as I myself once wrote:

> There is a sadness that pervades our thought,
> A boundless and impenetrable gloom,—
> Sublime despair that ruined Hope hath wrought
> In its vain efforts to o'erreach the tomb.
> Nor can the charneled soul within the womb
> Of fruitless Time escape its agony,
> Arising from the universal doom,
> Unless it learn to love its misery
> And cherish that which writhes the heart all bitterly.
> Pain ever visits men in countless ways,
> And starless binds upon the heights of woe,
> Prometheus-like, the human soul. The days
> And nights, an endless stream, forever flow
> From misery to misery, and blow
> The scorching winds along a desert waste
> That blights possession in the moment that we taste.

It is only when we turn from the sorrow and vanity of all human existence to the contemplation of the beauty of the unconscious world that life becomes at all tolerable through our partial forgetfulness of it, an idea to which I strive to give expression in the following original lines:

> The mountains have a glory of their own,
> The seas a grandeur and the stars a true
> Sublimity. There's beauty in the stone
> By Genius touched—in sounds our yearnings woo
> To their divinest phrensy, which like dew
> Upon the bosom of the sleeping rose,
> Bring peace unto the tempest and renew
> The soul, all-wearied, as it ebbs and flows
> Like waters 'neath the storm that shifts it as it blows.
> There's beauty in the gleam of placid lakes,
> A loveliness unfailing in the maze
> Of flowery woodlands, and the tangled brakes,
> Where man is not, the scenes beyond all praise.
> The dying sun that wraps him in a blaze
> Of glory—giant Viking of the sea—
> Is grander far beyond the mightiest days
> Of Greece and Rome, whose titan empery
> Within the dust e'en claims the homage of the free.

LUCIFER: ITS MEANING AND PURPOSE.

LUCIFER—The planet Venus; so called from its brightness.—Webster's Dictionary.

LUCIFEROUS—Giving light; affording light or the means of discovery.—Same.

LUCIFIC—Producing light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing, and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Third Series, Vol. VII., No. 27.

Liberty Group will give their third social and dance Christmas eve in Stangel's hall, 235 So. Western avenue.

The Chicago Society of Anthropology meets every Sunday at 3:30 p. m., 17th floor Masonic Temple. Public invited.

The Social Science League holds public meetings every Sunday evening at eight, in Room 913, Masonic Temple, Chicago. Lectures and discussions free.

The West Side Liberty Club will give a concert and dance Dec. 17, at Ruehl's hall, 222 W. 12th street, for the purpose of maintaining a reading room. By order of committee.

The Single Tax Banquet at Kinsley's Restaurant, Nov. 20, was a great success, in every respect. Prominent among the speakers on this occasion was our old-time friend and subscriber, J. Warner Mills of Denver—subject, the True Cause of the Troubles Between the "Miners' Federation" and the "Citizens' Alliance" So-called.

RENEWALS AND SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Many of our subscribers and helpers do not need to be reminded that Lucifer's continued existence depends mainly on prompt renewals and on new names to the list, but lest any should forget, this paragraph is here inserted. It is expensive and troublesome to send out statements to such as fall into arrears, and therefore we ask all our subscribers, whether regular or "trial," to note the number written or printed on the wrapper of their paper, and if not convenient to pay now they will confer a favor by notifying us by postal whether they wish to have the paper continued to their address. It is very desirable that we begin the new year with a clean balance sheet, and, as just intimated, our hope of making such clean balance depends mainly upon our subscribers and patrons.

According to my belief, the supreme thing for every man to do is to be absolutely true to himself. All consequences, whether rewards or punishments, whether honor and power or disgrace and poverty, are as dreams undreamt. I have made my choice. I have taken my stand. Where my brain and heart go, there I will publicly and openly walk. Doing this, is my highest conception of duty. Being allowed to do this, is liberty.—Ingersoll.

WHAT OF THE FUTURE?

The near approach of the winter solstice, marking the close of the solar year, makes it timely and proper to ask,

"What of the night, Watchman?"

What can be done during winter—night of the year in the northern hemisphere of the earth's surface, to make Lucifer, our Son of the Morning, to shine more brightly than ever before, and prevent all possibility of an occultation or eclipse, such as occurred in March and April of the current year.

First, perhaps, I should ask,

What of the changes that have been proposed and discussed quite extensively during the past seven or eight months?

Speaking for myself alone; speaking as an individual worker and not as the autocrat of Lucifer, I wish to say that, having taken plenty of time to consider the pros and cons in regard to the proposed changes,

First, In name of paper;

Second, In frequency of issue;

Third, In shape or form of issue, and fourth, in price per year—after giving, as far as possible, an impartial and unprejudiced hearing to all the arguments advanced for and against change in any or all the particulars named, I have formed a definite and decided opinion as to what would best promote the health, efficiency and longevity of the paper I have made my life work for nearly twenty-five years.

What that opinion is I prefer not to say in this issue, and for two or three reasons:

First, I wish to give all a chance to revise or change their vote, if they wish to do so.

Second, I wish to give those who have put off sending in their vote a little more time to make up their minds. Only to-day I received from California an elaborate argument from a physician and author, in favor of a change in name.

Third and chiefly, perhaps, I wish, while we are talking of changes, to have a consensus of opinion in regard to the suggestion made by many of Lucifer's earnest workers, notably by Bro. Wastall of London, South Africa, in last Lucifer, in favor of still greater concentration upon one line of reform, namely, that of Sex Ethics. As it is very probable that many readers have not seen this letter from Bro. Wastall, or have lost or given away the paper containing it, I herewith reproduce the part that urges greater concentration of effort. After highly commending the work of Lucifer's editors and saying, "I feel I want to shake you both by the two hands," he proceeds thus:

"All the same, I am nevertheless convinced your capabilities and power for good in the world might be utilized to still better advantage. However, it is one thing to criticise, and quite another to be able to do even a quarter as well oneself what one points to as defective in another's work. Since you invite outside opinion, however, I would suggest that Lucifer be made more of a World Paper, by only treating the one subject of Sex Reform, which the whole human race is at least curious about, if not interested in. Let 'Liberty' and the 'Demonstrator' continue the excellent work they are engaged in, namely that of all-round Anarchism, Individualistic Ethics, and Economics, for which but relatively few can ever be ripe enough to give ear. You will thus, it seems to me, better help the cause and at the same time advance true Anarchism—not labeled such, perhaps—under cover of Sex Reform. I find Lucifer as it now stands a veritable red rag to the bull, and so fail to make converts with it. Now this is poor policy from any point of view whatever. First things first! and one thing at a time, is safer procedure.

"Get an individual first soundly saved on the great question of Sex, and I maintain he or she will be then the better prepared for a dispassionate consideration of other less basic reforms. Your Journal run on such lines would hold an absolutely unique position in the world. Here in this Sub-Continent the people, to a larger extent than you suspect, perhaps, would support such a journal; so too in Australasia and all the English colonies, to say nothing of the great centers of Europe—for which it should later on perhaps be printed in Esperanto. Then would your treasury become as plethoric as it is now constantly depleted.

"Think of the useful work, too, that might be done merely by establishing a means of communication between women who want to marry and women who are too much or unhappily married and thus giving both the opportunity of talking their cases over together. When we consider that fully fifty per cent of the women, who constitute the clientele of palmists and fortune tellers, are wrongly mated or unhappily married, it will at once be seen what useful work could be done on these lines alone.

"A. Wastall, Ex-Editor
"'Natural Food,' London."

That the question of methods of work is a vital one to success will be readily conceded, and that upon no point is it more necessary to have substantial agreement than upon the question of concentration, on the one hand, or of diversity on the other, will also be conceded. For this reason I now ask brief replies to, or comments upon the suggestions of Brother Wastall.

Once more, in regard to the first four questions named in this article, I would suggest that if changes are to be made in any of these particulars, the nearer these changes can be made to, or after, the beginning of the new year the better. M. H.

THE LAST OF THE JOHN TURNER CASE.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

As treasurer of the Free Speech League and the Turner Fund Committee, I am now able to report that all matters relating to the John Turner case are at last settled, and in accord with the action of the last meeting of the committee I now offer a report of what use was made of the Fund collected.

The contributions were acknowledged, as they came in, in various Liberal papers that aided in encouraging them, and it would be asking too much of your space to print them in detail again. So, also, of the numerous items of disbursement; but the following summary gives a sufficient idea of the cost of defense, as audited by the committee:

For John Turner and family	$425.50
For halls and meetings	180.00
For secretary's postage, etc.	174.54
For collector's expenses	185.90
For printing	255.60
For attorneys' fees and court charges	1,644.31
	$2,965.85

The total of expense account also represents the total income, and for this expenditure, together with much personal effort, we report as results: some publicity, considerable opposition aroused to such restrictive immigration laws, and the adverse Supreme Court decision which practically says of the law that excludes John Turner, "that's all right."

It is generally well to know the worst, which now amounts to this, that foreigners have no rights here that Congress may choose to deny to them.

The only remaining assets of the Turner Committee are about fifty copies of the pamphlet of Darrow's brief for the Supreme Court, which contains much of use to all who have occasion to defend the rights of opinion, free speech, etc. These are now offered at 25 cents per copy (of which it takes 10 cents to mail them), and any little income thereby will be turned in to the small fund of the Free Speech League.

E. B. Foote, Jr., Treasurer.

New York, November 2, 1904.

[The above report was overlooked else it would have been given to Lucifer's readers much sooner. First and last we have given considerable space and time to the "Turner case," regarding it as one of the most important ever brought to the attention of liberty lovers in the United States. In San Francisco (now the American Free Thought Association) in St. Louis, I did what I could to secure public protest against the unAmerican and reactionary methods adopted by the Federal government at Washington, in its treatment of John Turner, an Englishman, whose only crime was that, when asked for his political belief, he acknowledged himself an "Anarchist."—M. VOLTAIRINE DE CLEYRE.

Voltairine de Cleyre, the well-known radical poet, free thought and anarchist lecturer, is lying dangerously ill in Philadelphia, and in very straitened circumstances. Her life and works are known to a great many readers of the Lucifer and to them we believe it unnecessary to do more than to mention this fact. To those to whom they are not, however, we would say that she has given seventeen years of her life with pen, voice and whatever way she could, to the cause of freedom and human progress. Possessed of ability, honesty and high moral courage, she never swerved from the hard and stony path which all idealists are compelled to travel. Devoting herself unceasingly to the uplifting and enlightening of the human family without hope or thought of reward, except that feeling of exhilaration that comes to the soldier of progress, it was inevitable that now in the hour of physical disability, she should find herself penniless and helpless. Her frinds in Philadelphia have rallied to her assistance to the best of their ability and have placed her in a hospital where she is receiving medical attendance and the best of care. The expenses are considerable and as their means are limited, this appeal is issued in the hope that many friends till now not aware of her condition, may know it and render that assistance which is necessary and which we believe they will gladly give. Miss de Cleyre is too ill to be consulted in the matter, so the appeal is issued without her knowledge. The situation is so critical, however, that we have no alternative. She would be the last to say or imply that any obligation, moral or otherwise, rests upon anyone to assist her because of her devotion to the cause of freedom. We feel, however, that most of us have done far less than she and we must rally in the hour of need round a fighter who has fought so strenuously in that cause. Contributions can be sent to either E. G. Smith, 210 E. 13th St., New York City, or to N. Notkin, 1332 S. 6th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

ANOTHER WOMAN'S "DECLARATION."

Three cheers for you "(Mrs.) W. M!"

Is the handle a badge of servitude?

I have but one fault to find with you, and that is you did not sign your full name.

Sing it out, sister! You have nothing to be ashamed of.

Like some of the sisters I think most men have a good deal to learn. Minding their own business is the biggest. Even our most radical do and say some very odd things.

One said his love for his sweetheart gave him the right to go into her presence any time he wished.

Bah! And his love for her might give him the right to knock her down any time he wished.

Another said, "Oh, I don't care if my wife associates sexually with other men, but I don't want to know it." The same man would not take a lady out, although she asked him to do so, because another man was living in the same house with her and was her lover. Another man's property, you see!

It is these would-be free people that hurt the cause of freedom.

Elsie Cole Wilcox makes me smile when she says she is afraid "to speak out in meetin'." She says "Liberty is the one thing needful." Yes, dear sister, but liberty is an idea that has no place in the mind of the average Socialist. All the "prosperity" in the world will never root out of the minds of governmentalists the idea of ownership of the body. I know a good many Socialists but none that are free, or even who know the meaning of that word.

The only demand that any woman can make, or has the right to make, is freedom for herself. This she takes, if she wants it; if not she remains a slave—a slave to public opinion, religion, authority, or man-made laws of any kind or of all kinds.

Freedom cannot be given; you must take it. The laws that now hold women in a grasp of iron will never recede. The mind must break them.

As for myself I take freedom. If I wish a sex mate I ask him—no other. He has the right to comply or refuse.

I make no love contracts. That I love a man to-day is no sign I will love him forever, or even to-morrow.

In this I believe I am right, and say as much at any time or place, and am not afraid to sign my name.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

"Desire" is the title of "a collection of passionate prose-poems" by Charlotte Eaton, recently published by the G. W. Dillingham Co. Ella Wheeler Wilcox hails the work as that of "the feminine re-incarnation of Walt Whitman." Certainly there is a similarity both in the form of the poems and the subject matter, which consists of the glorification of the body and of love. "The Voluptuary," a picture of one who does not properly respect love and himself and others, may be taken as a specimen of Mrs. Eaton's style.

"I looked in the face of the Voluptuary,
The coarse red flesh, huge jaw, blear eyes, the edge of the eyelids swollen.
The great body bent towards me, desiring me, the hands soft, the palm lines broken,
And I talked with him on equal terms, on the themes that most appealed to him.
And I saw that he had no conception of happiness beyond the gratifying of the senses,
And that nothing was sacred in his eyes, because all things appeared to him through this medium,
And that when no longer engrossed by the questions relating to the brute nature,
His eyes wandered, his fingers drummed upon the table, he was distrait, ill at ease,
And I saw that all the beauty of the world had no actual existence for him,
That love, chivalry, devotion to an ideal, were as sounding of brass in his ears,
Mere trifles to be discounted as having no weight in the life of each day.
And I saw that the arts, the delights of literature or of meditation,
The philosopher's joy, or that of the scientist, who lives in the thought of generations to come,
Had not entered into the dull fiber of him, even as a suspicion;
And my heart yearned in pity over the great creature before me, as the Heart of a mother might at a monster birth—
For I saw that the brain was still in the elementary state, though he numbered the years of full manhood,
And that the body so perfect in growth, vigor, and proportion,
Was as the strength of the ox, unchastened by the needs of an awakened intelligence."

When Mrs. Eaton speaks of the "gratifying of the senses" she uses the term erroneously, for she certainly means that the Voluptuary gratifies one sense to the extent that he is unable to appreciate the enjoyment which may be obtained through other senses.

The price of the volume, bound in cloth with gold lettering, is $1.

"The Cripple Creek Strike," 1903-1904, is a story of the strike and the causes leading up to it, by one who should be very well qualified to write it. Emma F. Langdon, the author, issued the Victor Daily Record, the organ of the miners, in defiance of the seventy-five militiamen who attempted to prevent its appearance by raiding the office at night and taking the workers, including Mrs. Langdon's husband, to the "bull-pen." Mrs. Langdon took her place at the linotype machine and set the type and the paper appeared the next day. For her defense of liberty of speech and of the press, representative citizens and city and county officials of Teller County gave her a gold medal, and the Western Federation of Miners made her an honorary member of their organization.

The book contains 250 pages of matter, from which it is difficult to make brief selections, as the entire work is important. The cause of the struggle is given in a statement of President Moyer of the Western Federation, from which the following sentences are taken: "The facts are that the legislature of 1899 passed an eight hour bill; the Supreme court declared it class legislation and unconstitutional. Notwithstanding this, the representatives of organized labor went before the men who were working twelve hours in the smelters and urged them to wait and a future legislature would do something for them. The eight-hour constitutional amendment was carried by 40,000 majority, 70,000 votes being cast for the amendment. The Fourteenth Colorado Legislature went into session pledged to the enactment of an eight-hour day. The representatives of the mill and smelting trusts went into session with them. The result was no law was passed. Upon this legislature I place the responsibility of the present trouble. Had this legislature performed its duty there would now be no strike in the Cripple Creek district."

Failing to secure the constitutional amendment, the men struck for the eight hour day. All the officials who did not favor the mine owners were forced from their positions by the militia and the so-called "Citizens' Alliance."

The book contains 50 illustrations, including portrait of the author. It is well bound in green cloth, with gold lettering. Mrs. Langdon compiled the book, set the type, read the proofs, made the pictures from which many of the illustrations are made, folded the books, and at the same time attended to her house work and did sufficient work at her trade to pay the greater part of the expense of halftones and press work. Such industry and enthusiasm are certainly worthy of encouragement, and I hope many of our readers will purchase the book. The price is $1, with ten cents for postage, and it may be obtained of Mrs. Emma Langdon, Box 1408, Denver, Colo. L. H.

QUESTIONS FOR THE FREE WOMAN.

I have read the "Declaration of Independence" by Mrs. W. M. I believe every woman should be as free as she wants to be. I hope Mrs. W. M. read Mr. J. M. Crane's letter on the five kinds of "barnacles"—men who prey on feminine nature, or no doubt she understands men in general. I have been surprised to hear men, pillars of churches, on leaving the women folks after a dinner, begin to boast about their affairs with women; tell how grateful "old maids' are for attentions. The better sort of mechanics and others will talk after this fashion: "That was a fine girl you had at the dance." "Yet bet; and I can do thus and so whenever I like, too."

Now, the most radical women never speak so of men. While I admit all the rights to freedom that women want, I fear I never could love a woman of whom men could thus speak. I question whether it is worth while for women to place themselves in such a position, it being doubtful whether they can judge of a man that will do so or not. Under present conditions therefore, I think women should be slow to invite the "slurs and sneers" unless a vital interest is at stake. Women must hold the respect of their mates if they want love, and as men are now educated they do not love very long, and seldom respect, an unconventional woman. There are good men now, but I have spoken of the rule. If Mrs. W. M. gained the love of one of the few, and if freedom would lead to conditions that would give him pain, would she give up the freedom for a desirable union? I ask to get the position of women in general on this point. Jealousy is still painful to even good men. NEMO.

OTTAWA, KANSAS.

Dear Friends of LUCIFER and Liberty:

Again I greet you. Time flies, and ideas change, and progress moves onward always. Entering the new year, or rather closing the old year, we have materialized my childish, girlish and womanly dreams.

When a litte girl at my mother's knee reading of Jesus and his remarkable cures by the drugless system I longed to be like him and ever dreamed of curing the sick. As I grew older I constantly kept building air castles of large commodious rooms, well aired, well lighted and exposed to the sun's rays.

Friends, my dream has materialized. New Year's day Dr. J. E. Roberts of Kansas City, Mo., will deliver a lecture, here in our dream house, and open up the ball. We are now occupying the building though not finished—22 rooms with bath house with four tubs, steam heated, gas lighted.

My main work is on nerves. I give the "Rest Cure." Charges within the reach of all. There is no need of anyone suffering with Nervous Prostration who can come here and be cured. I make specialties of Rheumatism, nervous trouble, stomach and bowels. I treat successfully female troubles. I cure appendicitis, rupture and other troubles too numerous to mention. Write me.

Subscribers who receive more than one copy of Lucifer, when not ordered, will please use the extra copy or copies to induce their friends to subscribe, if only for a trial trip of three months for 25 cents. Stamps received in payment. As the paper weighs less than one ounce a copy can sent to a friend in a common 2 cent letter, with an ordinary sized sheet of note paper.

Government is a misapprehension; all control should be within the individual, not without.—Dr. J. H. Tilden.

VARIOUS VOICES.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

Lena Selde, Twisp, Wash.—I inclose $3.25 for Tokology by Alice B. Stockham, and for renewal of my subscription to LUCIFER. When I read of women murdering helpless innocent little babies to hide disgrace I wonder how much longer we are to live under the false ideal that motherhood is a disgrace and taking human life an honor, and I wish for more papers like LUCIFER.

H. M. Addison, Adelaide, S. Australia: "I agree with Pope: 'For forms of government, let fools contest; whatever is best administered is best.' Our Commonwealth, and also our (S. A.) State government is being carried on by a bare majority of two in the Commonwealth and of one in the State. The moderate Socialistic party seems to be the coming power. We shall get no progress from the conservative capitalists. We are coddled almost to death by grandmotherly legislation. All our doings must be regulated by act of Parliament. It would be a good thing if they would leave us alone and not create any new sins —or laws, but codify and consolidate what good laws we have and repeal the bad. We have had eight consecutive bad seasons for pastoral and agricultural purposes, which have left us would do better were they to give this question earnest study. In a rather poor condition, and all these ills are attributable to socialistic legislation—so the capitalist says. As regards sexual matters South Australia is the most barbarous and prudish of all the States. The marriage law is a disgrace to civilization, being worse than the law of England. If you like to send me some 'slips' and say fifty LUCIFERS I will see that they are distributed. But your papers would be looked upon as emissaries of the Devil by 99 out of every 100 of our people. You are a few centuries ahead of your time."

J. Al Wilson, A. P. A. W. 1020, Pittsburg, Pa., Carnegie Bldg.: "In looking over my file of LUCIFER am shy 1024 and 1026, which fact is due to my enthusiasm in the spreading of the 'Light.' Kindly send me these numbers and the ten semi-weekly of numbers prior to 1013 as per previous arrangement. The word 'Light' recalls, to memory that cities are reforming 'red-light' districts by turning on electric white light, but might not the woman part be prevented by sex-freedom of both sexes? by liberty of action cutting out 'butting-in' of third parties? doing away with unwritten laws of custom? The church—responsible generally for human slavery, 'kicks' on divorce and socialism on plea of the breaking up of the family, seemingly with the desire to give the unhappy world all the 'Hell' possible, so it will the more long for the heaven held out in the great unknown hereafter. In Allegheny county in September sixteen suicides and six murders; 200 in jail and morgue and hospitals overpopulated; city governments of Pittsburg and Allegheny corrupt with 'graft' and other evidence of capitalism—all amid hundreds of church spires, high-pay preachers that would be horrified if facts forcibly stated by you, were called to attention, blind to results of narrow-minded selfishness in relations of men and women. . . . . Our Lisbon Brother of Ohio—I 'entered' this world of 'hard-knocks' in same county—the newspapers state has transferred 'spirit-fruit' to the Socialist town of Harrison-Debs. Suggest LUCIFER and 'Spirit-Fruit' form a 'trust'—the Fulton and Lake combine. Let Harman and Bellhart be our uncrowned Kings—Lillian the Queen and 'Underground' disciples of Free People willing to fight for courage of convictions, in all cities, just as the brave abolitionists did for the black slave. . . . Berrarr Macfadden, the physical culture reformer, says that weakness is a crime. Yet the existing (for all time in past) mode of work and living creates weak men and women and when weak to the incurable point, over the 45 year dead-line, suicide the only release, for the Gompers-Mitchell union declares against pensions for veterans of civil life and that it will never do at all for the people to own the earth but continue to labor for Carnegie, Edward, William, and Czar (who prays before murder) and keep up the work of talking simple life and acting in practice the strenuous one of strong against the weak. . . . Will remit 50c coming pay-day and 25c monthly thereafter. . . Brother Moses: first opportunity visit village East Aurora to meet Hubbard. LOVE'S WAY TO PERFECT HUMANHOOD.
By Agnes Benham.

An excellent companion for Carpenter's "Love's Coming of Age." The keynote of the book, found on page 76, reads thus: "The soul itself is pure and heavenly, and if at the moment of conception and through the prenatal time when it is building its earthly house it could meet with entirely responsive and congenial conditions, then would the earth be peopled with a race of gods." Price $1. Published by the author, Agnes Benham, Adelaide, South Australia. Orders may be sent through this office.

THE WHOLE SEX QUESTION

Solves itself when you eat right, think right, and trust divine instinct. If Humanity were natural, man would be more pure and woman more passionate—both of which conditions are required for a perfected progeny. Naturalness means sweetness, sanity, beauty, power, contentment—all the real things. The quickest way to get natural is to read and live "Return to Nature." This book teaches the mode of healing Nature practices on her children—with the kind of child-culture Omniscience intended for humans. Simply a revelation regarding the cure of all forms of disease. Advanced doctors are practicing it. New Thought leaders are proving it. Prominent editors are devoting whole pages to it. Everybody is asking about it. Won't you send a stamp for a circular? Or ten cents for additional Naturopathic literature. I'm waiting to love you into wholeness.

LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

ENTERED AT THE CHICAGO POSTOFFICE AS SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

PRICE FIVE CENTS. CHICAGO, ILL., DEC. 22, E. M. 304. (C. E. 1904.) WHOLE NO. 1029

CO-OPERATION, NEW THOUGHT, SPIRITUALISM.

I still enjoy LUCIFER, and give enjoyment to many others by distributing (to receptive, open minded people) the Light Bearer. The paper improves continually whether Moses or Lillian stands at the helm. Surely I am not the only one who realizes a constant sense of gratitude that despite all the discouragements of the past, the little messenger calmly and bravely goes on its way rejoicing.

Since my coming to San Diego two years ago I have written to LUCIFER but seldom, because always where I enter there is immediately "something doing." Sometimes it "suits the company," sometimes not—that seems to make little difference. Like the brook I "go on forever." Just because there is a message: First to woman—to "Come forth." Second to humanity, "All Life is One." Third to competition, "Make way—stand aside—for co-operation." The rapid advance in these lines within the past five years amid the pains of social travail should make every one glad to have given even a little push to the trend of events toward freedom and toward the knowledge that all the resources of nature are ours, and can belong to no one person or set of persons, though he or they exhibit deeds, conveyances or titles of ownership mountains high; they all emanate from authorities as irresponsible as themselves.

We have here a branch of the Rochdale Co-operative Association about a year old, not so large as others in the state but beginning to do a fair business. The Co-operative Exchange met with a serious delay last summer when each of the sub-managers and the manager also fell ill or, from sickness in family, were obliged to close the four depositaries in the city. My own health is so much improved that the "vibrations" again begin to take hold among various people and in several directions, reaching only after the good and useful things that for want of the know how and a "market," positively go to waste. Men have lost fortunes raising oranges and lemons to rot on the ground. Other fruits have suffered and gone to waste for like cause. Every one was depending on railroads, dollars and corporations, instead of working for each other. While admitting the wisdom which says "To thine own self be true," they are trying, yes—scrambling to be true to every imaginary requirement outside of their own individuality.

San Diego is called a great Spiritual center. Indeed all along the Pacific coast conditions seem to be favorable to the "New Thought" in its many forms.

Harry Gaze has been here teaching "How to Live Forever"—an excellent and manifestly true teaching, but "strenuous" for those of us who have not spunk enough to keep hold of the "life line" every day and hour in living as we should. Many will die the old fashioned death all at once and find it necessary to come back to re-incarnate, that is, to hunt a new body; too lazy, or indifferent to keep the present one in repair constantly—making it better, a "fitting temple for the Holy Spirit." Too bad! A few may survive, even the "one hundred and forty-four thousand"—a loving, goodly "companie."

Benjamin Fay Mills has been here too, refreshing our weary spirits with his beautiful interpretations of the "Sermon on the Mount," assuring us that we are all divine—not poor worms of the dust awaiting the wrath of an avenging God.

Mr. Mills drew immense crowds of hungry souls as he has since in the east (I hope you heard him, my dear LUCIFER friends) and recently he has, with Mrs. Mills, visited San Diego again with the same success.

Mrs. May Stevenson of Stockholm, has been giving lectures on Hindoo Breath Culture accompanying them with practical lessons in the physical movements accompanying the theory, which seems a great help. Both men and women attended in large numbers though of course the women outnumber the men, being more anxious to learn how to live aright.

Mr. and Mrs. Reginald Cobbett of London, Eng., are here giving lessons in Truth and Healing, and are making a favorable impression.

Beside those mentioned there is Miss Francis A. Rand of Denver, and several others, giving lessons in the knowledge of discarding the errors (diseases) of the body and mind and uplifting humanity toward health and happiness.

You will not be surprised to hear that all these people believe in LUCIFER, or, if they have not seen the paper before (most have) in its teachings. They are also found to be Socialists in principle even confessing, laughingly, to dreadful anarchy, that mild philosophic anarchy that leads to the true liberty, with the principle "No government of man by man." All reforms or, rather, all forms of moral and spiritual growth, are near akin,—all come, by howsoever devious ways, out into the broad sea of toleration and universal brotherly love. But, as the old play has it "They who saye and not doe are not worthie of goode companie," and thus, for lack of courage, many remain in other "companie."

LUCIFER readers in San Diego were much disappointed that you did not extend your trip down the coast a little further when in Los Angeles, but we hope you will come here yet and "line up" with the others who bring us life messages.

Among them must be mentioned the Resident Theosophists led by Katherine Tingley, in their beautiful home in Loma Land across the bay west of San Diego. Every Sunday night free entertainments are given in their beautiful "Isis Theater," in this city by the students of Point Loma. These include classical music, noble essays, fine floral decorations (with a favor for each seat) beside a wonderful demonstration of children taught perfect self-possession, distinct enunciation, vocal expression in music and in essays, far beyond those of their years who suffer the careless, crowded methods of our public schools.

The "Raga Yoga" school established in the city is largely patronized by liberal progressive people who see the superiority of their natural methods and, who decline to comply with the compulsory vaccination of the public school law. To my Colorado friends I beg to say we hope to see them at our next Colorado quarterly reunion in San Diego, February 22nd, 1905

Our recent meeting at Mission Cliff Pavilion was attended by about eighty people nearly all of whom had lived in Colorado—a few crossed the plains to Denver in 1860, their secretary, myself, among the number. A merry Christmas to LUCIFER and all her readers and friends.

ON LLOYD, PREVENTION AND MOTHERHOOD.

The difficulty of distance makes me rather late in dealing with my good friend J. William Lloyd's remarkable "reply" to my test question on the preventive question. Mr. Lloyd starts off by indicating that he is going to defend the sterilizers against my onslaughts. Very well, then, how does he do it? He divides them into five classes: Class 1, selfish and sensuous. Class 2, poor, timid, and pessimistic. Class 3, slave to brutal husbands. Class 4, diseased and unfit. Class 5, those who feel that their lives might more usefully be devoted to some other service than motherhood.

Save us from our friends! What would the sterilizers have said if I had ventured to say that four classes out of five among their ranks were the poorest specimens of humanity? What a howl would have been raised! Yet here is their own advocate calmly classing them up as selfish, sensuous, timid, slavish, and diseased, and the sterilizers, without perceiving the sarcasm of it, feel perfectly happy in the notion that their advocate is chawing me up! Poor, deluded sterilizers! There is nothing more terrible than a candid friend.

But Mr. Lloyd goes further—and fares worse. I could do no better than quote, "There are millions of girls * * * who reasonably shrink from even the pain of ordinary child-birth. If these knew that they could have children practically without pain or peril, without bondage to any man, with personal control of time and frequency, with the certainty of a comfortable home personally controlled, of all necessary attendance, of the children being provided for, educated, started fair in life, of having all this under conditions of honor, emolument and security, we should soon see how many girls would shrink from motherhood."

What a cowardly ideal of life is the sterilizer's! Every difficulty or shadow of difficulty must "with certainty" be removed from the path—otherwise they "reasonably" shrink! How could such mothers hope to produce any but the poorest-spirited offspring? And this is the Anglo-Saxon race, that once grew the stronger in proportion to the difficulties encountered!

If Lloyd is right in his description, by all means let the wretched creatures sterilize. But is he right? Is it possible that a large mass of women has anywhere sunk so hopelessly low? I think not. I think infinitely better of the race than does the gifted author of "Dawn-Thought." That is where we differ, he and I. Now, let the above be quite understood. I am as keen as any one for improved conditions—that's one thing. But whatever the conditions may be, I must to my inmost soul abhor this whining talk about "reasonably shrinking." Neither Lloyd nor Harman nor myself nor anyone else has ever done anything by "reasonably shrinking." I hold and have always taught that the greatest crime of all is cowardice in the face of life; and when Lloyd realizes this (as he is great enough to do) he will be mortally sorry he ever invented these weak good-natured enervating phrases about "reasonably shrinking."

SEX AUTOCRACY.

I am still at a loss to understand Mrs. Champney. Words are used more or less, as to their meaning, in accord with the subject in hand. That sex autocracy has existed and does exist in our marriage code, giving man legal power over his wife's sex is quite evident, but Mrs. C. certainly has too much sense to even suppose that woman can exercise such autocracy over man, and "equal autocrats" are not impossible in the sense that I used the phrase—equal rulers of their own persons.

"Man's attempt at sexual autocracy." (It has been more than an "attempt.") "This cannot be accomplished by the autocracy of woman unless two wrongs make a right."

If it were possible for woman to become a sex autocrat there might be some sense in the above, but those who stop to think or who know anything of man's nature, know that he cannot be forced into such a relation with a woman for whom he has no desire; therefore, nature has made it impossible for woman to become a sex autocrat.

"The power to consent or refuse is mere self ownership." Yes, and for woman the greatest thing possible, so far as her sex is concerned. It is the one great demand that thinking women are making, and I have never known of their asking for more.

True, when we find men who write on this subject continually urging upon us our responsibility in selecting the father of our own children some of us feel that that is woman's business, not man's; that it is his business to see that he makes himself fit for fatherhood. If man wishes to urge responsibility upon any one, let it be his own sex. When we object to what seems an intermeddling with our business, an implication that we do not know enough to choose for ourselves, I am more than surprised to find a woman jumping to the conclusion that we repudiate man—think we can do without him.

But so far as responsibility is concerned I do repudiate the idea of our coming to this life simply to perpetuate the race. Our responsibility is to ourselves, and if we make the most of ourselves possible, nature will see to it that like produces like.

LOIS WAISBROOKER.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE

Bishop Seymour's verboilum in a recent Sunday Examiner, thanking Hearst for his "symposium on Marriage and Divorce," is as amusing as it is illogical, and as sad as it is hypocritical in the first place the Bishop's friend Willie did not take out a license for his loves, until he conceived the idea of boosting and coasting ...mself as fit for President—Mrs. Grundy controls lots of votes.

The Right! Reverend! Lord! Bishop! Seymour says: "Our Blessed Lord's fiat, the Supreme Lawgiver, is entirely ignored," referring to divorce and the Church God, so the Bishop, and the very arch-Bishops tell us, is Almighty, and he—He—cannot stop that which the Bishops are attempting to stop, so, of course they consider themselves more mighty than the Almighty, and intend trying to make those who detest each other live together, and prevent those who love each other from coming together—damphoolishness—Jesus was born without a license, at least so the parsons say, and of course they know. In the name of LOVE, the greatest power in the universe, what right has a parson, through the state, to poke his nose and tongue into any love making of others?—if any more laws are necessary as to marriage and divorce it is, to stop parsons fees for the one, and lawyers' fees for the other—keep close to nature and be happy, break natural law and pay the penalty, there is no dodging that, like the churches do their taxes—let the other fellows pay them, is the Christian maxim. The Bishop says: "The minister of the Gospel, I maintain, ought to be a protector of child-life in its innocence and purity"—the ought here unfortunately stands for nought, for sad to say, the last census shows 1,750,178 children employed by exploiters of Labor, and this is because the church upholds the sale of land, and USURY, and considers the command "in the sweat-of-thy-face-shalt-thou-eat-bread" as perfectly preposterous for parsons, and so, others follow their wicked example—they tell their sheep that "God is Love," and the way of salvation is so plain that "a wayfaring man though a fool cannot err therein." Love cannot be taught, and a special deceptive theological training is unnecessary to guide, even a fool, for what then do parsons receive their pay? The arch Bishop of Cant, who attended the convention, from England, has $75,000 a year, and two palaces—oh! the poor carpenter and fishermen!

Science proves, but asserts nothing.
Theology asserts, but proves nothing.

THE MARY TODD EPISODE.

Editor LUCIFER: The following correspondence between the Editor of the "Home Page" of the Chicago American and myself, may possibly interest your readers. Yours for truth and progress.

LOUIS J. LIVINGSTON.

"Editor Home Page: As a student of Sexology, the most striking thing to me about the Mary Todd episode and its discussion is the gross and lamentable ignorance regarding a fundamental and vital question of life that underlies, not only all human love, but the greater part of all the misery and the happiness in the world to-day. And that is the sex question. And in all the discussion the greatest ignorance is displayed by the two persons (besides the lovely and ingenuous heroine) most concerned—the ignorant and foolish mother and the pedantic and soulless female who tries to show the young loves how to shoot.

"To quote Dr. Havelock Ellis, the eminent English sexologist: 'I regard sex as the central problem of life. The question of sex—with the racial questions that rest on it—stands before the coming generation as the chief problem for solution. Sex lies at the root of life, and we can never learn to reverence life until we know how to understand sex.'

"Again quoting a Viavi lecturer: 'Sex is a foundation fact, and there will never be a thoroughly healthy individual in social life until sex is talked, taught and written of, without fear and without reproach.'

"Ignorance of this mighty question—the central sun of existence—is the breeder of the five monsters of our civilization—Disease, Insanity, Prostitution, Intemperance and Crime. I think a page of your paper devoted to the science of sexology would help greatly to dispel this appalling ignorance and would be greatly appreciated by people who think. It would be a God-send to humanity if men of immense wealth and philanthropic instincts like Andrew Carnegie, would endow chairs of sexology in the leading colleges and universities of the world."

To those of your readers who are interested in this greatest and most absorbing of all life's questions I would recommend such publications as "The New Hedonism," by Grant Allen; "The Vindication of Sex," by Helen Wilmans Post; "The Majesty of Sex," by Nancy McKay Gordon; "Love's Coming of Age," by Edward Carpenter; "What the Young Need to Know," by Edwin C. Walker; "How to Live Forever," by Harry Gaze; "The Lovers' World," by Dr. Alice B. Stockham; and the bimonthly called LUCIFER ("The Light-Bearer"), published in your city.

"The sweet and beautiful pleadings of this lovely child of nature (Mary Todd) are nothing more nor less than indications of that great law that attracts or holds together, not only individual beings, but every atom in the entire universe.

"The letter from a mother of Battle Creek, Mich., in your issue of the 21st, is one of the best that has been published, because the mother who wrote it evidently knows the fundamental truths of sex.

"LOUIS J. LIVINGSTON,
"Author of 'A Sexual Creed.'

"Champaign, Ill., Nov. 22, '04."

(To this letter the following answer was sent.)

"Hearst's Chicago American, 214-216 Madison street, Chicago, Ill., November 23, 1904.

"Dear Sir: Thank you very much for submitting the inclosed, but we do not believe that it is exactly matter for a newspaper. Your contention is no doubt very true, and your object is praiseworthy, but this is a subject better suited to a magazine of social topics than a daily paper, we believe.

"Respectfully yours, Chicago American."

OUR EXCHANGES.

The temptation is always very great to quote at length from our exchanges, but space forbids. Prominent among the magazines that thus tempt, is "Physical Culture," (N. Y.) edited and published by Bernarr McFadden, who seems to lead the other editors at the present time in writing, speaking and working for reform in habits of eating, of clothing and of physical exercise. From the November number, "Timely Talks on Current Topics," the following paragraph in regard to "The Apple" so fully coincides with my own experience and observation that I must make room for it:

"This efficacious fruit is not prized half as much as it should be. It has not been recognized yet as a valuable medicinal food. The apple is an excellent brain food, because it has more phosphoric acid, in an easily digestible shape than has any other fruit known. It excites the liver, promotes sound and healthy sleep, and thoroughly disinfects the mouth. Also, it agglutinates the surplus acids of the stomach, and helps the kidney secretions. It obviates all possibility of indigestion, and is one of the best preventives of diseases of the throat. Like the lemon and the orange, the apple is an invaluable antidote for the craving of those who are addicted to the alcoholic habit. Eat as many apples as possible. Eat them at night, just before going to bed. Store a barrel in your cellar and you will be the gainer in good sound sleep and in general health."

Among contributed articles in the November "Physical Culture" I note one from Mrs. Grace Edwards, on "Educating the Child Mind to Be Pure—How a Mother Should Meet the Questions of Her Child."

"Mothers," says Mrs. Edwards, "take your children to nature. Show them how universal is sex. Many insects live only to reproduce their kind and die. * * * The writer knew nothing of such subjects till the age of fifteen, while visiting a physician's family she had access to a large medical library. * * * I can cite other cases like my own. One girl of fifteen asked a young man with whom she was driving, the difference between a bull and a cow. Another of the same age was delighted at the supposed fighting of a rooster and his hens. A third young girl was about to be married. Her mother, never having taught her anything on the subject of sex was convinced that she ought to be told something before the wedding day arrived. The poor girl was shocked, declared that she would not marry, that she would never submit to such an indignity. For some weeks she refused to see her lover, but finally was reconciled and married. * * * How shall a mother teach her children—boys as well as girls—these all important things?"

Physical Culture is published monthly at one dollar per year, 29 e. 19th street, New York City.

RADICAL THOUGHT FROM A CONVENTIONAL SOURCE.

The following, entitled "The Great Leap in the Dark," is from the Saturday Evening Post:

The young man in Pennsylvania who is bringing a breach of promise suit for $5,000 against his ex-lady-love pleads his cause eloquently, but scarcely in a manner to bring conviction. "I have spent considerable money in giving her a good time. Too many girls become engaged in order to have a good time, and after they tire of the novelty they break the engagement. She threw me over without any reason."

On this man's own testimony it is hard to agree with this last assertion. One of the things a girl likes least in a husband is an idiot, and what else can one call a man who, to save outlays in ice cream and buggy rides, would tie himself for life to a woman who does not love him? If all her worldly goods were but five thousand dollars and thirty cents, she would look like the thirty cents in refusing to pay the five thousand. The fact of the matter is that breach of promise cases, even when brought by the woman, are fast becoming a thing of the past, and with the best of reason.

Past generations, it is possible, thought of marriage as a woman's great and only vocation, and considered that a broken engagement was not only a loss in itself but a handicap for the future, in that it was supposed to brush some of the bloom from maidenly innocence—innocence being sadly confused in their philosophy with inexperience. But nowadays a girl is no longer looked at askance who remains single; and our philosophy of the heart is becoming at least tinged with sanity.

It is a difficult business, this marrying and giving in marriage. Emotionally and physiologically, the proper time to marry is still sixteen. But intellectually (and financially) it is oftener thirty. The ideal husband or wife is the one who combines the heart of adolescence with the wisdom of maturity. How solve the problem? Experientia docet! The broad jumper tries many a preliminary run before taking the surest leaps. And shall one be denied the same careful preparation for the great leap in the dark? The truly wise and wholesome human being begins falling in love at three, or thereabouts, and should be encouraged to continue until, so to speak, the vaccination takes. Of course, an engagement is a serious matter. Broken engagements will always be most serious. But they are never really tragic: and the man or woman who wins a mate with large wisdom and experience in the ways of the human heart has abundant cause to congratulate himself.

THE DYING YEAR.

Before this number of The Morning Star reaches its readers our old mother earth will have reached and passed the point in its annual journey round the sun, known as the Winter Solstice, which term, as all our readers know, means "Sun Stand." That is, the earth reaches a point in its orbit at which the sun ceases to sink lower towards the southern horizon at midday, and seems to remain stationary so far as its southern "declination" is concerned; then, two or three days later, it begins perceptibly to return northward towards the zenith.

Of course this phenomenon is visible only in the northern hemisphere of the earth's surface. In the southern hemisphere the reverse of this takes place. There is a Solstice, a Sun Stand, but it is a mid-summer instead of a mid-winter solstice. The sun ceases to advance toward the zenith and begins slowly to decline at midday, towards the horizon, until in six months more, or on the 21st of June, it will have reached its winter solstice for the southern hemisphere, and the summer solstice for the northern hemisphere.

Those of our readers who happen to know that Lucifer's editor was a teacher in public schools for more than twenty-five years of his life will perhaps pardon this recursion to pedagogics. Our attention is usually so closely riveted upon matters that concern our relation to mother earth that we forget all about our relation to the great central orb, from which heat, light and life are alike derived—our great father, the Sun.

Yes, it is well for us, as I think, that these milestones—solstices and equinoxes—exist in nature, and that our attention is thus diverted, for a time at least, from such subjects of thought as the battles of ballots and of bullets, that are fought to decide who shall be greatest among us; who shall rule and who shall serve, on this third or fourth class planet called Earth. The contemplation of, the study of, "Man's place in Nature," would help, as I think, to give us juster, more rational as well as more humane views of life, as well as more exalted, more elevated and more elevating ideas in regard to the cosmos, the universe, of which we are integral parts.

Apropos to this little pedagogic talk about astronomy the writer of these lines would send to all who take interest in Lucifer's welfare:

A hearty Christmas greeting, and also best wishes for a happy and prosperous New Year.

SEX RADICALISM.

Subscriptions for the booklet, "Sex Radicalism," by Dora Forster, continue to come in, but not as rapidly as could be desired. We ought to have at least three hundred copies engaged before the work of printing and binding is begun. As before said, the price will probably be 25 cents per single copy or six copies for one dollar. Please let us hear soon, from all who would like to have one or more copies of this exceptionally fine series of essays, for home use or for distribution as presents among friends.

MONOGAMIC MARRIAFE—AN ILLUSTRATION.

BY JOHN VINTON POTTS.

My Dear Mr. Moses Harman: Yours of the 8th inst. is just at hand. It is kindly and appreciative; and your explanations are satisfactory.

There are some things in your paper I admire, as the spirit of free expression you advocate, and the right of every human being to be well born. But we may not agree as to methods of securing desirable ends. And there are some things in your paper at which I am horrified! To me it is amazing to what extremes men and women will go on the sex question!—the most sacred relation in life, and yet the most abused. The remedy lies in proper Instruction, Restraint, not suppression, and Direction. There is a Divine Ideal. To this we must come. Liberty and not license in lust is the key to the solution of the Problem of sex relation. A woman is not a slave in her normal state, nor are all men fools. But there are fools on both sides of the house.

On the basis of free and fair discussion you may continue my subscription to Lucifer.

But I am a monogamist. I think monogamy agrees with Nature, Reason, Revelation and Experience. Louis F. Post, in "The Public," has recently in my judgment, argued this case well and conclusively. His series of articles deserves publication in book form.

The ideal home, and the aggregate of human happiness lie in monogamous relationship. The history of the world, I think, proves this, Promiscuity is abnormal. The contrary has never been demonstrated, except in fiction. An ounce of fact is worth tons of fiction.

I am the third in a family of ten children by one father and one mother. So I am told. I think I have good reasons to believe the statement, though I cannot swear to the facts in court, as I wasn't by when some of the more important circumstances occurred. But we were brought up together in the belief of these facts—that we were the children of one father and one mother, and that we ten were full brothers and sisters, six boys and four girls. Seven of us are still living. Ann died in infancy; William at twelve, and Charlotte, a few years ago, at a ripe age. My parents both lived till the children were grown, and settled in life, the youngest married with two children. Father died first. Mother lived a healthful old age, as erect and brimful of life as a romping girl of eighteen years, till her last sickness. There is not an invalid or a fool, or abnormal in the family. Physically we are a vigorous race. I am in my sixty-ninth year, and I think I am well kept for a man of my age. Yesterday, I read and wrote from 4 a. m. till 9 a. m., when I took breakfast; then walked a mile, put up a cord of four foot wood, till 5 p. m.; then walked back a mile; visited a friend with a large family, where I took supper, retiring about 9 p. m.

Having had a nourishing sleep, I am now writing this letter at 4 a. m. of the above date. My senses are all acute, except that I have worn glasses since I was forty years old. With care, I may round out a century. What I am doing any of the other six in the family living can equal in their respective lines of work. We all believe in and practice monogamy, and this personal history is given simply as an illustration.

We are one instance of many millions.

North Robinson, Ohio, Dec. 10, 1904.

REPLY.

The writer of the above article is a clergyman by profession or vocation, also an editor, or at least has been such, as shown by a bound volume of "The Monograph," a monthly journal with his name as editor and publisher. From press notices quoted in this publication I infer that Mr. Potts is a man of influence, respect and honor in his town and county. I mention these in explanation of the apparent prominence given in Lucifer to one who confesses himself "horrified" at seeing "some things" in our paper. Space is too limited to justify giving much of it to those who are wholly out of sympathy with the general purpose for which Lucifer is published, knowing full well, also, that the great majority of those who assail our motives and our methods would not extend to us a like courtesy in their papers or their pulpits, and that they would do nothing to sustain the paper whose doctrines and methods they condemn.

Rev. Mr. Potts is not one of these. Evidently he wishes to pay for the privilege of being heard through the mediumship of Lucifer's columns. He has been a paying subscriber for some months and simply asks a fair share of space with other subscribers and supporters.

As compared to many of our opponents Mr. Potts is fair and courteous. As for instance, compared with the editor of the "News Letter," San Francisco, whose personal attack upon myself and the paper I represent, was republished in these columns about a year ago; also, as compared to a more recent attack printed in the columns of the "Public School Journal," Nov. 15, '04, Cincinnati, Ohio, the publisher of which journal (a large and apparently influential publication) printed therein two columns of what might truthfully be designated a tirade of personal abuse and misrepresentation of the work and aims of Lucifer. It may be all right with these people to make the statements they do on hearsay evidence—the writer of the attack signs his name "Piute Jim," which seems to be the nom de plume of a prominent writer in the "Household Club" Department of the School Journal, it may be all right to assail the character and work of persons unknown to them, on hearsay alone. "Piute Jim" confesses that he never saw a copy of Lucifer, never saw its editor and adds "I trust my friend, and he in turn trusts his memory for the simple facts,"—but if such writers and such journals are an honor to journalism and to manhood and womanhood, then I for one have yet much to learn in regard to journalism, and also as to what constitutes honor among men and women.

Returning from this digression to the matter in hand, it seems, in the first place, that a little definition of terms would not be amiss. Brother Potts evidently considers that there are but two methods of sex-relationship, "monogamy" and "promiscuity;" he himself defends monogamy and, by implication, makes the charge that Lucifer's editor and contributors defend promiscuity.

Monogamists may rightly be divided into two classes—First those who advocate voluntary monogamy, and second, those who uphold compulsory, law-enforced, or authoritarian monogamy. If I mistake not the majority of Lucifer's readers and supporters belong to the first of these classes. They believe in and practice, as the highest and best ideal, "one woman to one man, and one man to one woman;" this arrangement to last as long as love sanctions the union. But they are opposed to all meddling by outside parties. They want no priest or magistrate to give them permission to live together, nor judge to give them permission to separate when love ceases to hold them together.

This is voluntary monogamy. The other kind needs not to be described. It means in short, that the church, or state, or both, must give permission to unite and live as sex partners. It means that state and church hold a prior right, a right of "eminent domain," so to speak, over the reproductive organs and capabilities of women and men, and especially of women, and that if sex-association occurs between two persons of opposite sex without "license" from one of these authorities, then such association is "whoredom," "concubinage," "fornication," "adultery" or "prostitution," no matter whether love sanctions the union or not.

Against such assumption of authority Lucifer's writers and readers, without exception almost, are in a state of revolt, open or secret. If they conform to custom, if they submit to law, canon or statute in this regard, it is not from any respect or love for the law, but simply to save themselves from persecution or prosecution, or both.

With that old bachelor apostate from Judaism to Christianity, named Saul of Tarsus, commonly known as "Paul the Apostle to the Gentiles," our friends and helpers believe it right that "each should be a law unto himself," or herself, in matters of religious belief and religious observance, also in matters of food and drink, and also in matters of sexual companionship, or love relationships. With Herbert Spencer, also, they agree that each and all should have the right to do as they please so long as they do not invade the equal right of others.

As to "promiscuity:" The dictionary meaning of this word is "common," "indiscriminate," etc. It means without selection—"first come first served," so to speak. In any of these senses the word promiscuous does not apply to Lucifer's writers and readers, so far as I know.

But while the word promiscuous does not apply to Lucifer's friends it must not be inferred that they are all monogamists—voluntary monogamists. Some of them believe that select variety in sex associations is better, more rational, more physiologic and hygienic; more distinctly human, than is monogamy, whether temporary or life-long.

The space of this reply will not allow further elaboration. For myself I can only say that I do not dogmatize. I am not an oracle, on this subject or on any other. I am simply a student, a pupil, in life's great school. I refuse to be tagged or labeled, whether in matters of religion, of politics, of economics, and least of all do I submit to a tag or label in regard to that most important of all human relationships, the sexual, except, perhaps, to admit that I am a Libertarian, not a "libertine," in the common acceptation of that word. I believe in Liberty, first, last and all the time—equal liberty; non-invasive liberty; liberty joined to and with an intelligent sense of responsibility for one's acts.

With Macauley I would say, "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty," not more law.

With Carl Heinzen I would say, I believe in "Free Love," and with him I would add, "This term is tautological, since there can be no love that is not free. As well speak of wet water or hot fire." Hence I prefer the phrase, Freedom in Love, rather than Free Love. If any one chooses to call me a "free lover," in the true and only scientific sense of these words, I shall not object, but inasmuch as so many people associate licentiousness and "promiscuity" with this term I prefer, as before said, not to be tagged, even with this the most honorable of all possible names.

"Freedom" and Love! add one word more—Wisdom, and we have a trinity, a creed that surpasses all others.

Freedom, Wisdom, Love, let these guide; "these three and the greatest of these is love"—paraphrasing the words of that greatest of all the Christian oracles and propagandists, quoting from the best of his letters, that known as "First Corinthians," xiii chapter and 13th verse.

LUCIFER'S HELPERS.

During the month that has passed since last credit this office has received special aid from the following persons:

Lydia R. Todd, $2; J. Warner Mills, $5; Mrs. M. B., 70c; W. H. Breeze, $1; E. Humbert, $1.25; Robert Nargaug, $1; O. B. Smolensky, $1; Ella Kautz, 20c; Lena Selde, 10c; James Beeson, 65c; F. E. Leonard, 50c; Henry C. Roberts, $1; Dr. Sarah Boland, 12c; W. W. Carter, $1; Mary M. Harrington, 12c; Joseph Bean, $1; Ira Culp, 25c; A. Whiteman, $1; Louis Roser, $1.

Again, thanks, good friends, for co-operative aid. Most of these helpers sent names to whose owners they wished to have LUCIFER sent, for a longer or shorter term. Those who failed to send the names are requested to do so as soon as possible.

SUBSCRIPTIONS AND RENEWALS.

Many of our subscribers and helpers do not need to be reminded that LUCIFER'S continued existence depends mainly on prompt remittals and on new names to the list, but lest any should forget, this paragraph is here inserted. It is expensive and troublesome to send out statements to such as fall into arrears, and therefore we ask all our subscribers, whether regular or "trial," to note the number written or printed on the wrapper of their paper, and if not convenient to pay now they will confer a favor by notifying us by postal whether they wish to have the paper continued to their address. It is very desirable that we begin the new year with a clean balance sheet, and, as just intimated, our hope of making such clean balance depends mainly upon our subscribers and patrons.

NEW BOOKS.

From the far off Antipodes comes "Love's Way to Perfect Humanhood." While some of our readers may be disposed to doubt if anything good can come from a land settled a century or two ago by English "convicts," I do not hesitate to say that no book of greater value to the earnest thinker and worker has reached this office within the year now closing, than is this unpretentious yet very neatly printed and bound volume. The book is written and published by one of LUCIFER'S old-time subscribers and helpers, Agnes Benham, of Adelaide, South Australia.

The "introductory" begins with this question:

"Is there any subject under heaven so close to our interests, and so important in its bearings upon our health and happiness, and the whole conditions of our very existence, as the question of the right relation of the sexes and of the propagation of children that may be truly called well born?"

Continuing the author says:

"Looking at the far-reaching and vital issues involved, one would think that all sources of knowledge would be laid under contribution for our help—that all the lessons that could be gathered from past history, all the facts of our present every-day experience, would have been long ago gathered and compared, and the highest reasoning and most careful deductions of science employed and brought to bear upon them, that we might have all the information possible to be obtained, and then that our best efforts should be made to have it, not widely alone, but universally disseminated, whatever else was neglected.

"But no! The generality of us are not yet awake, by any means, upon this point, though here and there some are stirring themselves. But what fatal charm has held us back so long? Is it indifference to the highest and holiest theme that could possibly engage our attention? Or is it some superstitious notion that 'delicacy' forbids the general instruction of the people upon these most vital topics? And yet, for lack of such knowledge the people perish! For want of this knowledge our girls drift into matrimony with the haziest notions, as a rule, of what marriage means, physically, mentally or spiritually. They know what it means socially—that is all."

Elsewhere, in speaking of the opposition encountered by those who propose changes in our codes of sex ethics:

"But who imagines our laws are perfect now, or thinks that marriage laws are less imperfect than the rest? Yet any attempt to alter them, on the part of advanced thinkers and reformers, is met not only by opposition but by mud-throwing and execration from those who ought to know better.

"There is a reason for this, and it is that marriage is the last stronghold of superstition. [Italics mine.—M. H.] On all other subjects, religion included, we allow free discussion. Only with regard to marriage do we say that it is dangerous to entertain any thought of liberty—dangerous to throw the searchlight of free investigation and of inquiry upon the matter."

From these extracts the reader will be able to form a fairly correct estimate of the drift and scope of the book, "Love's Way to Perfect Humanhood." Price is not given; presumably it is one dollar, American money, and so sure am I that any one sending a dollar to Agnes Benham, Grenfell street, Adelaide, South Australia, will be pleased with the book and satisfied with the price, that I hereby offer to pay back the dollar and take the book, paying all postage or express charges on the same.

VARIOUS VOICES.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

Dr. L. Mann Hammond, Rosedale, Kan.—"I see the voting is still going on, and it is with bated breath that I open every number of LUCIFER, for fear that its head (in more ways than one) is gone. And when I see LUCIFER at the top I breathe free, and think perhaps this voting is only to get opinions. Surely it is none of our business. The editor has stood responsible for his child ever since it was born, even to the extent of going to prison for it. And now I think it is very poor taste to ask him to change his chosen name. If without any pressure from the outside he should change the name, that also would be none of our business. For myself I should feel lonesome without the old heading LUCIFER. It is said "a rose by any other name," etc., but why any other name? I have seen but one suggestion that I like, and that was to call it The Biologist." It is now more of a scientific paper than one of protest, as at first. It has evolved from the old lines sufficiently to be called "The Biologist," should the editor so wish. But I should dislike to see the present name cut in two—"Lucifer" dropped and 'Light Bearer' stand. Let there be a marked change, a name that would show the evolution, as the Caterpillar next comes Butterfly. In the case of the paper, 'Biologist.'

"But LUCIFER suits me as long as the present editor lives. Would like to see it in magazine form, as it is better to preserve, and a monthly. Shall always take it, no matter at what price, but think it will reach more people at one dollar per year than at two dollars. Will take two copies.

Time changes all things, but LUCIFER deserves to stand as long as Moses Harman stays on earth, and then others may carry on the same work under another name. That would then be their business."

F. W. Mitchell, S. D.—"'Concentration?' Yes, I say publish a paper devoted exclusively to Free Love. Do not antagonize the politician, the Christian Capitalist, nor any creed, body or thing, and I predict in a short time preachers will be advocating free love in the church pulpits. People need it. If there were such a paper published right now, I would not hesitate to spend $20 and more to lay it before preachers, politicians, bankers, merchants, in barber shops, everywhere I felt it would do good * * * Love and happy homes is what all crave. Yes, people need it! * * * Already Freethought has become so respectable preachers are preaching it and declare the discovery belongs to the church. Same will soon be true of Free Love, and all radical studies, including anarchy. But one thing at a time goes best. Yes, concentrate in one publication which will reach the bankers and all the richest and most influential people of the land. These feel the need of love and happy homes the most of any. These make the world move * * * Macfadden, (N. Y.) evidently has injected much of LUCIFER into his publications. He says much of sex, you notice. * * * I am impressed that rich men suffer more the spirit of discontent, that they crave more love and happiness than do any other class. I repeat, you dish them up an exclusive Free Love paper, right away, quick!"

W. S. Hammaker (late President International Freethought Congress, St. Louis), Pratt, W. Va.—"Please forward a copy of LUCIFER as sample, with prospect of patronage. Have read part of a copy some time ago. Send any other sample Freethought literature you may have no other use for. We are confident Freethought is growing, but unfortunately it is kept too much a secret. Such are the usage-education, slavery to superstition, etc., that men and women just go on without frank confession of Freethought—living hypocrites but not bad. * * * We must hope and be patient; and work as best we can toward the mark of higher development; more real education; a code of moral ethics well defined, that would have the courage to destroy the bad and endeavor to build up the good."

Ida M. Brooks-Miller, Lewiston, Idaho.—"I just got the first number of LUCIFER that I have seen for some time, and appreciate it doubly, because I have just cut loose from the fetters of conventionality which have held me in bondage and blighted my life so far. I think the article by Dora Forster is the best thing I ever read, and I deeply regret that I have missed the other articles of the series, and hope you will bring it out in pamphlet form. I shall want to handle it. It seems to me as I consider this subject that if freedom in love were in practice there would be very few or no sexual crimes, and that there would be much less poverty. Am I right? I am obliged to suspend my paper (The New Life) until I can recuperate my funds, but will go on with it as soon as I can."

DON'T FORGET, good friends all, to send us names of independent thinkers—New Thought people, Rationalists, Agnostics, Spiritualists, Materialists, Free Religionists, Theosophists—to whom we may send sample copies of Lucifer, "Son of the Morning," "Herald of the Dawn," "Harbinger of the Good Time Coming"! We have some hundreds of copies printed extra each issue for the express purpose of sending them out as samples, and, if possible, we want several hundred new names each week, or each fortnight. And if with the names a few postage stamps can be sent to help pay the cost of wrappers and of mailing, all the better, but send the names!

"I hold it that a little rebellion now and then is a good thing, and as necessary in the political world as storms in the physical. Unsuccessful rebellions indeed generally establish the encroachments on the rights of the people which have produced them. An observation of this truth should render honest republican governors so mild in their punishment of rebellions, as not to discourage them too much. It is a medicine necessary for the sound health of government."—Jefferson (Letter to Madison, 1781).

ADDRESS 500 FULTON STREET, CHICAGO, ILL.

KAREZZA. Ethics of Marriage. Alice B. Stockham, M. D., author of Tokology. Karezza gives a high ideal to parental functions and pleads for justice to the unborn child. Karezza is really a supplement to Tokology and elucidates a theory of marital relations, which leads to individual growth and a closer bond of union, the practice of which at all times gives complete control of the fecundating power. Karezza controverts the prevailing ideas of baseness and degradation associated with the sexual nature, makes a plea for a better birthright for the child, for a controlled and designed maternity and aims to lead individuals to a higher development of themselves, through a knowledge of their creative powers. Karezza is the product of knowledge and experience, and is presented to the world with a deep abiding faith, that its teachings will lead individuals to purer lives, to right understanding and appreciation of the sex functions, to intelligent control of propagation and finally through right adjustment in most sacred relations, to the ideal marriage. Levant cloth, prepaid, $1.

FREE PRESS. Arguments in support of demurrer to the indictment of M. Harman, E. C. Walker and Geo. Harman, under the Comstock law. G. C. Clemens and David Overmeyer. 20c.

BORNING BETTER BABIES. Through regulating reproduction by controlling conception. E. B. Foote, Jr., M. D. 25c.

HILDA'S HOME; A Story of Woman's Emancipation. Rosa Graul. With Macaulay, Rosa Graul would say, "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman will be less loving and lovable, or that man will be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish. 426 pages. Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

IN BRIGHTER CLIMES; or, Life in Socioland. Albert Chavannes. A story of what life may be under better conditions and guided by higher ideals. 25c.

MAGNETATION AND ITS RELATION TO HEALTH AND CHARACTER. Albert Chavannes. With fine portrait of author. 25c.

LOVE'S COMING OF AGE. Edward Carpenter. This is a book with which few will wholly agree, but which nearly every one can read with profit and enjoyment. The subject is the relation of the sexes in the past, present and future, and it is treated with absolute frankness and fearlessness by a writer who unites a broad outlook, a strong grasp of his subject and a charming literary style. The following table of contents will indicate the line of thought followed by the author: The Sex Passion; Man, the Ungrown; Woman, the Serf; Woman in Freedom; Marriage, a Retrospect; Marriage, a Forecast; The Free Society; Some Remarks on the Early Star and Sex Worships. Notes on the Primitive Group Marriage; Jealousy; The Family; Preventive Checks to Population. The book is printed on extra book paper and handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

MARRIAGE IN FREE SOCIETY. Edward Carpenter. One of the best short works on the subject. Daintily printed. A charming little gift book. "Love is doubtless the last and most difficult lesson that humanity has to learn; in a sense it underlies all the others. Perhaps the time has come for the modern nations when, ceasing to be children, they may even try to learn it." 25c.

PRIESTLY CELIBACY. Prof. A. L. Rawson. Together with The Incoherence of Transition (E. C. Walker), Motherhood in Freedom (Moses Harman), The Greatest Sin (an allegory, R. B. Kerr), and Jealousy, the Foe of Freedom (Oscar Rotter). 25c.

STUDIES IN SOCIOLOGY. In four parts: I., The Law of Happiness; II., The Law of Individual Control; III., The Law of Exchange; IV., The Law of Environment. Albert Chavannes. 25c.

THE PRODIGAL DAUGHTER; or, The Price of Virtue. Rachel Campbell. Together with Legal Wifehood (Lucinda B. Chandler's), Life's Gifts (Olive Schreiner), and Marriage—What It Was and Is; Will the Coming Woman Marry? 25c.

TOKOLOGY. A book for every woman. By Alice B. Stockham, M. D. Illustrated. Tokology teaches possible painless pregnancy and parturition, giving full, plain directions for the care of a woman before and after confinement. The ailments of pregnancy can be prevented as well as the pains and dangers of childbirth avoided, and women need not go down to death giving birth to children. English, German or Swedish. $2.25.

OUR WORSHIP OF PRIMITIVE SOCIAL GUESSES. E. C. Walker. Contents: Love and Law; The Moloch of the Monogamic Ideal; Consents; The Continuity of Race-Life, and Tyranny; Food and Sex Fallacies, a Criticism; When Men and Women Are and When They Are Not Varieties; The New Woman; What Is She? What Will She Be? The Blight Hiding Behind Its Own Mistakes; Bishop Potter's Opinion of Divorce; Love; Its Attraction and Expression; Social Is She an Honest Girl? Lloyd, Platt and the Pitiful Facts; Social Radicals and Parentage; Anthropology and Monogamy Love and Trust Versus Fear; Reflections upon Reading William Platt's "Women, Love, and Life." 15c.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S GOSPEL OF DOOM. Lady Florence Dixie. A strongly worded protest against Theodore Roosevelt's pronunciamento on "Race-Suicide." 5c.

THE CURSE OF MATERNITY. From the French of Henry Fevre. Together with How to Escape the Curse (Jonathan Mayo Crane), Woman's "Duty" to Bear Children (E. C. Walker), True and False Morality (C. L. James), Love's Law (William Francis Barnard). 25c.

THE ORIGIN OF THE FAMILY, PRIVATE PROPERTY AND THE STATE. Frederick Engels. Chapter titles: Prehistoric Stages; The Family; The Iroquois Gens; The Grecian Gens; Origin of the Attic State; Gens and State in Rome; The Gens Among Celts and Germans; The Rise of the State Among Germans. 217 pages; bound in cloth. 60c. Postage, 5c.

THE NEW HEDONISM. Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old asceticism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new Hedonism says: "Be happy and you will be virtuous." In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediæval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproducing function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; twelve copies, 50c; single copy, 5c.

THE RIGHTS OF CHILDREN. R. B. Kerr. Together with What Are Women Here For? (E. B. Foote, Jr., M. D.), The New Martyrdom (Lillian Harman), and The Will, from the French of Guy de Maupassant. 25c.

THE ABOLITION OF MARRIAGE. John Beverly Robinson. Together with Isabel's Intention (Mariette). Reminiscences of Berlin Heights (A. Warren), and The Sexes and Love in Freedom (Oscar Rotter). 25c.

VICE; ITS FRIENDS AND ITS FOES. Edwin C. Walker. Contents: Brotherhood of Man; The Recognition of Facts; Folly of "For Men Only"; Definition of Vice; Horrors of Prostitution; Abnormal Sexuality; Errors of Fathers, Mothers and Teachers; Persecution Does Not Reform; Prostitution and the Crusaders; The "Spoiling of the Heathen"; What Are the Effects of Raids and Crusades? The Economic Side of the Problem; Party Politics in Vice Crusading; In What Does Prostitution Consist? Some Causes of Prostitution; Two Kinds of Prostitution Compared; The Opponents of Divorce; "Purifying" the Tenements; Action for Advanced Women. With appendix: The Wanderings of a Spirit; Our Fair Civilization, the Folly and Cruelty of It All. 15c.

WOMAN AND HER RELATION TO THE CHURCH OR CANON LAW FOR WOMEN. Harriet M. Closz. A succinct statement of the position to which women were doomed by the Church Fathers and authorities. Every woman should possess a copy. 10c.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A Primer of Sexual Rationalism. Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages. 10c.

A TALE OF THE STRASSBURG GEESE. R. B. Kerr. Together with The Strike of the Strassburg Geese (C. W. Coolridge), A Traveler's Tale (R. B. Kerr), The Cat's Story (Emile Zola). 25c.

LOVE'S WAY TO PERFECT HUMANHOOD.
By Agnes Benham.

An excellent companion for Carpenter's "Love's Coming of Age." The keynote of the book, found on page 76, reads thus: "The soul itself is pure and heavenly, and if at the moment of conception and through the prenatal time when it is building its earthly house it could meet with entirely responsive and congenial conditions, then would the earth be peopled with a race of gods." Price $1. Published by the author, Agnes Benham, Adelaide, South Australia. Orders may be sent through this office.

"THE TRIUNE MARRIAGE."

Said Love to Wisdom: "Let us join our hearts in fondest tether,
To work and play in sun and shade, to live and die together."
"To die?" said Wisdom. "Ah, my Love! grim death must pass us by,
I know that oft your life is short, but Wisdom cannot die."
"Immortal Wisdom," then said Love, "Farewell, so let it be,
For bonds are death to me I know, though Wisdom holds the key."
"Stay, stay, dear Love," a sweet voice cried, "True wisdom has inclined thee,"
And I am Freedom, take me too, and then no chain will bind thee."
"Yes," without Freedom, I am naught," said Wisdom, "I agree;
Come Love, and take a hand of each, and make us one, not three."
The three fair spirits linked in one, the earth began to move—
Turned over by the trinity of Wisdom—Freedom—Love.

LIMITED MARRIAGES.

Hitherto the writers for Lucifer have had little to say in regard to the phase of marriage reform advocated by George Meredith, of England. The reason of this silence is explainable, in part, by the fact those who read Lucifer and those who write for its columns, have little patience with and for compromise measures in the realm of personal liberty. Lucifer readers and writers want no limits to liberty except such as equal justice requires, and hence they think such measures as those prescribed by this noted English author simply a waste of time—which means a waste of life itself.

But now, as a part of the review of the year's progress in the field of radical reform, it is well perhaps to give a little of Lucifer's limited space to a presentation of the favor in which Mr. Meredith's scheme of limited marriage is being received on this side the Atlantic. A fairly good sample of the utterances of the popular American press on this subject is the following from the "Boston Courier" of October 1, 1904:

"The latest contribution to the discussion of one of the most pressing social problems of the day is that which is made by the English author, George Meredith, in his plea for the recognition by law of marriages for limited terms. He would have the marriage contract made terminable at the expiration of a specified period, husband and wife then being free to separate and form other alliances, 'the state enforcing a provision of money during that period to provide for and educate children.'

"While we may doubt that this remedy for unhappy marriages and the scandal of divorce is seriously proposed—and, indeed, no one can reasonably expect its adoption in what we call civilized countries—is it really such a shocking departure from the conditions which our present laws establish for the shifting of matrimonial bonds? Mr. Meredith proposes that the law shall provide for possible dissatisfaction in the menage and allow separation by mutual consent without making a fuss about it. Our marriage laws refuse to recognize in advance any such contingency; they make the marriage contract permanent according to the terms upon which it is entered; but our divorce laws allow the annulment of the contract, with separation and remarriage, in case the contracting parties are willing to undergo the inconvenience and bother of the process. Is there any moral difference here? Indeed, is there any practical difference?

COMPARED WITH COMMON LAW MARRIAGE.

"Take the situation as it exists to-day in the State of New York. That State has always recognized what are called 'common law marriages;' that is, unions without license or ceremony in which the man and woman have represented themselves to be husband and wife and have lived together in that relation. So many adventuresses took advantage of this system to claim alimony from men who repudiated such connection and to claim dower in the estates of rich men who had lived and died as bachelors, that the Legislature recently undertook to cure the evil. The law which was passed provided that such common-law marriages should be valid from their inception if within six months a certificate was filed in the County Clerk's office bearing the signatures of both parties. If no such certificate was filed, the arrangement should not be a valid marriage.

"So in New York to-day we have a system of limited marriages established by law. That is, without filing the certificate, without any ceremony, without license or record, the marriage is perfectly valid for six months and the couple are man and wife in the eyes of the law. If they wish to part at the expiration of that period, they are divorced without any action of the court, for the contract which had been binding until then is suddenly made void from the beginning. They may then enter into a new contract with each other which will be binding for six months, or they may find new partners in the matrimonial game.

"This is even looser than Mr. Meredith's plan, since it makes no provision for children that may come of such a union. And in other States than New York the shifting of matrimonial bonds is made almost as easy, although the courts must act to make the separation legal. In Kentucky, Rhode Island, Louisiana, New Mexico and Wisconsin couples may secure divorce by simply living apart for a longer or shorter time, without the necessity of airing any unpleasant charges. And in forty-six States and Territories marriages may be dissolved on the merely technical charge of desertion.

UNIFORMITY DEMANDED.

"Unquestionably, a general reform is needed; but how is it to be brought about? Mr. Abraham H. Hummel, of New York, who has probably the widest reputation in this country as an authority on divorce, says in a recent magazine article upon this subject that the remedy must be found in uniform marriage and divorce laws throughout the country. But at the outset the difficulty seems insurmountable. Each State is zealous to retain its rights over its own citizens, and there is a widespread sentiment against any further centralization of government in Washington. If the States are to unite upon a common law, which law shall be taken to the exclusion of all others? Shall it be that of New York, which gives divorce on one ground alone, infidelity on the part of the husband or wife? There would be a howl of protest from nearly every section of the land. Thousands would come forward from other States to contend that a good woman should not be kept tied to a brutal man—one who habitually beats her and who must degrade her if she remains with him.

"'On the other hand,' says Mr. Hummel, what would leaders of thought in New York say to throwing open the doors of the Divorce Court so that any grievance that might be mentioned would suffice; bad temper on the part of the wife—incompatability, it is termed—abandonment, insanity, or any other reason, good or bad? I can imagine the fierce blasts from the pulpits, the ringing denunciation of the spellbinders during a campaign in the Empire State hinging on such a point.'

UNIFORMITY MORE IMPORTANT THAN HUMANITY OR JUSTICE.

"But in the question of a uniform law the first opposition would be the most formidable. Let an agreement once be reached for uniformity either through constitutional amendment or otherwise, and the terms agreed upon by the representatives of the people will probably be acceptable to the nation at large. If not, other changes may be made later; but now uniformity is more important than the details of a proposed law."

COMMENT.

Judging from the history of all the past, there is certainly much reason to fear that the "Courier's" prediction would be verified: "The terms agreed upon by the representatives of the people will probably be acceptable to the nation at large," no matter how much such agreement might violate the plainest principles of liberty and justice, for the preservation and enforcement of which principles it is supposed our present form of government was adopted a little more than a century ago.

No matter how unjustly, how secretly or corruptly a law may be enacted by the "representatives of the people"—falsely so called, since no man can honestly and truly represent any one but himself, especially in such a complex machine as a national government—no matter how corruptly such enactment becomes law of the land it is next to impossible to get it repealed. The people supinely submit to it, as to the inevitable and adjust themselves to the situation as best they can.

Witness as instances the Comstock postal laws, and the still later iniquity, the "anarchist deportation laws," under which the foremost writers and thinkers of the world would not be allowed to land upon our shores.

If ever there was a nation of law-worshipers the people of the United States are that nation. Hence it would seem that the only hope of successful resistance to the despotism of imperialism and autocracy, religious, political or moralistic, in this country is that which is made before the enactment of invasive laws.

Obsta principiis, says the Latin maxim—"Oppose the beginnings."

To resist successfully the beginnings of despotism it is necessary to know what freedom means. It is necessary to know what the so-called "inalienable rights" of man are. It is part of the work of Lucifer to show that the right to make and unmake matrimonial contracts without interference by church, or state, or nation, is one of the most important of all the personal or reserved rights of American citizens—female as well as male.

REPLY TO WILLIAM PLATT.

William Platt is "cute," and I have enjoyed the wit of his rejoinder, but as argument it is but a puff of scintillant dust, under cover of which the important things evanish.

If my purpose had been merely to flatter the sterilizers he would have cleverly turned my flank, but I am not in the least troubled that he gets my plain meaning. Let us go further, William Platt, and emphasize it, by saying that four-fifths of all women in civilized countries to-day (and men too) are, when viewed from the standard of even a not very high ideal, unfit for parenthood. This may be an exaggeration, but it will be hard for you to prove it such. If this is thinking badly of the race, so be it. I refer to the children, themselves, for my witnesses. The only thing that keeps the race from utter deterioration is that disease so kills off the weaklings, especially the babies—survival of the fittest is still working to save mankind.

I am no champion of the sterilizers. I am a champion of the children, and of the right of any woman to refuse motherhood who feels it best to do so. If sterilizing the seeds of life by sure chemical or mechanical means is the best she knows, or can use, I have no rebuke for her, but it is but a miserable makeshift at best, to which the fatal objection always applies that these means take all the poetry out of what should be the most beautiful act of life. The true ideal is self-control, and the transmutation of passion from the lower to the higher planes. But so long as most men hold self-control impossible and most women are subject to men, sterilization is valuable and necessary to prevent the propagation of the unfit. It is a means by which the weak may prevent their curse going indefinitely on.

The logic of my position is simply this: That the unfit should not permit themselves to become parents. The logic of William Platt's position is that any woman who refuses motherhood is a coward and false to her womanhood. But though he is a champion of courage, he will not stand by this when thus plainly stated. So he says if things are as bad as I say, "by all means let the wretched creatures sterilize." By so doing he gives away his own position and concedes mine. This concession permits any woman, who finds herself in one of my classes, to sterilize "by all means."

Really William Platt and I are for the same thing—we want better children. He has written some of the most eloquent books in the language in defense of his view, but we differ in that he champions the ways of the barbaric past. I those of the civilized future on whose threshold we stand. The barbaric past and its ways were all right in their time and place, but this is transition and the old ways are growing outworn.

Passion and instinct controlled life then and the hardships of savagery weeded out the unfit as fast as they appeared, but pain evolved reason and sympathy and new conditions arose. We are entering a cycle of sympathy and enlarged intelligence. Nowadays man defends himself cleverly against climatic hardship, war is reserved for the strong; the feeble and diseased are tenderly protected, kept alive, permitted to procreate. This last would mean ruin, if left unchecked, but Nature always evolves her own checks and to-day disease takes the place of war in decimating the feeble and the flabby.

Platt sneers at the cowardice of shrinking from pain, but that is precisely what pain is for, in the economy of the universe, to make us shrink from it till we evolve the reason that enables us to avoid or remove its causes. And by success in so doing we evolve confident courage. It is reasonable to shrink from pain, but, before reason was, instinct shrank from pain, and William Platt, himself, shrinks from it, and hies himself not so gaily to the dentist chair or the surgeon's table as to the sowing field of baby seeds. Pain is the parent of evolution. If inevitable it is brave to face it, accept it. If not inevitable it is wise to avoid it.

And pain in childbirth is not inevitable. The animal and savage mothers are usually free from it, because fit. Hardship provided by Nature made the savage mothers fit, and sound heredity and intelligent training can make the civilized mother fit.

Two great motives run through the world—the individual and the universal. These run through humanity also, as the individual and racial instincts—the one working for the individual as an individual, the other for the race as an individual. Apparently they are apart, and working against each other, but really (because, after all, all is one) they work together and for each other. They are in sex as everywhere else. On the lower planes the sexes come together, recklessly, thoughtlessly, seeking only personal pleasure, with no prevision of offspring. But as evolution proceeds there is more and more consciousness of racial need and responsibility and desire to use sex, or refrain from using it, in the interest of posterity, to aid instinct by reason in begetting a finer race. Against this Platt protests. He should realize that he is behind the times, and use his magnificent genius in the service of more modern ideals.

War made the savage the magnificent animal he is, but sympathy is evolving now and war must go. We want character now as well as physique, and character demands sympathy, and sympathy insists on kindness to the weak. Beside we find weakness evolves fine traits of brain.

Then two courses are open to us, either to let matters take their course, the feeble spawning like fishes and disease cutting all down to the surviving limit; or for intelligent science to take a hand and indicate who should and who should not procreate, leaving the individual and social conscience to co-operate in voluntarily keeping within the limit.

The first is Platt's plan, which in all cases will be abundantly tried; the second is my proposition, which need not too greatly terrify, for there is no fear that, under any conditions, intelligence and self-control and conscience in sex will swamp the world just yet.

The ignorant always shout when anything of this sort is proposed: "Would you mate men and women like cattle!" But nothing of the kind is advocated, but simply that science should select the fit, give them the fullest obtainable sex knowledge and leave them to mate themselves among their own. No coercion, either on those within or without, and no attempt to interfere with love anywhere, only the co-operative effort of the community to be wisely parental to the future.

All this Mr. Platt ignores, and you will find in all his books only a fanatical monogamy, jealousy, frenzied passion and conjugal recklessness in child bearing offered as the duty of the race. Just such a creed as Brian Boru might have sworn to.

And my fifth class of those who refuse motehrhood Platt ignores too, though these touch his original question. Let us ask him if a woman who refuses motherhood, because conscientiously convinced that her life can be better devoted to other ends, is better or worse than the mother of a large family?

J. WILLIAM LLOYD.

THE PARTNERSHIP OF JOHN AND CHARLES.

AN ALLEGORY.

John Bell and Charles Stone were boys together in their school life, and associates in the social circle of their home town. Gradually they became close friends and their youth passed in intimate and happy companionship. When they reached manhood they decided that it would be to the advantage of both to combine their property, their labor and skill, and form a partnership for the carrying on of business. They proceeded to draw up articles of co-partnership, pledging absolute fidelity to each other and lifelong continuation of the partnership. Custom settled the firm name.

They soon became owners of a factory for the manufacture of articles of domestic necessity and luxury. They prospered in business, and all went well for awhile. John was manager of the business in public, and secured and brought in the raw material, while Charles was factory manager and worked up the material into articles of household use.

After expenses were deducted the public and private earnings of the firm were placed in the bank or invested in real estate. John handled the money and made the bank deposits, but instead of depositing the money in the firm name he placed it in bank in his own individual name, and the deeds to real estate were made out in his own name instead of the firm name. Charles was aware of this but made no objections because such was the custom. Also his affection and esteem for John were very great and his confidence in him perfect. He had faith in him that he would do whatever was best for the welfare of the firm. Charles was busy with his private employments and gave little thought to public affairs.

The public and the law called John the sole proprietor of the establishment and head of the whole concern. Whenever Charles was spoken of he was simply called "John's helpmate." John assumed authority everywhere and claimed the credit and ownership of everything produced by the firm. Charles worked patiently on and said nothing. His moments were seldom idle and the success of the business was mostly due to his management and industry.

Still the partnership seemed to be a happy one. Apparently they enjoyed each other's society and when not employed in daily pursuits, they were wont to spend the time together in recreation, pleasure and physical exercises. They practiced together a certain system of exercises, and at first they both enjoyed them and the result was invigorating, healthful, congenial and harmless.

A few years passed smoothly away. The factory continued prosperous, and their personal companionship happy excepting a few disagreements, one of which was that John was inclined to overdo the practice of the physical exercise, and, as a consequence, Charles began to grow weary of it and desired greater moderation. John would not agree to this, and insisted that Charles accompany him as usual. Charles became more and more disinclined to participate in the exercises but was compelled to do so by the coercive measures employed by John. John did not use physical force but if Charles refused to go through his favorite exercise with him at the accustomed intervals he would become morose and moody, or would indulge in fits of anger and make many accusations and threaten to do many disagreeable things. This would cause Charles to yield. He also feared that if John did not get sufficient home exercise to satisfy him that he would go elsewhere to get it and would get into bad company and this would result in harm to them both.

Thus was Charles coerced into participating when he did not desire to do so. At length his health became seriously impaired by these exercises practiced unwillingly and beyond his strength. Also this treatment lessened his respect and affection for his partner.

In addition to his factory occupations Charles was an artist capable of producing pictures of high quality and value. These pictures were incidental and not one of the regular products of the factory, but were of much greater value than any of the factory products. Had it not been for the partnership these pictures would have belonged exclusively to the artist, but the laws governing the partnership gave the ownership of them to the legalized head of the firm, therefore from the commencement of their creation by the artist John claimed the ownership of the pictures, and when they were finished he inscribed his name thereon and claimed to be originator, producer and owner.

These claims were based upon the fact that he had employed a very few moments of his time and had furnished and placed on the canvas a very small portion of the priming coat of paint. Excepting this very small amount of material Charles furnished all; the canvas, the brushes, the paints, the talent, the skill, and the labor and many months of time.

Nevertheless John claimed the ownership and control of the pctures. This was a great injustice but a legal one. In spite of all this Charles would have been content and happy in his artistic employment had it not been for further grievances. Frequently while the artist was employed on a picture John would disturb and hinder him in a most unreasonable and shameful manner. He insisted upon placing daubs of the priming paint upon the partly completed picture, committing much havoc, changing the design of the artist, producing undesirable effects and wholly or in part spoiling the picture. He disarranged the brushes, injured the canvas, and compelled the artist to use such positions and light as were not conducive to the welfare of either the picture or the artist.

Charles became discouraged, and has now decided that he will paint no more pictures, and he cannot now engage in his artistic occupation in safety and comfort because of his impaired health, produced by the cause before referred to, and the injustice of being robbed of the ownership of his pictures tends farther to dishearten him. He has made up his mind that so long as he is bound to a partner and has not his personal freedom he will discontinue his occupation as artist for such artist must be free in order to maintain conditions favorable for success. He loves pictures too well to bring into creation those that are inferior to his ideal. He has decided that if he cannot produce a good picture he will produce none, and all well informed persons and lovers of art will concede that he is justified in so doing.

John still maintains the same opinion and course of action. He appears to be self-satisfied and well satisfied with society and customs in general. His regard for his partner remains about the same. His personal rights have not been interfered with by his partner nor his selfishness restrained, therefore his regard has had little cause for change.

Charles is still successful manager of the factory but he looks weary and worn and lacks the interest and energy of former years. His respect and affection for his partner have long ago departed, but for the sake of public opinion and private peace, he continues to patiently endure the partnership.

NEW YEAR'S GREETINGS.

A HEART TO HEART TALK.

In the dawning of the morning of another year, while Old Father Sol still lingers near the Southern Horizon, and while the living forces of Nature in the Northern hemisphere of the earth still sleep what seems the sleep of death; not as the "pastor of his flock," for I am not a shepherd and my readers are not sheep, but simply as a fellow-worker, a fellow-thinker, a fellow-ploughman in life's great field would I ask a minute or two of the kind reader's time and attention.

First, I want to say that speaking to crowds of people is not so satisfactory to me as is a private and personal conversation with one or two of like mind. If I could meet each reader separately, or if I could find time to write a personal letter to each, I would like to say something like this:

Happy New Year to you! May health, peace and prosperity be yours for the year just begun. To you as one of Lucifer's earnest friends and logical supporters I wish to recall a few of the events of the past year—a year of trial and of struggle, a critical year in the life of the little white-winged messenger, whose fate, as I take it, you feel an interest in not less strong and abiding than is my own. For a time last spring—quoting the language of Daniel Webster—the question of "sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish," seemed one of grave doubt and uncertainty, but thanks to the energy and generous help of a score or two of the old-time co-workers, the crisis was safely passed, and though appearing only fortnightly instead of weekly, Lucifer's subscription list has gradually gained since the resurrection in May last, until now, at the opening of the year 1905, the number of actual paid-ahead subscribers to Lucifer is considerably larger than for several years, if not larger than ever before during the quarter of a century of its existence. Most of the old debts have been paid, and those still unpaid are due to friends whose interest in Lucifer's success is equal, perhaps, to that of the few more immediately responsible for the monthly payment of its bills, and hence some of us are looking forward with renewed confidence and hope to the work of the coming year.

As the result of the active and generous support of those whom no difficulties could discourage the question of Lucifer's continued existence seems to be definitely settled in the affirmative, and now it only remains to settle the question of right methods of work, and also the question of aims or objects of work.

At the time of the aforesaid resurrection in May last, in compliance with suggestions from many friends, requests were printed in Lucifer asking for opinions regarding name of the paper, also place of publication, frequency of issue, price per year, etc., and for more than six months answers to these questions have been coming in. If Lucifer had been a local sheet, and if it had been the individual enterprise of one man or of a small company of persons, the discussion in the paper of these and kindred questions might justly have been regarded as a mistake, if not an inexcusable waste of time and space. But when it is remembered that Lucifer is now in reality what Brother Wastall hopes it will become in the near future—as the result of greater concentration on the sex question—a world paper, so that its readers and supporters are found in every clime and in all the five grand divisions of the earth's surface; and when it is remembered that a very large proportion of these readers and supporters have given freely of their earnings to keep the light of Lucifer burning, the propriety and justice of giving time and opportunity for all to be heard upon these questions of change, is at once apparent, as I think.

As illustrations of the wide field now occupied by Lucifer, and of the keen desire to see every issue and to see it promptly, and also to obtain copies of our pamphlet literature, I will venture to give brief extracts from a few letters recently received.

Bodh Raj Shah, of Langhoi, Punjab, India, says: "I regret that you are sending me Lucifer in monthly wrappers instead of fortnightly, as you publish it. I wish the paper could be published weekly. Dear sir, you cannot know how lonely I feel without Lucifer. It can be better imagined than described. So do not send two numbers together every month, but send regularly as soon as published. I liked some of the books you sent me very much, such as 'Motherhood in Freedom,' 'Marriage,' 'Institutional Marriage,' 'Vice: Its Friends, and Its Foes.' Send me books of your own selection to the amount of $2, and some papers which you think good, and I will pay promptly."

Brother Bodh Raj Shah asks a number of questions that are not easily answered, among others this:

"How can we practicalize these liberal views in a country so conservative as India, where legal and institutional prohibitions are so insurmountable, in the way of Sexual Freedom? Can you suggest anything practical for the benefit of my children?"

I have sent to him a bundle of books and papers that will, I trust, be of value in solving the questions asked.

Under date Dec. 13, Fred. Weeks, Beckenham, England, writes:

"Lucifer 1026 and 1027 just arrived. I have not received No. 1025. Please send me this. Am very glad you propose to reprint the articles on 'Sex Radicalism' in pamphlet form; I herewith enclose postal money order for one dollar—four shillings—as subscription for copies of the same as soon as printed. I congratulate Dora Forster upon her courage, clearness of insight and statement and healthy views of the subject."

And again a letter comes from Brother A. Wastall of London, South Africa, to say that if we will send him what we "can spare of back numbers and advertising slips," he will "advertise in one or two of the most likely publications [of South Africa] that sample copies can be obtained" by writing to him, adding, "all subscriptions you receive from this sub-continent you will then know are chiefly the result of my efforts. Should you agree with me that this will be a sound method of propaganda, it will give me pleasure to put it into effect just as soon as I receive your parcel. Will send along what I can at present spare to cover your cost, early next month."

As one of the practicable methods of success Brother Wastall's proposal strikes me very favorably. If others, both in America and in the British colonies, care to help Lucifer in this way, we will gladly send back numbers and advertising slips.

The hour for shutting off the supply of copy having arrived, I close abruptly by saying that the booklet "Sex Radicalism" is in the hands of the pressman and will probably be ready for delivery to subscribers in less than a week from this date. Those who would like their copies bound in cloth are requested to notify us at once. The cost of bound copies will probably be 50 cents each. Price of the paper covered edition will be 25 cents or six for one dollar.

Again thanking all who have remembered Lucifer and its needs during the holiday season, and again soliciting fraternal co-operation in all possible ways, I close as I began, with a hearty New Year's greeting to all of Lucifer's readers, writers and helpers.

BOOK REVIEWS.

"God and My Neighbor" is the title of a powerful work by Robert Blatchford, recently published by Charles H. Kerr & Co. (Chicago). "The present volume," explains the publisher, "is the outgrowth of a series of articles in the Clarion of London which attracted universal attention among both the partisans and the opponents of the church in England. Many and heated were the controversies stirred up by these articles, but Blatchford's bitterest opponents did not fail to recognize and acknowledge the exquisite literary style and the admirable temper displayed in his side of the discussion. . . . I recommend this book by Robert Blatchford as one of the clearest, sanest, most sympathetic and most helpful discussions of the deep and vital problem of religion that it has ever been my good fortune to read."

The following paragraphs, taken almost at random from the book, are, I think, fair specimens of the work:

"Three of the greatest blessings men can have are freedom, liberty of conscience, and knowledge. These blessings Christianity has not given, but has opposed."

"Christianity is a fabric of impossibilities erected upon a foundation of error."

"God made a bridge—built it Himself, of His own materials, to His own design, and knew what the bearing strain of the bridge was.

"If, then, God put upon the bridge a weight equal to double the bearing strain, how could God justly blame the bridge for falling?

"The doctrine of Free Will implies that God knowingly made the Serpent subtle, Eve seductive, and Adam weak, and then damned the whole human race because a bridge He had built to fail did not succeed in standing.

"Such a theory is ridiculous; but upon it depends the entire fabric of Christian theology.

"For if Man is not responsible for his acts, and therefore cannot sin against God, there is no foundation for the doctrines of the Fall, the Sin, the Curse, or the Atonement."

"There is no Heavenly Father watching tenderly over us, His children. He is the baseless shadow of a wistful human dream."

"The greatest curse of humanity is ignorance. The only remedy is knowledge.

"Religion, being based on fixed authority, is naturally opposed to knowledge."

"There is no such thing as human infallibility. There is no finality in human knowledge and human progress. Fixed authority in matters of knowledge or belief is an insult to humanity."

"The object of life is to improve ourselves and our fellow-creatures, and to leave the world better and happier than we found it."

The book is well bound in cloth, contains 200 pages, and sells for $1.

Lois Waisbrooker has a new edition of her "Woman's Source of Power," revised and enlarged. It is well gotten up both in its mechanical execution and in the thought it represents. Quoting from the title page:

"I hold it as an axiom that we cannot desire that which the Universal Life does not hold for us, when we know how to take it. Otherwise we should have capacities, which the universe could not fill—a manifest absurdity."

"Love attraction, the feminine principle, is the builder of all living forms."

The closing paragraph of the book is in these words:

"Science will yet justify those who are demanding the freedom of woman—of love. Love, the feminine principle—Love, the builder—the creator, has been so enslaved and abused, that when we talk of love in freedom, all sorts of degradation are imagined, but those who see how much is involved will not—cannot recede from the position taken, and neither contempt nor persecution can prevent Love's claim from being finally recognized."

Mrs. Waisbrooker's many friends will be glad to know that she still lives and that she is still working along the lines of the reform to which she has devoted the best years of a long and unusually industrious life. "Woman's Source of Power" is published by the Alliance, Denver, Colo.; price 25 cts. each.

Believing that Mrs. W. is largely dependent upon the sale of her books I hereby offer to see that she gets full price for all copies of this very excellent booklet that may be ordered through Lucifer's office.

One of the later additions to the already voluminous literature of dietetic and hygienic reform, is "Return to Nature," translated from the German of Adolph Just, by Benedict Lust, editor of the "Neuropath and Herald of Health," and director of the American Jungborn, Bellevue, N. J. "Return to Nature" is a finely printed and bound volume of over 300 large pages, illustrated, and devoted to the "gospel of good health," through conformity to nature's methods, as against the artificial modes of living now so nearly universal in all countries called civilized. A few paragraphs from the chapter headed "When shall we Eat?" will show the author's style and trend of thought:

"In nature everywhere we find that the animals feed chiefly in the evening. Every forester knows that game eats but little, during the day but towards sunset it begins to eat vigorously. . . . Beasts of prey eat only in the evening or at night. In the menageries, too, the chief feeding time is in the evening.

"Every one knows, too, that beer and wine taken in the morning, have a much worse effect than in the evening. The 'eye opener' is much more injurious than the 'night cap.' The many banquets and drinking bouts that people indulge in at night, could not be indulged in in the morning. . . . The body does not digest food readily in the morning, the stomach is more active in the evening and at night. . . . Very little ought to be eaten in the morning. It would be best not to eat anything until noon. Fasting until noon, which is in accordance with nature, is not at all difficult. At noon it is also well to be careful not to eat too much (as little as possible).

"But in the evening one may unhesitatingly partake of a full meal. . . . My patients have always claimed that they never experienced such unmistakable good results from the treatment, as when they fasted until noon. In taking a course of treatment, therefore, I emphatically recommend fasting until noon.

"If one has not already eaten too much during the day, a hearty supper before sleeping causes no distress or disturbance. Regularity in one's habits, in diet, and the observance of meal times is of importance."

Notwithstanding the apparent effort of the author to connect hygiene with theology I cordially recommend the book, "Return to Nature," to all who would learn the newer and better way of living. The price is not given; for further information address the publisher, Benedict Lust, 124 E. 59th street, New York City.

But while calling attention to later books on hygiene and dietetic reform it is not well, nor right, that the older works in the same line should be neglected. I have long had it in mind to say a few words to our readers in praise of what I regard, all things considered, the very best medical work ever offered to the American public. It is called the "Home Cyclopedia of Pouplar Medical, Social and Sexual Science," by Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., of New York. This volume of more than 1,200 pages embraces the well known and very popular "Plain Home Talk," by the same author, besides more than 500 pages of additional and up-to-date matter—the "20th Century Edition."

Instead of giving more of my own opinion in regard to this remarkable work I prefer to quote from the opinion of a learned and famous London physician, Dr. G. M. L. Strauss, who closes a somewhat exhaustive analysis of the Cyclopedia in these words:

"Dr. Foote treats of all parts, organs, and functions of the human body alike, and of their derangements.

"There are two sets of organs and functions in the human body—the one devoted more specially to the preservation of the individual, the other more exclusively to the preservation of the species. Both sets are equally important one would think, or if there be a difference of degree, it surely must be held to preponderate on the side of the latter. Yet strange to say, perhaps, a somewhat tyrannical custom, based upon spurious shamefacedness, or an overwrought sense of innate modesty, has, to a great extent at least placed all allusions to things more or less immediately connected with this latter set under a kind of social taboo. I know this is treading on dangerous ground. I will therefore content myself here with referring the reader to Dr. Foote's reasons as stated in his own preface, why he has made no marked distinction in his book between the treatment severally of the two sets.

"Parents living in a city with dirty and dangerous backslums in and about it will, if endowed with an ordinary share of common sense, surely endeavor to the best of their ability to instruct their children, who may at some time or other have to pass through such objectionable places, as to their nature, and to warn them against the danger lurking in them. Yet will they, from mistaken delicacy and shame, send forth their children on their way through the infinitely more dangerous backslums of life—without instruction, without warning."

This greatest of all reform medical works—so far as I know—is profusely illustrated, and notwithstanding the fact that it is a whole library within itself it is sold at the astonishingly low price of two dollars, carriage prepaid, so that there would seem to be no valid reason why every family, except the very poorest, should be without this exhaustless fund of useful knowledge.

LUCIFER'S HELPERS.

Since last issue went to press several friends have remembered to send to this office New Year tokens of good will, and by so doing have enabled us to send out tokens of good will to hundreds of those who never saw copies of Lucifer, the Light-Bringer—"Son of the Morning," "Herald of the Dawn." Some have sent names of their friends as "trial" subscribers for three months; others for a whole year. This, as we take it, is the best of all the methods of helping onward the work to which Lucifer is devoted. The next best, perhaps, is to send presents to friends in the shape of books and pamphlets, such as, "Love's Coming of Age," "Love's Way to Perfect Humanhood," "Hilda's Home," "Karezza," "Cityless and Countryless World," "Motherhood in Freedom," "A Freeman's Creed," "Woman's Source of Power," "Primer of Sex Rationalism," "Sex Radicalism," "Ijain, or the Evolution of a Child's Mind," "Sexual Physiology for the Young," "Prodigal Daughter," and others too numerous to mention.

Among those who have remembered Lucifer's work in some of these ways, within the past fortnight, are the following:

W. W. Miller, 75c; J. H. Strong, 10c; W. P. Beardorff, $1; Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., $10; John Knott, $1; Frank L. Poland, 85c; W. E. Tobey, $1.50; Geo. E. Bowen, 20c; Amy F. Odell, $1; Parkhurst Douglas, 50c; E. M. Dewey, $1; Louis Roser, $2.75; E. G. Earle, $1.

These are not all; in the hurry and worry of getting business in good shape for the coming year it is more than probable that several names have been omitted that should receive public mention.

LOIS WAISBROOKER'S WORK.

Whether right or wrong the writer has always rated Mrs. Waisbrooker as the ablest champion of woman's cause in her sexual and economic relations. Convincingly plain; clear in depth; apt in illustration, and right to the point, so that a child may understand her utterances both written and spoken, as expositions of existing conditions, and the vital necessity of complete freedom of her sex from every bond destructive of motherhood—with the resulting possibilities of a nobler order of humanity than earth has ever known, are, in my humble opinion, unsurpassed in educative utility, and should be widely circulated.

But, of course, this is not saying that I necessarily endorse everything she has promulgated in the pursuit of her life mission.

On the contrary, for instance, I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that the central, attracting, all-creating and controlling love principle is mainly if not exclusively feminine, while the masculine is a cruder external form of "force"—if that is what is meant—and consequently that woman should be the "ruler" (!) of the home and the "social sun." This looks not only like a "holier than thou" but a suspicious kind of queencraft in the garb of love, notwithstanding all disclaimers. This practice on the part of some of our most gifted women in this liberative movement, of publicly proclaiming their own sex as essentially of finer, higher, more spiritual organization—this imitating poor undeveloped masculine nature by going to the opposite extreme of a conceited superiority, so abhorrent to some of us, as equally indicative of the hated rulership by divine right, is to say the least very poor policy—a repellant, weakening, retarding feature of propagandism.

But it matters not what my particular views on the above points may be, for, apart from all objectionable matter, with special reference to her latest publication I concede the immense value of her work. To my mind she has struck deeper, truer, more effectively than any other of her compeers I know of in this field of labor.

Buy her books everybody. They are veritable eye-openers, or rather brain-openers. They are like a new revelation to most people, I ween. Help this almost octogenarian, the still undaunted, unflinching and determined pioneer heroine and prophetess of the better time coming; help her to prolong her stay and extend her sphere of usefulness. Do it now, and more directly, by sending for her last work, "Woman's Source of Power," published by The Alliance, 1459 Broadway, Denver, Colo. Price 25 cts.; 5 for $1.00.

All women should ponder her suggestions of the necessary and most effective first steps bearing on the practical solution of the difficult problem they must sooner or later deal with.

RIGHTS OF CHILDREN.

We have left chattel slavery behind, and are now in the midst of economic slavery, but many are and have been trying to lift mankind out of this, too. A number have advocated the freedom of women to vote while yourself and others have worked hard to free woman from sex slavery as well as economic bondage.

Now all of this only takes in about one-half of the population. The other half is the children. I believe in freedom for children. I have seen but little said for them, except that they have a right to be born well, as set forth in Lucifer and a few other papers of equally high rank. Now, after they are born is the most realistic time to them. Just as important is every little happening to them each day as are the trials and triumphs of us grown up children. If we should feel insulted to have the lash applied to us because of failure to perform a certain amount of work laid out for us, or if it was not done quite in the manner an overseer would like to have it done—mayhap one of us might laugh too loud or stay out too late or what not; then why not persons a little younger with sensibilities a little finer be more insulted, more indignant over the application of the lash to their more tender skins?

We who believe in freedom for ourselves should grant it to others. Freedom is as sweet to a small child (if not more so) as to an adult. If anyone has a right to freedom it is a child. If we wish to enslave anyone let us take someone our size, not a helpless child. A great many men would fight an ablebodied man who would mistreat a cripple but those same men are so calloused by present conditions that they wouldn't look to one side on hearing the screams of a child being flogged by its parent. A child has no vote it may cast for freedom, no court of appeals from which to hope, no dollars to bribe a judge or jury to alleviate its troubles, no strength to fight back, no state lines to cross over into free states. It can't purchase its freedom. No one writes or speaks for it. It has no chance in this world for freedom except to work out its sentence for a period of 18 or 21 years as the case may be. The hope for a change of masters is denied it. The same master reigns who happens to be the father. And then perhaps worse yet, it has two masters—the father and mother plus the grown up sisters and brothers in many instances. The injustice of it all so exasperates the inward child that it becomes the little lying, thieving, cruel, sneaking, dare-devil imp we see every day around us.

ECHO FROM CALIFORNIA.

I have read with the greatest interest the article entitled "Sex Radicalism" in Lucifer, Nov. 16, by Dora Forster. While women and men, the world over, are frittering away time and energy in contending with non-essentials, with effects and not causes, it is good to meet those who fearlessly, simply and most practically point out the real issues of the times in language clear and euphonic. This question of sex (of which breeding is the most important) is the vital point, the pivot, on which rests and revolves all else. In this short article we will eschew all details as to the causes which led woman to realize the fact that she has a right to own her own person. The cause rested in man himself. Now the only way for woman to assert and maintain this right, is by refraining from motherhood. For barring this, woman is as free and independent as man.

But here arises a question of both physical and moral import—the means to procure this freedom. Millions of women in their effort to obtain it, jeopardize their health, their sanity and even their lives. For every practice violating natural laws, is followed by the most disastrous consequences, physical and moral. Prevention and taking of life by artificial means, is a crime to yourself, to the unborn, and to all sense of what is right. But why this martyrdom? Because woman, even in her degradation has an ideal, and she suffers and heroically yields to a supposed duty.

No, sisters, let all of us who have arrived at a consciousness of our prerogatives, express our convictions in our lives, by taking the one way, the one exit out of this labyrinth, and that is to absolutely refuse any relation whatsoever, with the man (no matter how much bound to him by church, law, or our own feelings, the man whom we know and deem unworthy of so grand a communion.

And from this subject naturally flows the tobacco and liquor problem, which make or mar the man; which make him either worthy or unworthy of respect and love, and of being companion to woman, and being either capable or incapable of doing his share in bringing into the world offspring truly in the divine image.

Man, of himself, will never do away with these curses which deface him, and destroy what otherwise might be the beautiful work of Nature. It remains with us women to crush the head of the serpent and restore to man his lost prestige; and one powerful factor in the cause is for us to unionize and hold aloof from the man who will not help to free himself from these evils, and who will not help to stamp them out of existence.

Men, who make laws to protect crime and who jail and hang the criminal, we women of the 20th century refuse to be the wives and mothers of such.

VARIOUS VOICES.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

Sarah J. Boland, M. D., Kansas City, Mo.: "Enclosed find a few stamps and two names, hoping these two and many others may find as much of interest and education in Lucifer as I have found."

Wm. W. Martin, Mableton, Ga.: "I vote: Name—Emancipator; Form—Magazine; Time—Weekly; Contents—Omnium gatherum; Price $2 per annum. . . . Three cheers from 'Mrs. W. M.,' and one hundred and one for Lydia R. Todd. Love and kind regards for all the Freedom in Love company."

R. F. Hyland, age 75, Corvallis, Ore.: "Lucifer is yours, and no man has any right to dictate in name, in frequency, shape or price, unless he has spent more time, money, thought, worry and imprisonment than you have, which is impossible. Let A. Westall run a paper on his grand line of thought. I am glad and happy to see Lucifer."

Ed. W. Hays, Brooklyn, N. Y.: "I am not pessimistic but sometimes can't help thinking that men like you are throwing pearls to jackasses. Kindly send me 'Love's Coming of Age,' by Carpenter."

[I want to pay my debts. If no one had scattered literature such as I am sowing, and such as Edward Carpenter has sown, I should probably never have known the joy that comes from a sense of intellectual freedom.—M. H.]

Walter Hurt, Cincinnati, O.: "Do you ever get discouraged and weary of well-doing? Will 'Liberals' ever learn the meaning of Liberalism? Can the self-enslaved ever be taught the alphabet of freedom?"

[The thorny road I am traveling is to me the "line of least resistance." Some one must stand on the picket line and be shot at from foes in ambush else there can be no advance of the main army of progress.—M. H.]

S. L. Webb, St. Albans, W. Va.: "I can not do without Lucifer. The name is all right for me. A few persons here have objected to the name because they imagine that it suggests the 'Wicked One,' as they in their ignorance express it. You are engaged in a grand work, and from present progress large numbers of so called 'society people' will soon come to us. I feel that too much praise cannot be given Lucifer for its bold stand in dealing with 'Sex Reform.' If we had more Lucifers throughout the United States we could soon correct the iniquitous marriage laws now upon the statute books of the land, and which may be said to be responsible, in a degree, for so many suicides and insane persons—after failing to obtain the desired relief in the divorce courts."

D. R. Dunlap, Westboro, Mo.: "I am 65 years old; read and study everything on every question, and want to say to you, after careful study of the pamphlet 'What the Young Need to Know,' that its price is far above rubies. How such a pamphlet can be sold for ten cents is beyond my reason. Much shaffy literature is sold on the market for five times the cost of this booklet. I bid you God speed. Go on in the good work."

W. E. Tobey, Little Rock, Ark.: "I am not in favor of changes, either in the name 'Lucifer,' or in the frequency of issue. As to enlarging; with your able correspondents, would judge the paper could be increased in size and the subscription price should be at least $1.50 per annum of 52 issues. I have had some correspondence with M. Wastall and agree with him entirely on the sex question, the most important of all subjects."

Aurin F. Hill, Boston, Mass., 12 Isabella street: "Satan entered Paradise to teach better things. Tact is an important factor in education. Success in education is to get students to thinking. To do this, have departments to please the outsiders. I enjoy publications with departments and am instructed by them. Success attends those publications that allow most liberty and most variety in ideas. Success has never come to a people, as a whole, from exclusive devotion to one idea. Success is gained by an all-round system of education. Specialists are failures, to themselves and to society; they are liable to become lunatics in their latter days."

James B. Elliott, secretary Paine Memorial Association of the United States of America, Philadelphia: "Enclosed find one dollar for renewal of Lucifer. Please order Bradford (Eng.) 'Truth Seeker' with the same, and let me know the amount additional. . . . What Paine did for political and religious liberty, Harman is doing for social freedom. . . . It seems to me so strange that in the United States there are so few admirers of Paine that care to have historical justice done to his work and memory. Neither of the Freethought Congresses that met at St. Louis passed a word of protest against the omission of his name or portrait at the exposition. I have no further news from Voltairine de Cleyre except that she is slowly improving but is allowed no visitors. Wishing you all a Merry Xmas."

Mrs. Minnie Wenning, Sheridan, Mich.: "I am glad some of your readers were shocked by my declaration of ownership. I shock my own people and the conventional people around me, often, by expressing my views on sexual, political and religious questions. Some people call me an anarchist, some an infidel, but these names don't phase me. I go right on living my life in my own way, doing all the good I can to every one, even if I am such a wicked creature as not to believe in the present marriage system. I am just beginning to live. I am out of the old hell of superstition. I know I have a right to live my own life in my own way as long as I am not infringing on the rights of others. I am fully satisfied that nine out of every ten of the marriage bonds in this little town would be dissolved this very night if it were not for public opinion or religious superstition. These married couples are not staying together for the benefit and joy they are giving each other, but they simply exist together, simply tolerate each other. Everything proves this to be true. Men and women live lazy, listless, joyless lives together. This isn't as it should be. There is something wrong when such is the case."

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS.

ADDRESS 500 FULTON STREET, CHICAGO, ILL.

LOVE'S COMING OF AGE. Edward Carpenter. This is a book with which few will wholly agree, but which nearly every one can read with profit and enjoyment. The subject is the relation of the sexes in the past, present and future, and it is treated with absolute frankness and fearlessness by a writer who unites a broad outlook, a strong grasp of his subject and a charming literary style. The following table of contents will indicate the line of thought followed by the author: The Sex Passion; Man, the Ungrown; Woman, the Serf; Woman in Freedom; Marriage, a Retrospect; Marriage, a Forecast; The Free Society; Some Remarks on the Early Star and Sex Worships. Notes on the Primitive Group Marriage; Jealousy; The Family; Preventive Checks to Population. The book is printed on extra book paper and handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

THE NEW HEDONISM. Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old asceticism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new Hedonism says: "Be happy and you will be virtuous." In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediaeval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproducing function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; twelve copies, 50c; single copy, 5c.

THE RIGHTS OF CHILDREN. R. B. Kerr. Together with What Are Women Here For? (E. B. Foote, Jr., M. D.), The New Martyrdom (Lillian Harman), and The Will, from the French of Guy de Maupassant. 25c.

KAREZZA. Ethics of Marriage. Alice B. Stockham, M. D., author of Tokology. Karezza gives a high ideal to parental functions and pleads for justice to the unborn child. Karezza is really a supplement to Tokology and elucidates a theory of marital relations, which leads to individual growth and a closer bond of union, the practice of which at all times gives complete control of the fecundating power. Karezza controverts the prevailing ideas of transgression associated with the sexual nature, makes a plea for a better birthright for the child, for a controlled and designed maternity and aims to lead individuals to a higher development of themselves, through a knowledge of their creative powers. Karezza is the product of knowledge and experience, and is presented to the world with a deep abiding faith, that teachings will lead individuals to purer lives, to right understanding and appreciation of the sex functions, to intelligent control of propagation and finally through right adjustment in most sacred relations, to the ideal marriage. Levant cloth, prepaid, $1.

FREE PRESS. Arguments in support of demurrer to the indictment of M. Harman, E. C. Walker and Mrs. Harman, under the Comstock law. C. C. Clemens and David Overmeyer. 20c.

HILDA'S HOME; A Story of Woman's Emancipation. Rosa Graul. With Macaulay, Rosa Graul would say, "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman will be less loving and lovable, or that man will be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish. 426 pages. Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

IN BRIGHTER CLIMES; or, Life in Socioland. Albert Chavannes. A story of what life may be under better conditions and guided by higher ideals. 25c.

MARRIAGE IN FREE SOCIETY. Edward Carpenter. One of the best short works on the subject. Daintily printed. A charming little gift book. "Love is doubtless the last and most difficult lesson that humanity has to learn; in a sense it underlies all the others. Perhaps the time has come for the modern nations when, ceasing to be children, they may even try to learn it." 25c.

STUDIES IN SOCIOLOGY. In four parts: I., The Law of Happiness; II., The Law of Individual Control; III., The Law of Exchange; IV., The Law of Environment. Albert Chavannes. 25c.

THE PRODIGAL DAUGHTER; or, The Price of Virtue. Rachel Campbell. Together with Legal Wifehood (Lucinda B. Chandler's), Life's Gifts (Olive Schreiner), and Marriage—What It Was and Is; Will the Coming Woman Marry? 25c.

TOKOLOGY. A book for every woman. By Alice B. Stockham, M. D. Illustrated. Tokology teaches possible painless pregnancy and parturition, giving full, plain directions for the care of a woman before and after confinement. The ailments of pregnancy can be prevented as well as the pains and dangers of childbirth avoided, and women need not go down to death giving birth to children. English, German or Swedish. $2.25.

LOVE'S WAY TO PERFECT HUMANHOOD.
By Agnes Benham.

An excellent companion for Carpenter's "Love's Coming of Age." The keynote of the book, found on page 74, reads thus: "The soul itself is pure and heavenly, and if at the moment of conception and through the prenatal time when it is building its earthly house it could meet with entirely responsive and congenial conditions, then would the earth be peopled with a race of gods." Price $1. Published by the author, Agnes Benham, Adelaide, South Australia. Orders may be sent through this office.

FRIENDSHIP—SONG.

Come, here's to the heart that hath tasted of gladness,
And here's to the heart that hath wandered in sadness,
Loving and serving, gaining and choosing,
Happily squand'ring, suddenly losing,
Time of all gladness, the sharpened awakening.
Folly—then sadness and ever—leave-taking.
All friendship is sorrow,
Because of the morrow,
The bitter to-morrow.

A health to the heart that hath known the world's troubles,
And health to the heart that hath met them as bubbles;
There's pleasure in loving, and joy in the semblance,
Which lasteth till cometh the sudden remembrance;
When friendships are bound by the heart's gentle weaving,
And comfort is found—then cometh the leaving.
All friendship is responsive,
Because of the morrow,
The bitter to-morrow.

LOVE AND LUST.

By JOHN VINTON POTTS.

True love abides.
It is not fickle as the tides,
'Tis like the rocks;
Two human hearts it interlocks.
They thus remain
Through all life's joy, through all life's pain.
But lust is passing as the wind;
It makes no blessed impress on the mind;
'Tis fitful as the morning breeze
That plays among the forest trees.
There is no love in lust.
'Tis not allied to trust.
It seeks new subjects, as, in whims,
It over other faces skims.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF DIVORCE.

George Meredith, the distinguished English novelist and friend of free womanhood, has startled the conventional world of smug and negative goodness by suggesting—nay, predicting, that marriage should, and ultimately will be, contracted for limited terms, says 10 years, with the privilege of renewal or dissolution as the parties may elect; they being held by the state in any case for the care of possible children.

In putting forward this idea Mr. Meredith admits that it would "make a row." It seems to have done it.

It is interesting to observe the sources from which, in consequence of this prediction, the vials of wrath are poured out upon the head of the great English writer. Singularly enough, on this side of the water the noisiest chorus of indignation seems to come from a section from which it might be least expected—the middle states tributary to Chicago.

The Chicago Inter Ocean seems to express the general sentiment when it says that the readers of Meredith's works have always had an instinctive notion that something was wrong with the man, and now they have proof of it.

"Here we have it!" exclaims the editor. "Here we have what moves every decent owner of a volume of Meredith to cast it into the fire as something that it would be shameful to be detected with, because the work of a man who would degrade the most solemn act of human life into a mere commercial transaction!"

Really, now, would he?

I have on my table an article written during the Episcopal convention in Boston, at which convention the engrossing and particular subject of concern was the subject of divorce.

It seems that there are at present over 35,000 divorced men and women in Chicago—the home of the Inter-Ocean; that one person in every 230 in the city of Louisville has been divorced; that the divorce courts of Ohio are so crowded with business that after disposing of many hundreds of cases very recently, their dockets are still full to overflowing. Indeed the statistics of divorce throughout the country indicate that this "most solemn act of human life" is regarded as binding only by those who have made no considerable mistake in choosing their life-partners.

Then why should we not consider Mr. Meredith's prediction with reason rather than with prejudice? The suggestion he makes is not new. Many things have been written by thoughtful people at different times in praise of limited marriages.

The idea does not demand that the married couple shall necessarily separate at the end of the stated period. It simply offers a way of escape without scandal if, after a reasonable period of time, discovery comes that a mistake has been made.

A man and woman seeking marriage cannot know absolutely whether there exists between them that compatibility of disposition which alone can make a life existence together happy or even tolerable.

Marriage, in all cases of subsequent divorce, is certainly not a life contract but a time contract. It is limited to no term of years however, at the termination of which the relation may amicably and reasonably end. It is limited by the passions and desires and mis-chances of the daily life, and its dissolution involves all the horror and misery incident to the dragging of unhappy homes into the public arena for the scandal-mongers to feast upon.

Marriage for life, yea or nay, gives people no honorable way in which to correct their mistakes without odium. Hence they have either to brave public disapprobation or to live a life of hypocritical pretense.

No really moral person will choose the latter alternative; hence in all unhappy marriages the balance of moral dignity must reside in those who separate. There is no lower degradation possible to a woman than submission to the embraces of a man she has ceased to love, and any law or custom compelling such a relation cannot stand the light of moral criticism.

The matter of divorce appears a tangled and involved question so long as we attempt to solve it by conventional canons of morality. We must go deeper and inquire what it is that makes canons of morality.

This is the point at which the philosophy of Socialism helps to illumine the matter.

All social laws are but the reflex and consequence of economic conditions. The world has always considered that thing moral and just which is consonant with the laws respecting private property. The present form of marriage cannot escape this classification. Woman has been private property; she is still private property, and the laws which bulwark conventional marriage bear ample testimony to prove this immoral fact.

It is the fast-growing disregard for private property, and its unjust assumptions of right, that is slowly liberating men and women from the intolerable conditions of unhappy marriage. Men and women are finding a new ethic in the belief that it is immoral for one human being to possess any proprietary right in another. Hence the growing so-called "evil" of divorce, is but the collision of a higher ethic with a lower; the manifestation of health coming out of disease. The process of readjustment; wholesome and full of promise.

But one cannot understand this while ignorant of the principle of economic determinism. Conventionally considered it looks as if people were morally deteriorating; as if they were coming to look with levity upon solemn vows and obligations, and hence are neither as upright nor as wise as their grandfathers. But when we follow these conventional canons of morality back to the economic basis from which they spring, and which determine their existence, we see at once that the breaking of unnatural marriage relations is a logical and necessary consequence of the growing economic emancipation of woman.

As soon as woman can gain an honorable independent living she is no longer for sale in the matrimonial market. She waits for love to prompt her. She does not have to barter her liberty for board and clothes.

The example of such independence makes a profound impression upon those of her sisters who are married to inferior, dissolute or immoral men, and they come to see that it is their economic dependence alone which compels them to submit to the daily insults which such husbands habitually heap upon their defenseless wives.

Thus the freedom enjoyed by some women begets the desire for freedom in others, and gradually there arises a critical feminine habit of mind which passes the matrimonial system in review and finds that it needs modification. The hour is already on the dial when, if society will not consent to modify the marriage system, then the best women, the women who should be wives and mothers, will hold aloof in disdain from a compact which does not respect their rights as individuals. It is no other factor than the beginnings of economic independence in woman that is thus determining her attitude toward the time-honored institutions she has been trained to respect. She does not yet recognize this wholly; she does not yet see that her new independence must lead her to demand a form of marriage that shall recognize woman as a free individual; not as a chattel slave.

Whether the plan of limited marriage contracts suggested by Meredith will be found worthy of consideration when the hour upon the dial strikes, no one can say; but to whine and vent one's spite against any plan of amelioration put forward in good faith is only to fling ink-pots at the sunrise.

There is a growing conviction in men and women alike that there is really no valid reason why two people should go on living together in mutual dislike and misery simply because they have made an unhappy choice in one another; and when men and women both are economically free it will be found that all the bourgeois arguments that are now used to perpetuate such relations will appear fanciful and absurd.

MONEY OF PRIVILEGE.

I noticed in your issue of Oct. 12th, a short article by Celia B. Whitehead of Denver, Colo., and allow me to say that I was not only pleased but surprised at her remarks on the subject of "Money of Privilege." I would say further that she has a clear head on the financial question, and I wish to corroborate her position by the following statement, which I shall designate as the greatest, most gigantic swindle in the history of our country.

When the war of 1861 was forced upon the North by the slave-holding interests of the South, an overruling Providence called that grand statesman and patriot, Abraham Lincoln, to preside over our country, and as an enormous sum of money was required to preserve the Union, Abraham Lincoln in his wisdom ordered $60,000,000 U. S. Treasury notes issued, making them receivable for custom dues and interest on the public debt.

Such monies were full legal tender and worth more at the Bank of England than American gold coin. The monied men of Wall Street saw at once that if such a policy was continued that they could have but a poor chance to speculate on the exigencies of the war, so they elected to Congress 179 bankers who passed a law inaugurating the issuing of National bank notes, which were not a legal tender; the result was a depreciation which dropped at one time to 40 and 50 cents on the dollar.

The monied men, with their gold running as much above par as the National bank was below, exchanged their National bank note at par for U. S. bonds, thereby obtaining a $1.00 bond for their 40 or 50 cent dollar.

It was the cleanest cut steal ever concocted in the world's history.

The following statement will show up this enormous swindle:

Amount of National indebtedness Nov. 1st, 1896..	$1,785,412,640.90
Amount paid for premium on loans and bonds..	119,863,408.00
Total interest paid from 1864 to 1897 inclusive..	2,623,766,239.00
Paying the bonds in gold by the passage of the "Credit Strengthening Act," estimated at....	500,000,000.00
Estimating future interest at one-half the amount already paid	1,311,883,119.50
And we will have paid the enormus amount of	$6,340,925,407.40

We have paid up to 1896, $3,243,629,647.00.
Estimated amount to pay, $3,097,295,760.40.
Yet the original debt was only, $2,680,647,869.74.

Had this amount been issued in legal tender money, as Abraham Lincoln proposed, there would have been $76.85 per capita in circulation instead of the $68.00 we had in National bank rags worth less than 50 cents on the dollar. Had Lincoln's policy been carried out, when the war closed the only debt would have been the currency in circulation which the people must have had to transact the business of the country.

Such is the history of one of the most gigantic steals on record.

Very truly yours,

G. MAJOR TABER.

A FREE WOMAN'S ANSWER TO NEMO.

Poor Nemo! [See his "Questions for the Free Woman" in No. 1028.] What a lot of despicable males you must associate with.

It would be a very silly woman that would choose for a sex mate an entire stranger. The free woman will want to know a great deal about the man—his views, his physical condition, his intellectuality, etc. She will then pause and consider the probable consequences, and be guided accordingly.

I would not care to gain the love of a man that did not love freedom more than me—a man afflicted with that most detestable disease called jealousy; a disease that all truly free men and women are ashamed to be infected with. Nor could I love a man who is afraid of public opinion; a man that caters to Mrs. Grundy.

I would not give up my freedom for any union. I do not think unions of any kind desirable.

Now, dear Nemo, the next time one of your male friends brags about his affairs with women, just give him a hard "swat on the gob!" It will develop your muscle, and maybe, make a man of you. And if you know of any male bernacles that want to prey on feminine nature, give them the address of Lydia R. Todd, 765 Utah Street, San Francisco, Calif.

FREEDOM, LOVE, LIFE.

I saw a woman sleeping. In her sleep she dreamt Life stood before her and held in each hand a gift—in the one Love, in the other Freedom. And she said to the woman, "Choose!"

And the woman waited long, and she said, "Freedom!"

And Life said, "Thou hast well chosen. If thou hadst said, 'Love,' I would have given thee that thou didst ask for; and I would have gone from thee, and returned to thee no more.

Now the day will come when I shall return. In that day I shall bear both gifts in one hand."

I heard the woman laugh in her sleep.

—"DREAMS," BY OLIVE SCHREINER.

FRUIT GROWING IN MISSOURI.

I think pressure irrigation—water in abundance and at your finger's end; touch a button and it rains—will certainly put this vicinity far in advance of any section for the progressive fruit grower. In view also of the altitude the delightful climate, richness of soil—no manure or commercial fertilizers needed for the full development and perfection of fruits and vegetables as our nineteen consecutive years, nearly twenty, of residence and fruit-growing have demonstrated.

Added to these advantages is that of close proximity to market, not to speak of almost perpetual sunshine, the chief cause of healthy growth and most powerful of antiseptics and the deadly enemy of fungi, miasms and decay generally.

Now to this colony project on the plateau lands of the Ozark's—a settlement of fruit growers' homes. "The sum of all civilization is in the increase of good homes!"

Good homes, to me, means freedom from all entangling alliances whatsoever, for the female man as well as male. I do not hold with some thinkers that woman is the race builder, but I do claim that she is essentially the home builder; given an opportunity where she may rear a self-sustaining independent home she undoubtedly will prove the correctness of every assertion. Nature helps every one to become what he or she desires to become. On the farm a man is brought face to face with nature, and though he be ignorant of books, he will imbibe the wisdom which nature symbolizes.

What I want then is, first, to supplement nature in that which she seems to lack, in this section of the Ozarks, namely, regular or evenly distributed rain-fall, for that most delightful vocation, the art of fruit growing. Then sell to the thrifty, industrious, temperate home-builders, in tracts of 2, 3, 4, 5 and 10 acres. Many colony schemes of the past have been wrecked by the mistake of inducing a low class of homesteaders to take up their land. I want to guard against this mistake, first and foremost; then no church, no jails, nor institutional marriage; no police, no lawyers, and perhaps no doctors will become in evidence or necessary. Peace and contentment will reign supreme where these meddlers are not sustaind in their respective professions. Among a highly intelligent class of scientific fruit growers freedom on all lines is the underlying thought; the vocation itself is suggestive of and inspires freedom of mind and action.

A good grip on a few general foundamental truths is a necessary qualification to become eligible for membership.

A climate which permits plowing until nearly Christmas and often the month of February is fine for out-door work, combined with such a water situation as we have here—no smelters or mills on the stream for its entire length from here to its source, and hence the water will not be contaminated—leaves little else to be desired by the energetic fruit grower.

Ample water means certain crops. This fact cannot be so strongly borne in mind by those unaccustomed to irrigation. Now therefore we must install the water-works and irrigation system right on the start if we would interest the class among whom I should care to live.

I would cater to the freedom-loving, temperate people in the large cities. Nothing will take the various social distempers—which the city and artificial life breed—out of a man like horticulture, or like direct and loving contact with the soil. It draws out the poison; teaches him patience, and restores the proper tone to his system.

SEVENTY YEARS YOUNG.

The intervertebral cushions form about one-fourth of the length of the spine, and when, in old age, they are made thin and inelastic by compression, the spine becomes shorter and shows a posterior convexity. The narrowing of the spinal foramina (nerve-openings), resulting from the flattening of these cartilages, interferes with the nerve supply to the vital organs and brings on the decrepitude of old age through incomplete elaboration of the processes of digestion and assimilation. The fact that these disks form a part of the anterior boundaries of the spinal foramina makes any change in their form significant.

It is the office of these cushions to prevent the vertebrae from slipping sidewise, and to keep them forced as far apart as the ligaments of each joint will permit. The central part of each cushion is composed of the most resilient form of tissue that is found in the body, and its expansive power has to resist the weight of the body, the tension of the muscles of the neck and trunk, and that of the spinal ligaments. All of these tend to force the vertebrae toward each other, and if it were not for this able antagonist they would partly close the nerve-openings that are in each joint and cause compression of the nerves that pass through them from the spinal cord to the different parts of the body. In other words we are dependent on the integrity of these disks to prevent a combination of physical forces from partially destroying the connection between the brain and the other parts of the body, and I think that I am justified in the claim that they are deserving of more careful consideration than they have thus far received.

THE UNION LABEL.

(New York Commercial.)

It came out while the strikes were under discussion and was a new one to me, though it may be older than was "Old Brown" himself. One chap was saying to the other that Jones was not at all a bad sort—gentlemanly instincts, education, accomplishments and cash.

"But there's some sort of irregularity in the family, you know, parents never married, or something of that kind."

"Ah, yes," commented the first speaker, rather nonchalantly, "I see—he doesn't wear the union label!"

VARIOUS VOICES.

Sarah Stone Rockhill, Alliance, Ohio.—"I have not answered the four questions because with my failing health I could not see that I could be depended upon financially, and I thought others would decide for the best. I think there is no occasion to change the name of the paper unless it is made a distinctively sex reform publication, which I recommend; and in such case, let it be called 'Woman's Emancipator.' Now woman is legally a sex slave. I think once in two weeks for a dollar is better than once a week for $2.00."

O. P. Loomis, Newport News, Va.—"I take pleasure in enclosing order for $2.00 which please credit to my subscription. I don't feel as I can comment on the policy of your journal as I feel sure that you are doing whatever can be done for its best interest, except I might mention that people who read this class of literature do not care what name it sails under, and the other people would not read it under any kind of a name. With your little explanations from time to time, I should think readers would be pretty familiar with the meaning of LUCIFER, and I do not know where I would look for a more ideal one. Your editorial in Dec. 22nd issue, on 'The Dying Year,' was very appropriate and ought to attract interest anywhere."

Abbie Walker Gould, Moline, Ill.: "It seems that the extract you copied from my letter was appreciated, as it brought me a number of correspondents, but a slight misunderstanding. One man thought because I said I was a 'natural mother' that my children were born out of wedlock. One should be most careful in their use of words. Natural Motherhood is desired motherhood, with rules adhered to, that perfect results may come.

"The problem of sex is so little understood that men as a class cannot separate it from the sense principle of life, when in true reality it is as high and pure as the snow on Mt. Blanc, and yet as warm and vivifying as a sunbeam that shines on a rosebud. It is women who must reveal this great sex mystery. Man is not a creator. Woman is the one who is the producer, and never did that man live in this world who, if he was a success, did not receive love substance in some form from woman, and then he hands the trumped production back to her as his very own. He knows no better, but we have hopes of him. It would do all men good who are in the 'uplift,' to read the occult-book of Mabel Collins, 'Through the Gates of Gold,' and learn how to let the animal serve the God, not the God the animal. I shall be glad to answer any correspondence, but I wish it to be understood I do not believe in any adulterations—of Light, Love, Magnetism or Power. Irey Martin knows that his forces are best, when he alone controls life currents, and yet all is divine."

LUCIFER: ITS MEANING AND PURPOSE.

LUCIFER—The planet Venus; so called from its brightness.—Webster's Dictionary.

LUCIFEROUS—Giving light; affording light or the means of discovery.—Same.

LUCIFIC—Producing light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing, and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

The Chicago Society of Anthropology meets every Sunday at 2:30 p. m., 17th floor Masonic Temple. Public invited.

The Social Science League holds public meetings every Sunday evening at eight, in Room 913, Masonic Temple, Chicago. Lectures and discussions free.

DELAYED.

To our disappointment and keen regret "Sex Radicalism" is not yet ready for delivery. Cause—too much work left over from the holidays.

THE OUTLOOK.

At the opening of the new year it is natural, timely and pertinent that we ask ourselves, what of the prospects ahead?

What has the new year in store for us, whether in the field of finance, economics, politics, ethics—including religious toleration, social reform, freedom of speech and of press, etc., etc.

First—As to the financial outlook. In the working of the very complex and very artificial machine called modern society, money plays an important part; the most important, perhaps, since our supply of food, clothing and shelter, not to mention books, music, etc., etc., depends upon the comparative value of the "dollar"—which has been decided by law and immemorial custom to be the true measure of value, the standard of value, of all exchangeable commodities.

If this dollar, this measure, made of a certain number of grains of gold, or silver, or of paper representing the metallic dollar of the fixed yet artificial standard, in weight and fineness—if these dollars were allowed to be made in sufficient numbers to truly represent all the real wealth of the country, all the houses and work-shops; all the bread and other articles of food; all the clothing; all the raw material out of which food and clothes are made; all the tools of production, including machines for transporting commodities and persons—if, in fine, there could be a dollar for every dollar's worth of real wealth at the present valuation; if supply of dollars could be allowed to equal the demand for dollars, as in all other commodities, then the outlook in regard to the financial future would not be the vexing and perplexing problem it now is.

But, unfortunately for most of us, such is not the case. As we all know, the rule or principle of demand and supply does not hold good in regard to money. The supply of money is in the hands of a privileged few, not in the hands of all the people, and it is to the interest of this privileged few to keep the volume of money very small as compared to the volume of real wealth in the country.

The supply of money is usually regarded as a government prerogative, a government privilege, and if the word government meant the people, all the people, and if the government regulated or administered its prerogative, its privilege, in the interest of all the people without special favor to any, then such monopoly—though wholly contrary to the idea that government is an agency or servant of the people—would not be the Pandora's box of evils it now is.

But unfortunately, again, for most of us, such is not the case. As most of us know, this prerogative, this privilege, this monopoly of the most important of all the public functions, that of issuing and regulating the supply of money, is not a government monopoly at all, in any proper sense of the word. It is a private monopoly; a private prerogative; a private privilege, that gives to its owner more power over the lives and fortunes of the great mass of people than is possessed by any crowned head on the planet Earth.

Do I need to elaborate this point? Do I need to show how the monopolists of money, the banker class and their special friends, the money loaning class generally, have it in their power to create a money famine at will, and thus precipitate a panic in business relations of all kinds—such as some of us have witnessed periodically for more than fifty years past? The last of these national panics occurred in 1893 and, judging from the usual period of about ten years, another national financial round-up is now due, and overdue.

Will it come?

If reports from friends of this paper be true, there is even now something of a money famine prevailing in many places, and while it is not well to enact the role of the alarmist it is also not well to shut our eyes to patent facts. Judging from more than fifty years of experience and observation it is the part of wisdom to prepare for a storm while the sun still shines brightly in the heavens, and while it is always the dictate of prudence to avoid debt, and to live within one's income, it is particularly so for the incoming year.

As the old proverb hath it, "The wise man foreseeth the evil and hideth himself, while the fool blundereth on and is punished." From the headquarters of the money kings, Wall Street, New York, we have had more than one warning that a day of financial reckoning is not far off.

Pertinent to this subject and illustrative of the standards of business morals, of financial honesty, in vogue among the American kings of finance, the real rulers of this country, the men who precipitate financial panics when they conceive a panic to be to their interest, I herewith insert part of an article by the editor of the Chicago "Evening American," dated Jan. 14, and though there may be therein a coloring of partisan politics, the main facts are doubtless as stated:

"The dignified National City Bank of New York has kindly given us a peep into American business methods. This bank is the king, the high muck-a-muck of the venerable, noble, high-minded American business world. It is the bank where the Rockefellers keep their money, and where, under the Rockefellers' direction, the United States keeps a good deal of its money.

"This is the bank that bought a valuable piece of property from the government, and left a little of the money unpaid so that the property should escape taxation under the pretext of being government property. It is also the bank that, when it bought the property from the government, deposited the cash with itself.

"This bank consequently bought government property, dodged the payment of taxes, kept in its vaults the money that should have gone to the government, collected rent from the government for the building which it had bought from the government, and then got interest on the purchase money by lending it out—rather a complete job, you will admit.

"But that is not the 'peep into high finance' that we talked about. There is something much better, much more inspiring than that.

"There was a firm of brokers in Wall Street that failed. It is now to be lifted out of bankruptcy, put on its feet again, because the eminently respectable gentlemen in this National City Bank are afraid to have the truth come out.

"The truth is pretty far out, however—here it is:

"This firm was engaged in doing business as curb brokers and 'washing' a certain stock.

"Do you know exactly what 'washing' stock is? It is simply a fake auction on a big scale. It is the kind of thing that puts a little man in jail if he is caught doing it. It is the kind of thing that makes respectable fortunes for some of the big men.

"This firm was engaged in 'washing' a certain copper stock. An officer of the dignified National City Bank was interested in this stock. He had agreed to take a certain amount of it at a very low price, and he wanted to unload it on the public at a very much higher price.

"The brokers proceeded to 'wash' the stock accordingly.

"Let us say that the stock was worth fifty cents a share. One broker bid fifty-five cents for a thousand shares, and they all pretended that it was legitimate transaction—in reality it was a fake bid and a fake transaction.

"The other broker engaged in the skin game would then bid sixty cents for another thousand shares—and so it would go. Not one person engaged in the swindle was actually buying a single share of stock. They simply bid back and forth, pretending to buy it, and putting the price up day by day. The crowd of poor fools that believe in the 'honor' of these disreputable Wall Street gamblers looked on at this mock auction, this fake selling and buying of stocks, amazed and excited by the constantly increasing values.

"Occasionally some gullible creature outside of the combination that was doing the stock 'washing' would come in and in good faith buy some shares, actually paying his good money for the worthless stuff. This went on until they had forced the price of the stock up to a high figure, ten times what it was worth. During this 'washing' operation, they had succeeded in working off a good deal of this stock on the public that believed the crooked sales were really genuine.

"That is the sort of thing that is done constantly in Wall Street. It is one way that the high-class guardians of the nation's financial honor have of building up their fortunes and robbing the fools.

"This particular piece of stock swindling is interesting, however, not because the public was swindled—that is too common a thing in Wall Street to attract notice—but because of the great big bank that absolutely made itself a party to a miserable swindle.

"The vice-president of the bank was in the conspiracy to unload this stock by a swindling device on the public. He owned stock, he had underwritten it—which means that he had agreed to take a certain very large amount at a very low price.

"He not only was interested in the swindling operations of the swindling brokers that cheated the public with their fake sales—mock auction practices—but he actually lent the money of the bank to these brokers to carry on the swindling practices. Every day he lent them sixty thousand dollars.

"And he lent his money, belonging to the honest depositors of the bank—or belonging, perhaps, to the United States government, which deposited money in that bank—he loaned it without a dollar of security of any kind."

It is simply time and labor wasted to declaim against the methods of these kings of finance—"frenzied finance," as one of their number calls it. So long as we have government of man by man the capable and cunning will use that government to oppress and rob the less capable, less cunning and less covetous masses, and in no way is it possible to rob the ignorant and credulous masses so completely, so hopelessly, as by means of the superstitious beliefs that cluster round the thing called money.

To the average man or woman, the "mystery of finance," like the "mystery of godliness," is "past finding out, and it is very clearly to the interest of the priests of money to keep the people ignorant, just as it is to the interest of the paid clergy to keep the masses ignorant of theology, or of what "godliness" really means.

Pertinent also to the main subject of this article is that of our contributor, G. Major Taber, of Los Angeles. The magnitude of the robberies committed by the feudal barons of the war period, a generation ago in this country, is so enormous that the figures seem to lose their meaning. The attempt to grasp their meaning has a stunning, a paralyzing, a stupefying effect upon the average intellect, and we simply give it up in despair; and yet, if we do not wish to be robbed in the same way for all time to come it is absolutely necessary that we pay some attention to the problem of national finance.

THE SOCIALISTIC VIEW.

Many of Lucifer's readers are acquainted, personally or otherwise, with the author of the first page article of this issue and will welcome our new contributor. That there is much of truth in the Socialistic view of the right solution of the marriage and divorce problem, will doubtless be readily admitted by most if not all of our readers, but that the triumph of political Socialism, the abolition of private property in the field of economics, State control of industries, would of themselves, bring freedom and justice to woman and secure to the child the right to be born of love, and of the best possible fatherhood—as some of our Socialist friends seem to think, is a proposition scarcely justified by the facts of the case, as some of us see the matter. Financial independence for woman does not now release her from the thralldom of the sacramental and indissoluble view of marriage, taught by nearly all theologians, and some of us see no reason for thinking the change to political Socialism would destroy the power of the priest and the confessional over the conjugal life of woman, and over the production of new human beings.

BOOK REVIEW.

Among the books and booklets that have waited long for notice by Lucifer's reviewers is one entitled, "Dr. Hardcastle's Sex-Life Science. Embracing a Philosophy Supported by Substantial Evidence." The rest of the title page is in these words:

"That Man's Natural Instinct, Apart From Pernicious Habits, Leads Directly to Naturally Inviolable Monogamy, Strikes Directly at the Very Root of the Miseries of Mankind. Published by Dr. George Hardcastle, 8 Montgomery Ave., San Francisco, Calif., U. S. A. 1904. Price 50 cents."

In his introduction the author says:

"All along the ages of the world, men have aimed at the solution of sex science—Solomon in his way, Brigham Young in his, Victoria Woodhull in her's, Dr. Cowan in his, J. H. Noyes in his, Ezra H. Heywood in his, and a host of others in their's. I answer them all, not with a mere philosophy, but with direct teaching which is calculated to make monogamic marriage universal and inviolable, and any form of sexual prostitution, impossible. This is the tendency. In this booklet, in a few simple sentences I aim to solve the riddle—the razzle dazzle question of the ages. Let the reader study and adopt its teachings, and spread his or her testimony broadcast.

"Truth wears no mask,
Bows at no human shrine:
She only asks a hearing.'"

While there is much in this booklet of 72 pages that I cannot fully indorse there is also much hygienic teaching with which I find myself in hearty accord.

In his talk on physical exercise, air, sunshine, music, etc., as remedial agencies, Dr. Hardcastle seems well abreast with the advanced teachers of the age, as for instance:

"England's celebrated beauty, the Countess of Warwick, has discovered what she believes is an infallible beauty recipe. It consists of plenty of outdoor exercise in the hay fields and barnyards, or, in other words, practical farming for ladies of title. The Countess acknowledges that her own lovely complexion, fair skin and rosy cheeks are due to the many days spent on her own farms, where she once envied the dairymaids their beautiful complexions. And the outcome of it all is that now the Countess of Warwick has under her care at Brooke House, her lovely country seat in Reading, England, about forty young English women of title, who are working in the fields and the dairy—and all for the purpose of improving their health and complexions.

"'Come to Brooke House to my beauty school,' was the Countess of Warwick's invitation to all her young friends who questioned her regarding her charming complexion.

"In a sun hat and large 'protection' apron the Countess meets her pupils every morning and leads them to the field, where she gives them instructions in farming—practical farming—beauty and strength-giving farming. Already the Warwick hostel, at lovely Brooke House, numbers forty maidens on its roll, all working hard to make mother earth produce her best.

"The Brooke House grounds are extensive and no acres in the whole of England are so well cultivated."

Altogether I can recommend this booklet to Lucifer's readers, as containing far more of the useful, the entertaining and the scientific, than of the useless, the dull or the unscientific. The author requests me to say that it is sent out by mail under letter postage, on receipt of price.

VARIOUS VOICES.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

[Full name and address of writers in this department can generally be obtained on application to the editor.]

Conrad Quivers, Stockton, Calif.—"When a man is ashamed of his identity, let him change his name. Keeping the old name under which a paper has made its fight for many years is suggested both by assertive manhood and by business sagacity; e. g., actresses seldom change their names, even when a legal permit has been granted by church and state. Changes even in business location are often disastrous."

J. G. Hunter, Sheridan, Wyoming—"Am too busy to look up subscribers for LUCIFER. Would rather send the money for several trial subscriptions, and if you can find the place to send them I will send you $2.00. As to name, my choice would be between Light Bearer and LUCIFER; prefer the latter; keep the price to $1.00; issue semi-monthly; confine the paper to the sex question. There are other papers to support the other questions, but for this question your paper stands alone."

Louis Roser, Maysville, Ky.—"As to name, would say that no name would suit me better than LUCIFER. I like it very much. I have an apocryphal New Treatment; loaned it to a friend who showed it to a Christian, saying, 'This is a book you ought to read.' Looking at the front page the Christian saw my name. Handing back the book he said, 'I see Roser's name in it. It is an Infidel book. I'll have nothing to do with it.' My friend could not prevail upon him to look at the title page, and just so it would be with any change you might make in the name of the paper you publish. Name it 'Harman's Bible,' 'Testament,' 'Rosebud,' or any other name, and the class of fools that will reject a paper on account of the name 'LUCIFER' would reject it with any other name. If I were the editor of a paper I would have the name to please myself regardless of what anybody said, and would publish once a week, every two weeks or once a month, as it might best suit my convenience and my means."

John Sampson, Washington, D. C., 2212 14th street: "The question of a standard of virtue different for men and women has been the subject of discussion from time immemorial. There is an argument for the single standard, however, which the writer does not remember ever to have seen advanced, and yet it would appear to be of controlling importance. It may be stated in the form of a syllogism, thus:

"Sexual indulgence outside of marriage is legitimate for men.

"The co-operation of women is necessary to such indulgence.

"Therefore sexual indulgence outside of marriage is legitimate for women.

"It will be seen that the major premise represents the double standard doctrine as applied to men. The minor premise merely states an acknowledged fact. And, if both premises be true, it is impossible to escape the conclusion; for it will hardly be denied that an act which is indispensable to the commission of a legitimate act becomes itself necessarily legitimate by virtue of such very relation.

"It is needless to say that the writer is an advocate of the single standard of virtue for men and women. The argument given is a negative one, and merely shows where the double standard doctrine leads if carried to its logical conclusion. The doctrine refutes itself."

James W. Adams, Lake Bay, Wash.—"Yours of recent date overcomes my reluctance to express my opinion anent proposed changes. Every time a change has been suggested I unqualifiedly dissented. Not being in possession on any new facts I again say: Don't. Why? Because no matter what the name so long as it adheres to principle no one will, nor, indeed, can read it until they are sufficiently emancipated from ecclesiastical thralldom to do their own thinking. True, as stated by a recent contributor, 'a rose by any other name smells as sweet.' But LUCIFER'S incense is by no means as fragrant to the nostrils of dupes, fools, toadies, and flunkies as is the rant, cant, sickly, sentimentalism and hypocrisies of conventionalism. However, if a change of name must be, permit me to suggest, 'The Lord's Trumpet and the Devil's Bugle,' and catch both saints and sinners. As to LUCIFER'S policy there can be but one, and that is, 'hew to the line,' and let the consequences take care of themselves. As to its existence, its frequency, and its contents: these are beyond the control of its immediate promoters. It depends upon the support of its friends. Each must for him, or herself decide how much of their time and means can be devoted to it, and its work."

J. E. How, St. Louis, Mo.—"I enclose you copy of the resolution adopted at our meeting last night (Dec. 19) at Welfare Hall in this city.

"Be it resolved, That we, the citizens of St. Louis, of the commonwealth of Missouri, protest against the way certain speakers and teachers, such as Miss Emma Goldman and Mr. John Most, have been treated by the police of this city. We demand that in the future all men and women who may be among us be given their constitutional right to freedom of speech and of person.

"John T. Mason and J. E. How, for the meeting."

[It may not be known to all of LUCIFER'S readers that John Most, of New York City, was arrested and imprisoned in St. Louis about a month ago, for no reason other than that his friends had hired a hall and employed him to deliver on address on political topics, in that city. Much the same treatment was accorded to Miss Emma Goldman, of New York, two or three years ago, by the police of St. Louis. Both these speakers have lectured in Chicago without being interfered with by the police. Our St. Louis friends have had many reminders that Eternal Vigilance is the price of liberty. They doubtless remember also the saying of Emerson, "The good man will not obey the laws too well," and that other Emersonian motto, "Resist much; obey little."] M. H.

H. W. Hunt, Federalsburg, Md.—"I am well nigh indifferent to the name of the paper. I am perfectly willing that those who think that the influence of LUCIFER, and the progress of humanity depend upon a name, should have their way. I can and will stand any kind of name, provided I get the thing itself. The frequency of its issue will of course depend in a measure on its form. If its present form is to be preserved two issues a month would appear to me to be all right.

"I am decidedly in favor of a magazine form and a monthly issue for LUCIFER. Some of my reasons for that form are the following:

"1st. A magazine is more easily handled and always better and longer preserved than copies of a paper. A magazine gives an opportunity for more full discussion of a subject than a paper can furnish.

"2nd. The magazine form can be enlarged or contracted according to the demands of the time and occasion.

"3d. The magazine carries with it a dignity and an assurance that never can belong to a smaller publication, and the magazine will circulate more widely, and thus would command more advertising patronage than a paper. How many magazines are there on the market to-day that live upon their advertisers, and would instantly go to the wall if this source of revenue were withdrawn.

"I have above briefly summed up some of my ideas upon the questions at issue. These must be taken for what they are worth.

"My mind is that the quality of the articles appearing in LUCIFER'S columns has greatly improved since the change from a weekly to two issues a month, and it appears to me that the change from two issues a month to one, would still farther improve its contents."

Arthur Wastall, 3 Amalinda Road, London, South Africa.—"You cannot think how glad I am to see Hertzka's ideas once more coming to the front, and being championed in such a capable manner. I hope to watch Mr. Alexander Horr's movements through your columns, as I take it they will be recorded there. I myself am entirely in sympathy with the "Freeland" scheme in its general bearings, and had the honor to act as assistant secretary to the British Freeland Association when it was first formed in London in 1894. I also visited that portion of East Africa which Dr. Hertzka had chosen upon as a site for the practicalization of his ideas. The whole success of the scheme depends upon its being started on a considerable scale, and if a sufficient area of land could be obtained anywhere on the Pacific Coast of North America for the purpose, reformers of all grades (worthy of the name), ought to lend their best energies to the realization of so eminently sane and workable a project.

"Being a blend of Individualism and Socialism it is sufficiently adaptable and broad to embrace all economic 'isms.' It allows for the management of all the affairs of men by individuals or voluntary associations and as the State would cease to exist as far as Freelanders practically were concerned, it will be seen that it is as near an approach to the doctrine that Liberty and LUCIFER inculcate as we can reasonably hope to inaugurate in our life time.

"Bernard Shaw most ably shows in 'Man and Superman,' which all LUCIFER readers ought to make themselves acquainted with, that in the direction of Eugenics lies the only real hope of the future. In some such a colony as Freeland the scientific breeding of humans could alone be properly carried out on anything like an extensive scale."

O. H. Stone, Baring, Wash.—"I have been enabled through the kind offices of a friend to read quite a few numbers of LUCIFER, and as this is the time for good resolutions I have decided to support your excellent journal of sex reform. I like it, not only because it is outspoken, but also because it is liberal in fact as well as in name. Will say by way of introducing myself, that I am a Socialist and am of the opinion that Socialism takes precedence (though it would be well to work from both ends where possible), not necessarily because it is of greater importance—nothing can, to my mind, be of greater importance than sexual science—but as a means to an end, and also because Socialism appears to me at least to be the next big thing that is going to 'happen' on the evolutionary program. Mr. Crane voices my sentiments regarding the evolutionary process exactly, only he expresses them much better than I could ever hope to do. I see nothing in this view of evolution that should cause us to become pessimists. I should rather think that it would be comforting to know that 'everything worketh together for good.'"

"Enclosed five ($5.00) for which please send LUCIFER for one year and the following books: 'Hilda's Home' (cloth), 'A Child of Love' (cloth), Institutional Marriage.' What is left over you will please use for the good of the cause."

John Guntz, Jr., Wausau, Wis.—"Your enlightening periodical received. Would say it is a dandy. Saw some letters of criticism in it, which requested the dropping of 'LUCIFER.' I think the name a rather unique one for a journal, and you will have no imitation to bother you. Everybody knows LUCIFER, and if they read their Bible they will soon find that there is not a better fellow than he. A. R. Parsons in his 'New Light From the Great Pyramid,' claims that LUCIFER was always anciently applied to a destroyed planet, which was a bright morning star, but whose destruction so terrified the then-living people that they afterwards applied the name to the evil principal personified. But no matter if it was Venus or another planet, the definition is the bright morning star. What could be a better name? But whatever the name is the editor is Mr. Harman, and it is his title which always will take pre-eminence over the name of the periodical.

"The illustrated title piece would alone satisfy unprejudiced readers of the real mission of the paper. It is as if one wanted to veneer one's paper by putting on a title which would not hurt people's feelings. Some people think their feelings hurt anyway. With 'LUCIFER' on a badge pinned on my coat I would feel more delighted than with all the second-hand names on the market. Of course suit yourself and others, it won't hurt my feelings even if you should happen to get hold of the wrong title-piece in your next issue.

"Some one also says of your eccentric era. 'It is the finishing touch and is just O. K. The era dates from Bruno's time, one of the greatest, most noble of men, and inaugurates and commemorates the age of an upward progress, and we will feel most satisfied with its adoption. It at least stands for Freedom. It stands for all our present liberty and light, and all our happiness. So let's welcome the adoption of an era of joy, of freedom, and lets give Bruno the crown of immortality. His love for his fellowmen is enshrined in the bosom of Mother Earth, and when she dies then let Bruno's memory go with it; but let it flourish now."

is a magazine advocating Health, Happiness and Opulence; all this here and now.

NOW is a Journal of Soul Culture which includes the education of man in the use of his Spiritual faculties, the unfolding of Psychic Power and the development of Self-Control. It is a Spiritual Messenger with food for the Soul, and is the leading New Thought Journal of the world. No premiums, gifts or prizes with NOW; it stands on its own merits.

A prominent real estate dealer of this city has this to say in praise of NOW: "As NOW is edited by the 'King Pen' of so-called New Thought Philosophers, it is consequently the best new-psychology journal on earth; hence in order to keep abreast (in reality considerably ahead) of the times, I don't want to miss a single number of that paper. It is invaluable. So for the dollar herewith enclosed please send NOW for the coming year and 'forget it not.'"—N. D. Sickles, 6 Geary street.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS.

ADDRESS 500 FULTON STREET, CHICAGO, ILL.

LOVE'S COMING OF AGE. Edward Carpenter. This is a book with which few will wholly agree, but which nearly every one can read with profit and enjoyment. The subject is the relation of the sexes in the past, present and future, and it is treated with absolute frankness and fearlessness by a writer who unites a broad outlook, a strong grasp of his subject and a charming literary style. The following table of contents will indicate the line of thought followed by the author: The Sex Passion; Man, the Ungrown; Woman, the Serf; Woman in Freedom; Marriage, a Retrospect; Marriage, a Forecast; The Free Society; Some Remarks on the Early Star and Sex Worships. Notes on the Primitive Group Marriage; Jealousy; The Family; Preventive Checks to Population. The book is printed on extra book paper and handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

THE NEW HEDONISM. Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old asceticism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new Hedonism says: 'Be happy and you will be virtuous.' In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediæval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproducing function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; twelve copies, 25c; single copy, 5c.

THE RIGHTS OF CHILDREN. R. B. Kerr. Together with What Are Women Here For? (E. B. Foote, Jr., M. D.), The New Martyrdom (Lillian Harman), and The Will, from the French of Guy de Maupassant. 25c.

KARESZA. Ethics of Marriage. Alice B. Stockham, M. D., author of Tokology. Karezza gives a high ideal to parental functions and pleads for justice to the unborn child. Karezza is really a supplement to Tokology and elucidates a theory of marital relations, which leads to individual growth and a closer bond of union, the practice of which at all times gives complete control of the fecundating power. Karezza controverts the prevailing ideas of baseness and degradation associated with the sexual nature, makes a plea for a better birthright for the child, for a controlled and designed maternity and aims to lead individuals to a higher development of themselves, through a knowledge of their creative powers. Karezza is the product of knowledge and experience, and is presented to the world with a deep abiding faith, that its teachings will lead individuals to purer lives, to right understanding and appreciation of the sex functions, to intelligent control of propagation and finally through right adjustment in most sacred relations, to the ideal marriage. Levant cloth, prepaid. $1.

FREE PRESS. Arguments in support of demurrer to the indictment of M. Harman, E. C. Walker and Geo. Harman, under the Comstock law. G. C. Clemens and David Overmeyer. 25c.

HILDA'S HOME; A Story of Woman's Emancipation. Rosa Graul. With Macaulay, Rosa Graul would say, "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman will be less loving and lovable, or that man will be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish. 426 pages. Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

IN BRIGHTER CLIMES; or, Life in Socieland. Albert Chavannes. A story of what life may be under better conditions and guided by higher ideals. 25c.

MARRIAGE IN FREE SOCIETY. Edward Carpenter. One of the best short works on the subject. Daintily printed. A charming little gift book. "Love is doubtless the last and most difficult lesson that humanity has to learn; in a sense it underlies all the others. Perhaps the time has come for the modern nations when, ceasing to be children, they may even try to learn it." 25c.

STUDIES IN SOCIOLOGY. In four parts: I. The Law of Happiness; II. The Law of Individual Control; III. The Law of Exchange; IV. The Law of Environment. Albert Chavannes. 25c.

THE PRODIGAL DAUGHTER; or, The Price of Virtue. Rachel Campbell. Together with Legal Wifehood (Lucinda B. Chandler's), Life's Gifts (Olive Schreiner), and Marriage—What It Was and Is; Will the Coming Woman Marry? 25c.

TOKOLOGY. A book for every woman. By Alice B. Stockham, M. D. Illustrated. Tokology teaches possible painless pregnancy and parturition, giving full, plain directions for the care of a woman before and after confinement. The ailments of pregnancy can be prevented as well as the pains and dangers of childbirth avoided, and women need not go down to death giving birth to children. English, German or Swedish. $2.25.

OUR WORSHIP OF PRIMITIVE SOCIAL GUESSES. E. C. Walker. Contents: Love and Law; The Moloch of the Monogamic Ideal; The Continuity of Race-Life, and Tyranny; Food and Sex Fallacies, a Criticism; When Men and Women Are and When They Are Not Varieties; The New Woman; What Is She? What Will She Be? The State Hiding Behind Its Own Mistakes; Bishop Potter's Opinion of Divorce; Love; Its Attraction and Expression; Is She an Honest Girl? Lloyd, Platt and the Pitiful Facts; Social Radicals and Parentage; Anthropology and Monogamy Love and Trust Versus Fear; Reflections upon Reading William Platt's "Women, Love, and Life." 25c.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S GOSPEL OF DOOM. Lady Florence Dixie. A strongly worded protest against Theodore Roosevelt's pronunciamento on "Race-Suicide." 5c.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A Primer of Sexual Rationalism. Edwin C. Walker. "It is time to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages. 10c.

VICE: ITS FRIENDS AND ITS FOES. Edwin C. Walker. Contents: Brotherhood of Man; The Recognition of Facts; Folly of "For Men Only"; Definition of Vice; Horrors of Prostitution; Abnormal Sexuality; Errors of Fathers, Mothers and Teachers; Persecution Does Not Reform; Prostitution and the Crusaders; The "Spoiling of the Heathen"; What Are the Effects of Raids and Crusades? The Economic Side of the Problem; Party Politics in Vice Crusading; In What Does Prostitution Consist? Some Causes of Prostitution; Two Kinds of Prostitution Compared; The Opponents of Divorce; "Purifying" the Tenements; Action for Advanced Women. With appendix: The Wanderings of a Spirit; Our Fair Civilization, the Folly and Cruelty of It All. 15c.

WOMAN AND HER RELATION TO THE CHURCH OR CANON LAW FOR WOMEN. Harriet M. Closz. A succinct statement of the position to which women were doomed by the Church Fathers and authorities. Every woman should possess a copy. 10c.

THE ABOLITION OF MARRIAGE. John Beverly Robinson. Together with Isabel's Intention (Mariette). Reminiscences of Berlin Heights (A. Warren), and The Sexes and Love in Freedom (Oscar Rotter). 25c.

LOVE'S WAY TO PERFECT HUMANHOOD.
By Agnes Benham.

An excellent companion for Carpenter's "Love's Coming of Age." The keynote of the book, found on page 76, reads thus: "The soul itself is pure and heavenly, and if at the moment of conception and through the prenatal time when it is building its earthly house it could meet with entirely responsive and congenial conditions, then would the earth be peopled with a race of gods." Price $1. Published by the author, Agnes Benham, Adelaide, South Australia. Orders may be sent through this office.

IN THE FUTURE.

Tired mother, worn mother,
Take heart of grace,
A better day is dawning for thee soon.

Tired mother, worn mother,
Lift up thy head,
Thy struggles and thy victories shall be known.

Tired mother, worn mother,
Reach out thy hand,
It shall clasp the Nation in its time.

Tired mother, worn mother,
Hold hard a wee,
We shall rally round thee by and by.

Tired mother, worn mother,
Thou shalt have the fruit,
We shall give thee credit by and by.
—Laura Smith Wood in "Mother-Soul."

MOTHERHOOD.

To her no music is half so sweet
As the music she heard that hour,
When hope fulfillment found at last
In life's one perfect flower.

I know it is so, for I saw her face,
And the joy that lighted her eye,
As the young mother bent her head to hear
Her new born baby's cry.

THE RIGHT TO BE BORN WELL.

Prominent among the causes of race-degeneracy; chief, perhaps, of all the barriers that now stand in the way and prevent racial improvement, is the too close intimacy of conjugal partners—perpetual occupancy of the same room or rooms; sleeping every night together in the same bed, eating at the same table with none but their two selves for company, except perhaps a child or children that are part and parcel of themselves.

"The ascent of life is the ascent of ideals." In order that a superior child may be born it would seem necessary that the father should be idealized by the expectant mother—in accord with the view of heredity, of prenatal potentialities now generally accepted—but how is it possible that her conjugal mate can long be the ideal, the hero of the woman who is compelled to live, year after year, in such intimate and familiar association with a man, as is required by the time-honored marital code?

The difficulty, the impossibility of preserving the illusion—the glamour that nature kindly throws over the loved one, in order to produce a new being that shall be an improvement upon both the parents, is well shown, and a sensible remedy suggested in an article by the editor of the "Boston Herald" of recent date, headed "Lovers for Life," which article though longer than I could wish, is here reproduced entire:

"In one of George Gissing's novels the hero declares that the only married couples who can live together happily are those who can afford to have two separate establishments under the same roof. He protests against the 'huddlement of male and female.'

"Happiness in marriage is said to be merely a matter of mutual tact, but we are inclined to think it depends largely on the number of rooms for the display of domestic character and emotion. Continual, forced propinquity is a stirrer-up of strife; it is also the chief disillusionizer. The sight of the loved one in some menial employment or grotesque attitude distresses the young husband veneered with refinement, because to him homely domestic life is menial and grotesque. He would fain see his wife only on parade, robed becomingly, ready for reception, theater or discussion of Shakespeare and the musical glasses. Wooing her, he was charmed by her conversation; married, he thinks her a chatterer. He is surprised when a common acquaintance speaks of her as a clever woman: 'She has something to say.'

"'Too much,' is his suppressed rejoinder.

"The continual revelation of poor human nature with its infirmities kills romance. Men and women are reared, for the most part, in disagreement with nature, and they are slow to realize that, if a man is not a hero to his valet, neither is Eustacia, wedded, always a heroine to her Augustus. Undue propinquity brings in its train morning irritability, noonday restlessness, the boredom of long domestic evenings. The thoughts have all been interchanged. The solos and duets have all been sung. The husband regrets that he cannot meet his wife for the first time and experience a new emotion. The Gissingians believe all this.

"Now, if husband and wife were to live apart, in the city, but at a considerable distance from each other, there would be inevitable curiosity, not wholly unpleasant jealousy, compulsion of attraction—the fuel for flaming love. Think of Augustus, who has not seen his wife for a week, though it was in his power, writing to her: 'Dear Eustacia: May I dine with you next Tuesday? Don't disappoint me. I am counting the hours.' He rises early on Tuesday. His face at the office is as a benediction. He gives a cigar to the elevator boy. As the hour of dinner approaches he grows restless; no trolley car is fast enough for him; fearing a block, he hails a cab. Eustacia has ordered the favorite dishes of Augustus; she is attired for conquest; there is a reunion as of those long separated by an ocean.

"Such a wedded life would make for greater independence of soul. The man would be freer, more alert in business; the woman less weakly dependent, less selfish. If there were children, there would be no conflict of authority to open childish eyes, no harsh words to fall on too receptive ears. Man and wife would be on good behavior, as in the ensnaring days of courtship. At the weekly dinner—perhaps fortnightly dinner would be more prudent—Augustus would be brilliant and devoted beyond the power of any rival, and Eustacia's look would be more passionately eloquent than the siren's song. If the man is a humorist, what joy in calling on his wife at an unseemly hour to set the neighbors agog; to take her to a restaurant and 'open wine' for her in the blaze of publicity; to alight with her from a carriage, go to her apartment and leave at a late hour; to send her flowers as an amorous token; to persuade her to a little supper at his own rooms!

"But the Gissingians are not the inventors of their theory. The Spartan husband, according to Plutarch, was all the daytime and most of the night with his companions, 'unless he sometimes stole to see his wife, being afraid and ashamed ever to be seen by any of the house where she was. And hereunto his young wife did help for her part—to spy means and occasions how they might meet together and not be seen. This secret meeting in this sort did serve to good purposes. It continued also in both parties a still burning love, and a new desire of the one to the other, not as it were lukewarm, nor weary.'"

It will be noted that this plan to prevent the early death of love is advocated not because it will produce better children, but simply because it will bring greater happiness to the married couple themselves, but since marriage is supposed to be instituted and homes founded mainly for offspring, is it not clear that whatever increases the happiness, the welfare of the parents will also increase their chances of success as race-builders?

That the never-ending living together is one chief cause of the overproduction of the unfit—of the class of children that no one wants, and that should never be born, needs no argument to prove. I once asked the overseer of the poor in Topeka, Kansas, why it is that the poorer the parents the greater the number of children. His reply was substantially this:

"Too close living together. The rich have their separate beds and bed rooms; the poor must live and sleep in one or two rooms and cannot afford separate beds. The rich have other sources of amusement, of enjoyment; the poor have only the gratification of their animal appetites and instincts. The temptation and the opportunity to indulge the sex appetite is always present; hence the overproduction of children."

That institutional marriage is no longer regarded by intelligent observers as the best safeguard of morality and the most effectual protection to helpless motherhood and childhood, is proved by such utterances as that of Judge Almy of Cambridge, Mass., as reported in the "Boston Post" of Jan. 24:

"Liquor and matrimony are the chief causes for all crimes," said Judge Almy of East Cambridge yesterday, before the Fathers' and Mothers' Club at the new Country club house.

"Nearly all the crimes in the world," he continued, "could be traced to either one of these two causes."

Whether Judge Almy had in view the depraving influence upon children unborn—through prenatal maternal impressions, fostered if not compelled by the artificial code, the anti-natural code of morality inherent in the popular ceremonial or sacramental marriage, is not quite clear, but that such was the fact is certainly not an improbable inference.

"MOTHER-SOUL."

Occasionally there has appeared in the radical press a mention of this remarkable little booklet which comes to us from the Pacific slope. Our comrade, J. Wm. Lloyd, himself a poet of delicate sentiment and insight, has paid tribute to these poems and the genius of their author, yet I beg to speak a word to your readers, lest many of them should miss a rare treat.

The "Mother-Soul" is not a book to be read and laid aside, rather is it a book to fold to one's heart, a book to throb with, to thrill to, while the eyes fill and the bosom warms. With the strength and the freedom of Whitman, with his realization of the fundamental, with his very genius for revealing the simple, natural human emotion, there is here a more delicate touch, the touch of the woman. These are more than poems; they are human fragments; bits of living reality. One goes through the booklet with held breath, one comes to it again and again, seeks it in rare moments of longing and of joy.

It is not a book for every one. It is essentially a book for mothers. But alas! not every mother will respond to it. Not every mother can join in "the song of the mother-state chosen."

But to those wise, free women whose motherhood has been a choice and not an accident, this little book will come like the touch of a sympathetic hand, the sister-touch of another who knows. For this woman poet is herself a mother, a free mother —"Knowing her dignity; unashamed; serene," and she leads one to the sense of the universal. Note the "Inspiration," and the closing line of "After a Long While"—"That was your motherhood, a thing which welds all women in one great chain of love and care and pain and joy the whole world through."

The happy mother, bending over her child, will find here the expression of her own unspeakable love, her adoration, her ecstasy. The pregnant woman, pulsing with joy as her precious burden increases with the days, will quiver to these lofty and beautiful lines. She has her word, too, for the woman whose mother-longing has been denied, whose arms are empty, whose heart is weary—

"Eating of restlessness, drinking of barrenness; Turning aside still; with wide eyes in the night asking."

To all true women, all whose pulses are quickened by the dream-touch or the living touch of a baby's hand, this book appeals most deeply; and to those men who have loved such women; those rarer men in whose own souls burns the same sweet fire.

For a new-made mother, for an expectant mother, I know no more exquisite gift. But my words are weak—get the booklet, and love it. Laura Smith Wood is a free woman, a free mother, who is trying to sustain herself and children outside the conventional bondage which superstition imposes upon her sex. She can be reached in care of general delivery Tacoma, Washington. Besides the "Mother-Soul" she has published another booklet—"My Soul and Winter's," in which are found the same freedom, the same genius-touch. There are wonderful descriptions, delicate touches of fancy, a delicious humor at times, as in "They Grow in Maine:"

"It's so long since I have seen a good fat icicle,
* * * * * * *
But ah! I've not forgotten the fine crunch of them!
And the nice smooth track they made down to my stomach
And the queer, cool, northern feeling that they made there—
Like sitting in a meeting-house that's been shut up a year!"

And again a certain wild ecstasy which takes one away from the fireside and carries one afar to tingle and to revel in fierce exultation in the very whirl of the north wind.

Get these booklets and taste a new sensation, be lifted out of the dull, prosaic and conventional rhyming that goes the rounds under the name of verse. For here is poetry—fire and ice and love and longing and life and death, touched by a genius-wand into living emotion.

LUCIFER'S HELPERS.

E. M. Dewey, $1; Louis Reser, $1.25; Delos Dunton, $2; J. W. Griggs, 50c; C. C. Hitchcock, $1; Emil Ruedebush, 50c; I. Goldberg, $3; O. H. Stone, $2.25; Arthur E. Clark (for Priscilla Clark, deceased), $6; R. Bruckner, 50c; Adler Jorgensen, $2; Henry Bool, $10; George Bullock, $1; J. A. Wilson, 25c; H. H. Cady, $1; A. Wastall, $5; W. L. Cheney, $3; A. W. Frankenberg, $1; Dr. Robert Greer—books worth at least $10; V. P. Douglas, 50c; E. G. Earle, $1.

Some of these helpers sent names of friends to whom they wished LUCIFER sent for a longer or shorter term; others have asked that books or pamphlets be sent instead of the paper, but several of these earnest workers have forgotten entirely to state how they wished their money applied, and therefore the request is here renewed that all who send money, books or other valuables, to help LUCIFER, will state just in what way they desire their contributions to be expended.

For many months past LUCIFER'S postoffice receipts show that we regularly send out about half as many pounds of samples as we do of papers to subscribers and regular exchanges, and very frequently it happens that we send not only half as many but quite as many pounds of samples as we do of our regulars, and this statement is true of our postoffice record, in the main, for the last dozen or more years, and hence, when no instructions are given as to how the money is to be expended we place it to the credit of LUCIFER'S "sample copy fund."

Again, good friends all, please accept sincerest thanks for timely and helpful co-operation. As said before, so now, it is doubtless true that some names have been omitted that should have public recognition as helpers beyond the annual subscription dues. If those whose names have been overlooked in the above list will kindly call attention, by postal, or by letter, to the omission the correction will be attended to in next issue.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH IN ST. LOUIS.

Dear Brother Harman: It is time to give you a sign that I am still kicking. Of course I want LUCIFER to be sent again to my old hunting grounds.

I have been for a short visit on the farm (Kate Austin's place) and enjoyed six Xmas dinners, as well as home-made cider, blackberry wine and cigars. Whenever I have finished with the police (or the police with me) I always find it advisable to take a little rest. The police always accuse me of making trouble (it's the fourth time), and try as hard as I may, I can never convince them that they are the ones who create all the trouble.

The object of the police was to prevent John Most's lecture in St. Louis, fearing that his speech might incite some one to send Roosevelt to heaven. The rented hall was closed by the order of the mighty "Chief," and some thirty of his blue coated subjects guarded the streets and sidewalks. I hurried to inform Most of the situation, and while talking the matter over with him, detectives came and arrested him. Voluntarily I went along to see what I could do for him. At the station it was found advisable to lock me up also, but not in the same cell with Most. I was pushed into one of these dark, foul-smelling caves in the cellar of the station in which were already two negroes and one white man. In vain did we look for the soft side of the hard bench which was supposed to serve as bed for four men in this one cell.

Having spent so many of these "Arabian nights"—more than "1,001"—under police and government protection, I took it very calm and good-natured, for as long as I do not feel the rope around my neck I consider myself still on the lucky side.

Next morning at a private hearing in the sanctum of the chief, the city attorney suggested to hold Most for vagrancy; but Most produced his return railroad ticket, and arguing for his right to visit the World's Fair, the chief concluded to let us run with no charges or fines against us but our names signed to a note in the police record that we would not come to St. Louis again. We signed. I was escorted by a detective to the bridge over the Mississippi to East St. Louis, Ill., and Most had all day long two detectives with him until 9 p. m. when his train left St. Louis. Fortunately I did not lose my job as I did three times before.

Now, some good friends think we should not have signed our names to said "agreement." However, the John Turner case has convinced us that for the present the American people don't give a d——n for free speech and press; that they have no use for it and therefore don't desire it. Every dollar spent in such a case for legal monkeying would simply be wasted and nothing gained. As Anarchists we have no standing nor pull in courts, and these things are necessary to gain a point. Others may think different, theoretically, but those of us who repeatedly have been in courts, police stations, jails and prisons and have gone through it practically, as Most and I have done, will probably look at the question as we do.

Well, since that day I have been fifty times in St. Louis and even lectured there last Sunday, and am still alive and kicking, resolved to keep it up.

Yours for more kicking,
CARL NOLD.

HIGHER EDUCATION AND MOTHERHOOD.

[Here is food for thought for the thoughtful. While the explanations are various concerning the unwillingness of educated women to become mothers, may it not be that dissatisfaction with or repugnance to the popular marriage code is the chief cause of such unwillingness?]

Thanks to the fearless utterances of President Roosevelt, indorsed and emphasized by the plain and forcible talk of Dr. Hall, president of Clark University, the women of America will have no excuse for not seeing their duty in a broad national sense and along the highest patriotic lines. Both gentlemen are interested in education to the highest practicable point, and both believe that education which increases the danger of race suicide is a failure.

As a general warning, without the accompanying proof of statistics, is almost useless, Dr. Hall quotes the reports from three leading women's colleges and nine colleges for men to show that one-half the women and one-quarter of the men are unmarried twenty years after graduation. He submits the further evidence, also based on statistics, that few marry later than twenty years after graduation, and those who do marry have only two children as the issue of such conjugal union. Hence the higher education would soon depopulate the country if it became universal.

This is, indeed, a most serious condition of affairs. Up to the present time the warning sent out by President Roosevelt has been listened to with only the customary measure of respect, and this because it was too diffuse and scattering, and, without facts and figures, merely represented an opinion. But here is an educator, the head of a university, who quotes appalling figures which cannot be refuted, and who tells an assembly of instructors that unless the college woman is taught to aspire to motherhood, and that as quickly as possibly, the perpetuity of the race is in peril.

Very few women, college bred or otherwise, contemplate with serenity the probability of a life of single blessedness. Still fewer content themselves with the hope that twenty years after graduation they will marry and add two lovely children to the national census. It is probable that down in every woman's heart there is a longing for motherhood, and it is hard to believe that this desire is "educated" out of her. Still the doctor's figures are inexorable, and in the absence of illuminating light from Dr. Hall it may be argued that in the case of womanhood higher education is a bugbear that frightens away proposing man, or that it creates in the mind of woman a standard of manhood so high that it cannot be dispelled until the bloom of feminine youth and attractiveness has vanished and the golden opportunity has gone forever.

The specific cure for this wretched state of things is a course in fatherhood and motherhood in college—not elective, but compulsory. Competent professors, to quote from Dr. Hall, should teach "the supreme joy of parenthood," possibly illustrating it by their own lives, possibly holding themselves up in the misery of celibacy as the horrible examples. Young men should be taught to be less selfish, women less finicky, and both should be encouraged to believe that comparatively early and rational marriages are the highest obligation to the state. It is not for a layman to say how this is to be done, or what the immediate effects of "aspiration to motherhood" will be; that will be easily settled by Dr. Hall and the competent corps of professors.—Ex.

INCREASED INTELLIGENCE DECREASES MARRIAGE RATE.

When asked recently to what cause she attributed the large decrease in marriage for 1901 in Rochester, New York, Miss Susan B. Anthony said:

"Well, I think that one reason for the decrease in the marriage rate is the increased intelligence of the women. In the old days women were married at the age of sixteen years, and from that time until they arrived at the age of forty their one aim seemed to be to give birth to a child every year, or every two years. Thus the heyday of their lives was spent in hopeless toil and sleepless nights, and the women became old long before their time. What this world wants is fewer children and those better born and bred.

"A woman who marries a man and finds that he is a drunkard or a licentious man is committing one of the worst sins against society if she continues to live with that man after her discovery. One of the greatest crimes is the bearing of children by such a couple. In a case of this kind the woman should secure a divorce, and see to it that she does not rush into another such alliance."—Ex.

KATHERINE BRESHKOVSKY.

At this writing—January 29—Katharine Breshkovsky is lecturing here in Chicago upon Russia and the Russians. I have not yet seen her, nor heard hear speak, but am told that her meetings are attended by thousands of eager listeners, notwithstanding the fact that few, comparatively, of these hearers understand Russian. A pamphlet issued by Chas. H. Kerr, of this city, written by Ernest Poole, tells in brief the story of her life and sufferings in behalf of human freedom, a story that has special interest and significance now, in the light of current events in Russia.

Describing her appearance the author of this pamphlet says:

"Her hair, once cut in prison, has grown again. A great wavy mass of gray frames a face broad, heavy, deep-lined with suffering. Her eyes, deep under high-arched brows, now flash the fires of her dream, now beam forth the warm affections of one whom hundreds call endearingly 'Babushka'—little grandmother. Her voice, as she spoke through our interpreter, ran swiftly over her own sufferings, but rose passionately describing her country's degradation. Daughter of a nobleman and earnest philanthropist; then revolutionist, hard labor convict and exile for 23 years in Siberia; and now a heroic old woman of 61, she has plunged again into the dangerous struggle for freedom. The Russian revolutionary movement is embodied in this one heroic figure."

Much of the pamphlet consists of a biographical sketch, told in her own words. After telling how she became interested in the Liberal movement, so-called, in Russia—through witnessing the sufferings of the peasants driven from their homes to starve upon the sterile lands assigned them by their masters, after the "Emancipation" edict of the Czar, Katharine Breshkovsky proceeds to relate how it came that she left the "Liberalist" faction and became a revolutionist:

"Three years later I married a liberal, broad-minded landowner who took deep interest in the zemstvo, our district moot. He established for me a peasant's agricultural school. Several of the younger land owners became interested in our work. We met together frequently, and this was my last attempt at Liberalist reform.

"It is a poor patriot that will not thoroughly try his government before he rises against it. We searched the laws and edicts; we found certain scant and long-neglected peasant's rights of local suffrage; and then we began showing the peasants how to use these rights they already had. They crowded to the local elections and began electing as judges, arbiters and other officials, the Liberals who honestly held the peasants' interests at heart. But when the more despotic land owners were ousted from the zemstvo and lost their source of (to use your language) 'graft,' their leader denounced us to the Minister of the Interior as a band of conspirators. Several of us were exiled to Siberia; my husband and I were put under police surveillance, and my father was deposed from office without trial, as a 'dangerous man' for allowing such criminals to be at large. Punished as criminals for teaching the peasant his legal rights, we saw the government as it was, the system of corruption, watching jealously through spies and secret police that their peasant victim might not be taught anything that could make him think or act as a man.

"A startling event now occurred. A Liberalist named Netchayev had already collected a revolutionary group. Discovered and arrested, their trial in 1871 was the first great event in the long struggle for freedom. Along the Great Siberian road the procession of politicals began. Meanwhile their revolutionary documents had been published. Never again has the government allowed this blunder. Those documents were read by thousands of Liberals like us. The spirit of revolution was kindled.

"I was at this time 26 years old. My husband like me had a whole life before him, and therefore I thought it only fair to speak frankly. I asked him if he were willing to suffer exile or death in this cause of freedom. He said that he was not. Then I left him.

Here is the account of her first arrest and imprisonment:

"The System, alarmed by their spies, made wholesale arrests. I was under a peasant's name in Podolia. In my wallet was our manifesto, also maps showing the places already reached and those next to be organized. A servant girl spied them and told the servant of the local police agent. An hour later he came rushing in, and jerked the manifesto from my wallet. His eyes popping with excitement, he read the paper in a loud, thick voice. As that simple but stirring proclamation of freedom, equality and love was read, the poor, ignorant people thought it the longed for proclamation from the Czar. The news spread. Men, women and children rushed up. The district attorney came and he too read it aloud. Then suddenly the chief of police arrived, glanced at the wild, joyous faces around, and seized the document. 'What is this?' he asked me roughly. 'Propaganda,' I replied, 'with which the attorney and the gendarme have been very viciously inciting the people.'

"In jail I was led down to the 'Black Hole.' As I came down two besotted wretches were stumbling up. I was pushed in, the heavy door slammed, and bolts rattled in total darkness. At once I was sickened by the odor. I took a step forward and slipped, for the floor was soft with excrement. I stood still until deadly sick I sank down on a pile of straw and rags. A minute later I was stung sharply back to consciousness and sprang up covered with vermin. I leaned against the walls and found them damp. So I stood up all night in the middle of the hole. And this was the beginning of Siberia. * * *

"I awaited trial in a new St. Petersburg prison. My cell was 9 feet long, 5 feet wide and 7 feet high. It was clean, and a hole above gave plenty of air. My bed was an iron bracket with mattress and pillow of straw, rough gray blanket, coarse sheet and pillow case. I wore my own clothes. This cell I never left for over two years."

At length Katharine Breshkovsky was tried and condemned to five years at hard labor in the prison mines, to be followed by exile for life in Siberia. Of the journey thither this is what she says:

"Secretly at night, to avoid a demonstration, ten of us were led out. Other tens followed on successive nights. In the street below were eleven 'telegas'—heavy hooded vehicles with three horses each. Into one I was placed, a stout gendarme squeezes in on each side, to remain there two months. Just before my knees sat the driver. We went off at a gallop, and our 5,000 mile journey began. The Great Siberian road was feelingly described by Mr. Kennan. A succession of bumps of all sizes; our springless telegas jolted and bounced; my two big gendarmes lurched; our horses continually galloped for they were changed every few hours; we bounced often a whole week without stopping over ten minutes day or night; we suffered that peculiar agony that comes from long lack of sleep. Our officer ordered the gendarmes never to leave us. At times we women held shawls between the gendarmes and our friends. Three wives who had come to share their husbands' exile were treated the same. We were all dressed in convict clothes. The men had also heavy chains on feet and wrists; their heads were partly shaved. Our officer kept the money given him by our anxious friends at home, and gave us each the government allowance of four and one-half cents a day. For sleep, we were placed in the etapes (wayside prisons). Mr. Kennan has well described the cells-reeking, crawling, infected with scurvy, consumption and typhoid. They had log walls roughly covered with plaster, often red from vermin killed by tormented sleepers. The air was invariably noisome from the open excrement tubs; the long bench on which we slept had no bedclothes. Through the walls we heard the endless jangling of fetters, the moaning of women, the cries of sick babies. On the walls were a mass of inscriptions, names of friends who had gone before us, news of death and insanity, and shrewd bits of advice for outwitting gendarmes. Some were freshly cut, but one worm eaten love poem looked a century old. For along this Great Siberian road over a million men, women and children have dragged, 250,000 since 1875, people from every social class; murderers and degenerates side by side with tender girls who were exiled through the jealous wife of some petty town official."

The story of her life in the mines and in exile is too long to be reproduced here, much as I would like to do so. That this truly wonderful woman did not fill up the full measure of her sentence of perpetual exile in Siberia is attested by the fact that she is now here in Chicago doing what she can "for Russia's freedom." The last paragraph of the pamphlet from which I have quoted reads thus:

"Few believe in assassination. Revolution by the whole people is our one object, and for this the time is near. The Japanese war has caused the deepest bitterness ever felt in Russia; to the 664,000 lives lost in a century of useless wars, now over a hundred thousand will be added; and every hamlet will mourn its dead. Then will our 400,000 workers call on the millions around them to rise for freedom. Arms? There are plenty. Why in recent riots have soldiers refused to fire on the crowd? Because all through the army are soldiers and even officers working secretly for the cause—Arms—yes and brains—for in the universities and in every profession are wise, resolute men to guide the wild passions of rvolt. In the zemstvos are hundreds of officials straining to hasten our struggle. So in this last year the movement has suddenly swelled. Already four hundred thousand strong! Day and night they work. In place of sleep and food and drink—the dream of freedom! Freedom to think and speak! Freedom to work! Justice to all! For this cause I shall travel three months in your free country. For this cause I have the honor of making to free Americans our appeal."

"Freedom to think and to speak!" While it is quite true that as compared to Russia the citizens of United States of America still enjoy a large measure of freedom, yet if Katharine Breshkovsky knew as much of the doings of the American police and of the working of the American inquisition, known as the "postal censorship of press and mails," as some of us know, she would probably feel like modifying her implied eulogy when speaking of "Free Americans."

BOOK REVIEW.

Among what may be called "books of the transition" from the old to the new ideals in regard to what virtue means or should mean, when applied to the regulation of sex instinct, I regard an English booklet called "Jeannette," as one of the most interesting and valuable. Besides its value as a truthful portrayal of a phase of modern life that is one of the saddest commentaries upon our so-called civilization, it is quite interesting and valuable as an object lesson for the student of heredity and of stirpiculture.

The heroine of the story—a story of real life, not fiction, as that word is commonly understood, is the daughter of an English "evangelist," who doubtless is mainly responsible for what seems the abnormal sexual endowment of his child, and who, when confronted with the knowledge of the natural result of such excessive endowment, drives his daughter from his home, into what is commonly called a "life of shame," from which life she is rescued by two men who are humane enough and unconventional enough to defy Madame Grundy and, each in turn, ally his own life with hers, and risk his own hope of success in the world, to save a woman whom both church people and "respectable" non-churchgoers, condemn to a social "hell on earth," from which hell there is practically no redemption.

A paragraph or two from the booklet itself will help to give a correct view of the leading thought of one of the rescuers of Jeannette, and the difficulties he had to contend with:

"Poor Jeannette! Though as beautiful as a Greek, she is superstitious as a Buddhist * * * What strangely contradictive cogitations she creates in my mind when, on my trying to paint to her the fearful consequences of remaining in her present mode of life, she quietly says;

"'Oh! God is good; He will take care of me.'

"God is good! And this said with full faith, by a woman in a brothel; by a woman at the sight of whom pious people sweep up the skirts of their garments and flee as from a damned thing! Such is the effect of the fanaticism stamped into her by her self absorbed parent—to trust in God when she should trust in herself.

"Poor girl; she is sore beset. The direful picture of herself shunned by all those more fortunate of her sex whose duty it were to show her most sympathy; the thought of being unearthed from every hiding place, dragged out from every disguise, and driven over the face of the earth like a hunted criminal; the picture of herself a prey to all the infamy and degradation to which the prudish selfishness of our conventional life would subject her, did she attempt to renew her life by one of virtue—still hold her firm to her lamentable occupation, and stand in the way of every suggestion I could make to help her to freedom."

The preface to the second edition says:

"Owing to the deep interest created by this little pathetic unvarnished tale, among those interested in 'Rescue Work' on both sides of the Atlantic, the publishers have been induced to issue this new edition, in the hope it may further assist such workers in their mission.

"The publishers at the same time wish to emphasize that the narrative is taken from real life almost in its entirety and to a much larger extent than those frequently issued as 'founded on fact.'"

It has always struck me that wrong-doing arises from a diseased condition of the body. In Earthland prisons are everywhere, hospitals swarm, and mad-houses, penitentiaries, reformatories and places of correction abound. Flogging is esteemed, and is practiced on child, adult and beast. We breed and create criminals, and foster insanity, punishing the first, while we aggravate sorely the last by improper feeding and treatment utterly antagonistic to its disordered condition and overtaxed strength. —Lady Florence Dixie in "Story of Loveland."

It is clearly the interest of employers to reduce wages, to make the people prolific, to keep the workers dependent upon them, and by keeping the poor people to keep the people poor. . . . Certain it is that every dime spent in charity reduces wages a dollar.—Bolton Hall.

Pray heaven no superior people may hear of the Colorado imbroglio and send a beneficent army to give us good government.—Goodhue Co. (Minn.) News.

Mrs. C. Danzig, Herkimer, Kansas: "Am sorry I cannot extend LUCIFER's circulation in this part of the country. Why, even the so-called Freethinkers shrink from this kind of literature. For myself I want to read all I can get on that subject—am always seeking for more light on the most important of all questions, that of sex. As to change of name, will say that LUCIFER's name is as dear to me as the teachings it advocates."

Adler Jorgensen, Lewiston, Mich.: "Enclosed herewith please find express money order, ten dollars ($10) for which you may (when both pamphlets are out) send me three of each, bound in cloth, and for the balance of the money you may mark up my subscription to LUCIFER. As to LUCIFER's future I am inclined to believe that our friend Wastall's plan would be a good one. Not that I am dissatisfied with the paper personally, or the Anarchy it advocates at the present time, or ever did advocate. But by all means let us have the paper in any style that you think best."

J. Wm. Lloyd, Westfield, N. J.: "As far as I know, or can remember, I never wrote the stanza of poetry that you attribute to me in the number of LUCIFER that contains my reply to Wm. Platt. I don't want to disclaim any love-child of my brain, neither do I want to mob any other man's kid."

Mary Everett, New Haven, Conn.: "Number 3 of 'Our New Humanity' is a gem! I prize it highly. Now I have all but one that were published and right here let me say that if that one is 'defective'—as you say—just never mind that, but send it along if it is readable. The six I have are 'apples of gold in pictures of silver,' and I am very desirous of possessing the whole series. I will send another dollar soon for 'Sex Radicalism' and 'Right to Be Born Well.' How I wish my knowledge of LUCIFER and its pamphlet literature had come earlier. It would have saved me much suffering. Perchance I ought to be thankful, to the exclusion of every regret, that I have at length found you, and that I am privileged to count one among the LUCIFER fraternity. Allow me to reach my hand across the distance that intervenes, to assure you how glad I feel. As far as I can I shall try to help on the 'cause that needs assistance' and to oppose the 'wrongs that need resistance.'"

E. Bordwell, Elk, Wash.: "Dora Forster's 'Sex Radicalism' is the finest thing of its nature I have ever read; so book me for six copies when out. As to the questions: The only one that greatly interests me is, 'How Often?'—taking it for granted that the paper will be issued. It cannot be issued too often to suit me. While I personally respect your views as to 'Anarchy' I do not think it beneficial to the paper to publish the same therein. Think the publication of these views have had more to do with your recent troubles than what you have said on sex subjects."

Mary M. Harrington, Belgrade, Neb.: "Yes, I am a friend of LUCIFER, and will help her when and all I can. As to LUCIFER's future: Think it safe in 'Moses' hands. Wish I myself was in as good ones. Am sending you $2.35 for books, for a young friend expecting soon to marry, and wants to know something. Send Dr. Foote's Cyclopedia of Medical, Social and Sexual Science, $2; Strike of a Sex, 25c; and Primer of Sexual Rationalism, 10c."

[Strike of a Sex has been out of print for some weeks, but we are assured by the publishers that it will be reprinted very soon, and that Zugassent's Discovery will be included in the same cover—all for 25 cents, if I mistake not.—M. H.]

O. C. Heuple, Cedar Glades, via Hot Springs, Ark.: "Should like to hear of Social Radicals who would colonize here four miles northwest of Hot Springs, Ark., in the Ozark Mountains. We have a mild climate; can be out every day in the year. Good soil and a good fruit country. Can raise apples, pears, plums, cherries, peaches, apricots, nectarines, figs and all small fruits. Also English walnuts and pecan nuts. We have a good market, where one can sell direct to consumers, anything one may produce. Hot Springs has over 50,000 visitors yearly, and surrounding country does not supply one-fifth of the demand for produce, etc. Milk sells at 40c per gallon and you don't have to peddle it either. Can secure good land for from $5 up. Comrade Haworth of Philadelphia, Pa., has been here and is favorably impressed and expects to locate here shortly. Beautiful mountain ranges all about here. We are 600 feet above sea level, and as the sun sets it gets cool, and at present it gets down to freezing at night, mostly, and if the sun shines it is 50 to 65 degrees at noon, and the sun shines most days. For more information, address O. C. Heuple, Cedar Glades, R. F. D., via Hot Springs, Ark."

W. C. Wagener, St. Louis, Mo.: "Send me a copy of 'Sex Radicalism,' and, when out, one of 'The Right to Be Born Well,' and the rest of the dollar credit on LUCIFER. I would not change the name; but do as you choose. You are the one who has struggled all these years to make it live; besides, I think the paper doubly well named. Most people don't believe in devils, nowadays."

Joshua Smith, Plainwell, Mich.: "We are delighted with LUCIFER, name and all. What could be more beautiful and more appropriate than Lucifer, Son of the Morning, or Lucifer, the Light Bearer. We have more reading matter than we can use, but we want to help the cause along and we can see that you are gaining ground. Send me one dollar's worth of 'Sex Radicalism' ($1 enclosed). When 'The Right to Be Born Well' is ready I will take a dollar's worth of that pamphlet."

B. L. Hermstadt, Cincinnati, Ohio: "Did Grant Allen write a book called 'Woman Who Dared,' and have you the book? If so, what is the price? * * * LUCIFER suits me as it is. Believe I would feel sorry if any changes were made, outside of seeing it weekly as formerly—if it could be done."

John Carins, Belknap, Conn.: "I think LUCIFER should be published every two weeks. The present name should stand."

Walter Hurt, Cincinnati, Ohio: "Regarding a change of name, there are excellent arguments both pro and con. To the enlightened minds that read LUCIFER regularly, the matter of name is of no consequence—you would not lose a single supporter by making a change. On the other hand, many persons who have no understanding of the real mission of LUCIFER and are ignorant of the true significance of the name, may be repelled by the present title and kept from reading the paper. I would not have you swerve a hair's breadth from the path of principle or lower the least fraction the torch of Truth, yet I believe in making concessions in non-essentials if by so doing we may make converts to the cause. It should be borne in mind that, unlike the names of publications with a changing and not clearly defined constituency, the name of LUCIFER, whatever publicity it may have acquired, is without advertising value. Of course you could not part with the old name without a pang, but I am sure you are too big and too broad to allow yourself to be influenced in the matter by any feeling of personal pride. Still, no other name that suggests itself to me seems adequate when compared to the luminous and virile LUCIFER. It is difficult for the individual reader to decide this point, and I'm sure whatever decision you may make will be unanimously endorsed.

"Fortnightly issue is frequent enough, not because we wouldn't welcome weekly visits from LUCIFER, but for the reason that at your age your work should not be too arduous.

"I see no reason for change of form. The present form is most convenient for mailing, is satisfactory for the reader to handle, and is least expensive.

"Make the price sufficient to support the paper properly (whatever that may be) on a basis of present circulation. Surely LUCIFER is worth its cost; and it is due you and the cause, and, I should think, preferable to LUCIFER's friends, that money necessary to sustain the paper be sent in the form of subscriptions instead of as gifts.

"Confine yourself to a consideration of the sex question. It is a field in which you are splendidly alone."

FREEDOM IN LOVE.

Nemo—in LUCIFER, December 8—gives my idea of Freedom in Love. The love is all right, but the consequences of the love relation is another thing.

Woman must weigh conditions in the light of reason for or against her in love matters.

To sacrifice honor, good name, etc., and to lose all opportunity to win a man with ambition and noble aims in life—to be content to be a mere servant to men, or to selfish desire on the sexual plane, surely this would be to make life a complete failure. The angels know it doesn't pay.

Not to do counts in the race for progress. Woman must not be led; she must herself lead.

A drunkard is weak, and by the psychic influence of desire, or thought not necessarily his own, is drawn into the saloon.

Sexual desire has the same influence on woman, in her transition stage of evolution. If she yields to desire she falls into a negative condition and social degradation follows.

Strength of organism or of character is not developed in or by the yielding attitude.

My observation of men tells me that if a man is drawn hither and thither in love affection his power of self-preservation is lessened; he suffers and doesn't know the cause. His weakened condition makes him feel the need of the stimulation of a new love, and he soon finds, not the strength he needs but what the angels know to be failure.

This city—San Francisco—is full of men who are ready to draw down every woman they meet, without being willing to assume responsibility, or to make conditions suitable or respectable.

Besides all this, such habits of life stamp their mark on character; the influence of such conduct lingers in the thought atmosphere, and the impression sent out is undesirable to finer natures.

Our thoughts are potent forces and we should not be led by them, but should hold them and use them in a consciously intelligent way for the promotion of health, happiness and a better expression of life.

The battle for supremacy must be fought in the soul; the victory is sure; the body is then drawn to higher vibrations by the laws of attraction. All is mind.

A FREE WOMAN.

To bring into the world a malformed or weakly child is here regarded as a terrible calamity—nay, even a disgrace. The child of enforced motherhood does not (in Loveland) look into men's eyes with mute reproach, upbraiding them with its puny life. Motherhood is in woman's hands, and in her care, her honor and her prestige are at stake. Can there be a greater reproach to parents than offspring born without health and strength?—Lady Florence Dixie in "Story of Loveland."

HUMAN NATURE.

It is a monthly magazine, now in the fifteenth year of publication. It is Unique, Eclectic and Scientific. It treats of Phrenology, Psychology, Health, Sociology and all subjects which pertain to the welfare of humanity.
The character of man and animals is in accordance with their physical organization. This is determined by size of body and brain, shape of head, texture, temperament and facial expression.
HUMAN NATURE illustrates these principles by picture and pen, and teaches its readers how to read character. Its ethics are ennobling; its style, while strong, is sprightly, and its literary standard high. You need HUMAN NATURE. Address

WOMAN'S SOURCE OF POWER.

BY LOIS WAISBROOKER.

Evidently this veteran iconoclast has lost none of her wonted vigor, courage and incisiveness when attacking the wrongs under which woman has suffered in all the past and still suffers—and through her sufferings the entire race of man suffers and must continue to suffer till woman is free and self-owning. "Love attraction, the Feminine Principle, is the Builder of All Living Forms," fairly well epitomizes this, the latest of Mrs. Waisbrooker's many contributions to the literature of Sex Reform. Forty-eight pages, well printed on superior paper. Sent from this office, postpaid on receipt of price, 25 cents, in stamps or postal currency. Coin is apt to be lost in transit.

MAN IS WOMAN'S.

All our pulses but repeat
Man is woman's.
Born of womb and fed of teat,
Man is woman's.
Early she pillows our head on her breast,
Later she pillows our head on her breast,
At latest she pillows our head on her breast—
Man is woman's.

By the flush on warm maid's cheek,
Man is woman's.
By the happy child-birth shriek,
Man is woman's.
We are her children—she makes our blood,
Then in our children continues our blood,
She in their children eternals our blood—
Man is woman's.
—William Platt, in "Women, Love and Life."

THE IMPURITY OF DIVORCE SUPPRESSION.

Almost every leading magazine of opinion, as well as many of the popular daily papers, have had, or now are having, their symposia for the discussion of the divorce question—necessarily involving, as it does, the discussion of marriage and the family. In fact, the question of divorce involves to a very marked degree the whole subject of morality, of religious and political governments, and their relations to human life and progress.

Prominent among the larger magazines that have opened their columns to the discussion of divorce and its allied problems is the "Arena," now under the sole editorial management of its original founder, B. O. Flower, and now published by Albert Brandt, at Trenton, New Jersey. The January Arena contained what the editor calls "an exceptionally strong paper giving a discussion of the divorce question from the standpoint of an orthodox Christian. . . . a strong plea against divorce from the conventional religious viewpoint." The February number contains what Mr. Flower calls "an exceptionally vigorous plea for liberal divorce laws, presented from the viewpoint of the science of sex psychology."

The writer of the plea for liberal divorce is Theodore Schroeder, who a few years ago became somewhat famous for his "strong opposition to Mormonism," and for the part he took "in the prosecutions of the case against Brigham H. Roberts, the polygamous congressman from Utah."

As a lawyer Mr. Schroeder naturally stands up for "legality"; for state regulation of all the relations of human life by legislative enactment; but the conclusions logically drawn from his article entitled "The Impurity of Divorce Suppression" are certainly in the direction of more freedom for each to regulate his or her own life, rather than in the direction of meddlesome interference by state or church authority.

Hence I regard this Arena article of Theodore Schroeder as all the more valuable because prepared by a man whose educational bias and professional interests ally him with those who would deny individual freedom in the most vitally important of all human relations—that of sex and reproduction.

In his opening paragraph the writer calls attention to the irrational and illogical methods of argument on the part of those who advocate suppression of divorce. He says:

"At the present time many persons of pretentious respectability are agitating the public by their denunciation of divorce and divorcees. Many of these mistake vehemence of declaration for weight of logic, and rely more upon the vituperative denunciation of easy divorce as impure, than upon a rational discussion of the social utility of divorce suppression. Being possessed of but little worldly wisdom, these persons are mainly impelled to action by religious fanaticism. This appears from the fact that they support their position only by religious dogmas, never by arguments based upon practical observations of human life. Since persistence and vehemence in the denunciation of easy divorce is likely to increase the number of moral perverts, it becomes necessary to refresh our memory as to the genesis and consequences of the marriage ideals of these people with whom 'purity' is a profession."

"Moral perverts" is a phrase of such wide significance that it seems a serious omission on the part of Mr. Schroeder that he did not define his meaning with greater clearness. Subjectively speaking, there is danger, no doubt, that the opponents of divorce, by their "persistence and vehemence in denunciation," will become mentally and morally unbalanced, perverted, while objectively the danger is far greater that those who find themselves uncongenially and unhappily married will be deterred by such denunciations from seeking the natural and rational remedy in divorce, and that by submission to what they conceive to be the popular verdict become more and still more morally and mentally unbalanced, perverted from what is normal, healthful and happifying, and thus become centers from which radiate waves of immoral and perverting influence upon all they come in contact with.

How many men and women—especially women—have been driven to insanity, to suicide—slow or speedy suicide—or to murder, because of hopeless conjugal mal-adjustments? That is, because of the odium of divorce, to say nothing of the delay, the expense and the hard swearing necessary to obtain divorce.

A young married woman was asked if she would not try to get a divorce from her husband under such and such provocations.

"No, indeed!" was the prompt and emphatic answer. "I should not try to get rid of John in that way. I'd just kill him!"

Not many women have the courage to kill their husbands, but how many murderers owe their homicidal tendencies to the fact that their mothers had murder uppermost in their minds for many months, perhaps, during the prenatal lives of their sons—simply because of the difficulty of obtaining honorable separation and respectable readjustment of conjugal relations?

To what extent the men and women who persistently denounce easy divorce are morally responsible for the murders that have so shocked the people of Vermont and Pennsylvania that they now intend to murder by hanging the women accused of killing their husbands in those states, cannot be known or thown, but looking for probable causes these denouncers of divorce are by no means guiltless of complicity in those fearful tragedies, illegal and legal.

Much of the space of Mr. Schroeder's eight-column article is taken up with a clear and forceful presentation of the history of sex-suppression and perversion, especially the religious phases of such suppression and perversion. Evidently he has given to his subject careful, thoughtful and searching investigation, and deserves the thanks of all lovers of freedom, of truth and justice—all who believe that human progress must come through enlarging the bounds of liberty rather than through suppression or denial of liberty.

In his closing paragraphs the writer asks questions that his opponents will find it hard to answer, such as—

"If marriage may legitimately include business partnership, intellectual companionship or general good fellowship and mutual helpfulness, why should not a failure to realize these be just as important in insuring divorce as sex-disappointment, especially when the rights of children can be properly protected, or where the union is childless? Why should the woman who finds herself married to an habitual drunkard, or abusive brute, have inflicted upon her as a life sentence a choice between submitting to his foul embraces, or living in enforced loneliness? Only the blissful irresponsibility of ignorance, or the cruel paternalism of fanatics could inflict such penalties. Of such records has the history of fanaticism ever been made."

VERY ESSENCE OF PROSTITUTION.

Continuing his attack upon the stronghold of political and religious despotism—namely, our canonical and statutory regulation of sex and marriage—Mr. Schroeder says:

"If anything in the natural sex-relation is impure, surely a compulsory continuance of a loveless marriage must be the extreme of that impurity. This, when submitted to for mere support, is the very essence of prostitution, even though done with priestly sanction.

LEGALIZING COMPULSORY SEX-SUPPRESSION.

"To deny persons the right of remarriage is but an indirect attempt at legalizing compulsory sex-suppression. The consequences only thoughtless people will fail to foresee. It means increased sex irregularity, usually with the countenancing of concubinage, and especially on the part of women sex-inversion and other perversions still too numerous. These are the impurities which social purists will promote by divorce suppression. What our equally impractical and only a trifle more barbarous ancestors failed to accomplish, by suture, by infibulation, and by their girdles and padlocks of chastity, the visionary purists of to-day hope to enforce by mere verbal denunciation or avoidable statutes.

VENGEANCE OF OUTRAGED NATURE.

"The attempted living of anti-natural ideals, if long persevered in, will almost certainly result either in a breaking down of all social barriers, in a worse substitute, or in disease, which is the usual vengeance of outraged nature. Those who do not know this should ask their physician to loan them a few books on the psychology of sex foolishly excluded from public libraries. It is here, as with all other superstitions, those least informed are usually the least modest about obtruding their ignorance into the lives of others.

IMPURITY OF "PURISM."

"The epithetic argument against easy divorce recommends itself to the mental indolence of professional reformers, and is more effective upon the hystericals than any scientific disquisition based only upon social utility. However, when the time comes that there is any real danger of our reverting to the ideals of the insane of the dark ages, the newly-born science of sex-psychology will bear some testimony upon the impurity of 'purism' which will not be to the taste of either the professionals or hystericals; but it will out. In the meantime, let us remember that people are not always as good as their boastings, and that the only excuse for any law is that it increases human happiness without unnecessarily curtailing human liberty, or infringing upon our equality of liberty.

"That marriage law is best which allows the greatest liberty consistent with equal liberty, and which affords just protection to each individual directly concerned and the state against pauper and degenerate offspring. Society in its collective capacity cannot be harmed, and if all individuals are protected from harm, from injustice, the social order is perfectly preserved. So, then, let us unite to defend the liberty of all to live natural and happy lives through easy divorce and the right of remarriage.

"New York City. THEODORE SCHROEDER.

Bravo, Brother Schroeder! Here's my hand in cordial endorsement of the evident aim of your entire Arena article, and especially commending the spirit of the last paragraph thereof. Jefferson said: "That government is best which governs least," and so also of marriage laws. Yes, "Society in its collective capacity cannot be harmed," simply because, like the orthodox God, it is a mental concept only, a myth, having neither "body nor parts." Hunt for it, and we find it not. We find only women, men and children. Only real persons (not personifications) can be harmed, and therefore only such need "protection from injustice," from invasion, and when this is done "the social order is perfectly preserved."

And what is true of society in its collective capacity is true likewise of "the state," and for exactly the same reasons. Hunt for the state, and we find it not. It is a mental concept only. It is without body or parts. It "cannot be harmed," and therefore it needs no protection. If Brother Schroeder could wholly divest himself of state-olatry—worship of a myth born of the same mother that gave us the "personal-God idea," that gives us the idea that the state is an entity, a personality, with rights that must be respected and honored far beyond and above those of the individual man or woman—I think he would soon see that our "paupers and degenerate offspring" are mainly produced by the state? No, not by the state, for the state does nothing at all, whether good or bad, but are produced mainly by the invasion of the rights of individual and real persons, by men who personate this myth, this personification called the state!

The cure, then, as some of us see it, for the evils known as pauperism and degenerate offspring lies in the direction of the abolition of the state, or the restraint of those who claim to represent the state. Then let education do its perfect work. Let investigation and enlightenment be made universal by the removal of all statutory limitations upon saving knowledge; all enactments that now make it a prison offense to teach in plain language all that is known in regard to the origin of life. Let Sexology, the science of creative life, be taught in the family and in schools, also from pulpit and public platform, as the most important of all branches of human knowledge. Let "sex-psychology"—quoting from this masterful essay of Theodore Schroeder—take its place at the head of all the elogics, because most nearly related to the origin, the evolution and development of human life, of human progress, of human happiness.

M. HARMAN.

LLOYD'S PATHETIC PESSIMISM.

I don't want my discussion with Lloyd to usurp too much space. But it opens up main issues. Lloyd's pessimism would appall me did I not feel it to be so wholly untrue. I don't think I quite understood him at first—I do now, and am filled with sorrow for him, and would fain lead him to a more cheerful view of the case.

He says (Jan. 5): "Four-fifths of all women in civilized countries to-day (and men, too), are, when viewed from the standard of even a not very high ideal, unfit for parenthood." I do not believe any such statement. I do not believe that the creative force is virtually bankrupt. On the contrary, I am every day more convinced of the splendid solvency of the creative force. Against Lloyd's painful hopelessness I venture the assertion that nine-tenths of our men and women are full of sound possibilities for children. My only qualms in saying this come from the fact that I fear I am unjust to the other tenth.

What have we a right to expect from children?

Not that they shall be angels, but that they shall contain possibilities of good average men and women, capable of continuing the life force, so that it very slowly but surely mounts on and on to higher things. Such children are possible to nine-tenths of us. Lloyd's despair is unjustified. Lloyd does not realize how grand the creative force is, how splendidly it does its work, how boldly it defies the forces that endanger it. It is a modern disease to despair of the race, and Lloyd has it badly. I have known, personally, at least a dozen couples over whose marriage the wiseacres have shaken their heads for one reason or another, and in every case Love has triumphantly justified his glorious name in the children. The greatest of modern biologists reject the hopeless views of the past school, and proclaim the wonderful vitality of the seed. Let Lloyd meditate on this fact, that the greatest spiritual force of modern lives, Beethoven, was born of a drunken father, whom Lloyd would unhesitatingly have declared utterly unfit to have a child. And the creative force in its incomparable wisdom produced the noblest spiritual utterance of modern times. It was as Blake so grandly said: "The Son of God should be born of a poor harlot, to show the Eternal Hope that lies in Humanity." So I am stricken with real sadness thinking how much Lloyd misses, not realizing this. I am not concerned with fearing lest Lloyd could take this superb faith from me—he could no more do that than deprive me of daylight by trying to argue that the sun was a myth. Through all our errors, failures, follies, crimes, patiently the Creative force restores, renews, progresses. This is the history of human progress—there is no grander faith than this—no doctrine so inspiring or so true.

It is this knowledge that gives me so grand a happiness, that makes my blood glow with a faith so really glorious and triumphant that Lloyd's pathetic unbelief comes in pitiable contrast. If the author of "Dawn Thought" could but believe in this, the greatest, truest, surest of all dawns!

His attitude toward Sterilizers springs directly from his sad unbelief in the grandeur of the seed. He imagines sterilizers to be led by a perception of their unfitness for parenthood, and to act "in the interest of posterity." Some of them doubtless are; these would be far happier and better members of society if (except in very extreme cases) they were led to see the unreasonableness of their unbelief (a modern nerve disease largely), and given the larger, nobler, healthier faith. Most of them could have capable children. But many Sterilizers are so because they are drifting without any adequate faith. Christianity has gone, and no valid faith in the Eternal Scheme has replaced it. They are lost units, with no deeper idea than a listless seeking for pleasure. They need the grand awakenment. There are infinite possibilities in the race; the man who can awaken them is the man who works miracles to-day. The small voice of hopelessness is worse than useless; what we most need is vital faith—faith, above all things, in the creative forces.

Lloyd asks me a question, and I will answer it. He says: "If a woman refuses motherhood because conscientiously convinced that her life can be better devoted to other ends, is she better or worse than the mother of a large family?" Firstly, what other ends are there so noble as bringing splendid children into the world? Secondly, are not her other ends bettered also by her being a mother? A mother does not necessarily relinquish all else. My wife did good public work before her marriage and does a certain amount after, and maintains that her outlook is broadened and her work all the better for her being the mother of two splendid boys.

Does Lloyd imply that capable women should avoid having children and leave child-bearing to the lower grade women? How does he square his last question with his doctrine of propagation by the fittest only? He is in direct contradiction with himself. So when he asks: "Which, Platt, the work or the motherhood?" I can reply with my whole heart, "Both."

One very typical case occurs to me. The woman was delicate and became engaged to a robust young man. Her relatives were against her marrying, on the score of her health. She married; the croakers predicted her death at the first child-birth. She bore her husband eight vigorous, intelligent children, and at the end was healthier than at the beginning! This is one instance out of many even in my personal experience. The croakers, if listened to, would mean to the world an incalculable loss of love, life and joy. The underrated factor is the marvelous power of love—love, the life-giver.

London, England. WILLIAM PLATT.

DON'T FORGET, good friends all, to send us names of independent thinkers—New Thought people, Rationalists, Agnostics, Spiritualists, Materialists, Free Religionists, Theosophists—to whom we may send sample copies of Lucifer, "Son of the Morning," "Herald of the Dawn," "Harbinger of the Good Time Coming"! We have some hundreds of copies printed extra each issue for the express purpose of sending them out as samples, and, if possible, we want several hundred new names each week, or each fortnight. And if with the names a few postage stamps can be sent to help pay the cost of wrappers and of mailing, all the better, but send the names!

NEMO REPLIES TO LYDIA.

We sometimes expect women to reason, and some can even now, but they are as rare as reasoning men. I attempt to consider certain facts with Lydia R. Todd, and in return get personalities and ridicule. Whether "Poor Nemo" needs pity or deserves ridicule is a question that should not be given space. The debate should be limited to jealousy, love, freedom, mating. To assume that my associates are bad is also poor business, irrelevant and impudent. I do not associate with the "males" cited. It is possible to observe others than our near friends. I shall not direct any "barnacles" to Mrs. Todd. They prefer the trusting, loving, innocent sort than can be fooled, and they must find their own victims.

Science begins with induction, hence with facts. Jealousy is a fact so universal that it must be dealt with. It is of two kinds: one leads to tyrannical acts, and the other causes disappointment, perhaps grief, and a desire to get away from a mate and his or her new attraction. The first is more to be ashamed of, but this is the sort I have frequently seen among the most advanced radicals—anarchists, so called. The Berlin Heights colony, I am told, failed on account of jealousy, of which sort I do not know.

It is proper for Lydia R. Todd to take the postion she does of freedom and independence, and pity all who feel jealousy, but will that position satisfy all, and are those whom it does not satisfy to be blamed, and advised to change their natures? Her plan is one that I think would suit men as they are to-day, rather than women, men oeing said to be more changeable, liking freedom without responsibility. If women wish to train men into such a system, that is their right, but they may find it burdensome. No man loves very strongly a woman whom other men may love the same way.

All the wise writers say women demand continual petting. If this desire is to be satisfied, some kind of "union" is necessary. An all-controlling, exclusive love of two people is one of the facts to be dealt with. In a million cases such love has caused a permanent bond. If either foregoes passing attractions for the sake of this bond, how is freedom violated? Does freedom demand that the one tries to crush what seem to be natural feelings? This is the issue. I say no. Lydia R. Todd seems to say yes.

My frailities need not enter into the matter. They may be, or not, troublesome enough to me, without letting the public exploit them.

If I start out to gain manhood by "swatting" every man of the sort named, my swatter would be worn out. There are hordes of such men. In fact, there are few other kinds. But I will try, on condition that Lydia will send me an anatomical chart locating the "gob," the proper swatting point. She might also explain why the man should be swatted for telling about acts done under freedom; why it is right to do an act, but wrong to mention it.

LOVE.

Learn this, that our loves are more important things than ourselves—for we are this generation, but our loves make the next. And the worthiness of the loves of men and women may ever thus be tested by this simple test—the measure of the Joy with which the children are begot, received, brought up. Love comes to us as the first and greatest dawning of unselfishness, on which all unselfishness is founded—it grows out of our gratitude to her who, giving herself freely up to the pains of childbirth, forges with us a link in the chain that shall stretch over thousands of years! For love is the smithy where we forge eternity.—William Platt, in "Women, Love and Life."

Subscribers who receive more than one copy of Lucifer, when not ordered, will please use the extra copy or copies to induce their friends to subscribe, it only for a trial trip of three months for 25 cents. Stamps received in payment. As the paper weighs less than one ounce a copy can sent to a friend in a common 2 cent letter, with an ordinary sized sheet of note paper.

Men at some time are masters of their fates;
The fault, dear Brutus, lies not in our stars,
But in ourselves that we are underlings.

AMERICAN POSTAL INQUISITION AT WORK.

A letter from Postmaster Coyne of this city, dated Chicago, Feb. 1st, and addressed to the publisher of LUCIFER the Light Bearer, explains itself:

"Sir: I am in receipt of the following communication from the department at Washington:

"'Washington, D. C., Jan. 30, 1905.

"'The Postmaster, Chicago, Illinois.

"'Sir: I am in receipt of the following communication from the Deputy Postmaster General of Canada:

"'I beg to advise you that a copy of a paper called 'LUCIFER,' dated Chicago, Ill., November 24th last, has lately been submitted to this Department and attention called particularly to an article entitled 'Sex Radicalism.'

"'This article this Department considers so suggestive and degrading that it has felt itself obliged to add the name of this paper to its prohibited list.

"'May I ask you to kindly advise the publisher of 'LUCIFER' that his paper can no longer be sent to a Canadian address and that any copies of it found in the Canadian mails will be promptly destroyed.'

"'I have the honor to request that you convey this information to the publishers of LUCIFER and also advise the inspector in charge at Chicago.

"'Very respectfully,

"'J. J. HOWLEY,

"'Acting First Assistant Postmaster General.'

"Respectfully, F. E. COYNE, Postmaster."

I have transcribed this letter as received from the Chicago postmaster, without alterations or additions, whether of quotation marks or otherwise, and will simply ask the readers of LUCIFER to carefully consider the same, from the standpoint of American citizenship—of self-respecting, self-directing, self-owning American citizenship; the standpoint of those who know their rights and who dare maintain them; the standpoint of those who believe in the principle enunciated in the first amendment to the constitution of the United States, namely:

"Congress shall make no laws abridging the freedom of speech or press," etc.

It will be seen that J. J. Howley, Acting First Assistant Postmaster General at Washington, directs the Chicago postmaster, F. E. Coyne, "to advise the inspector in charge at Chicago." The inquisitorial power of the Canadian officials can destroy the copies of LUCIFER found in the Canadian mails—thus deliberately robbing Canadian citizens of the property for which they have paid their money—but these inquisitors cannot arrest and imprison an editor and publisher living in Chicago. If, however, the advice of Acting First Assistant Postmaster General Howley is acted upon, it means the possible arrest, trial and imprisonment of LUCIFER'S editor and publisher.

I know not the name of the "inspector in charge at Chicago," but have been told that it is none other than the former inspector of mails at Topeka, Kansas, to whose vigilance and industry as inquisitor was due the two years' actual imprisonment of this same editor, and the long drawn prosecutions that made him "a prisoner at large," under heavy bonds, for seven other years and more, in addition to the years spent by him behind the bars, wearing the stripes of a convict.

Whether Inquisitor McAffee is ambitious to add to his laurels by sending up LUCIFER'S editor for a term of months or years in the Illinois penitentiary at Joliet, I have no means of knowing, but have been told that he has been doing what he can to deprive LUCIFER of its rights to second-class rates in the common mails since our removal to Chicago.

In thus speaking of the acts of the Canadian and United States officials in their treatment of LUCIFER and myself, I wish once more to say that I cherish no revengeful feelings toward any of them. So far as the officials here in the Chicago postoffice are concerned I cheerfully testify that, almost without exception, their treatment of me has been considerate, courteous and gentlemanly. If LUCIFER has been denied at any time its just share of rights and privileges, the fault has not rested with those in charge of the Chicago postoffice. Even in the case of the man McAffee; although his demeanor in the Kansas court that tried and condemned me was that of the sleuth—that is to say, his manner showed unmistakably that he enjoyed his vocation of hounding men to prison, not the manner of a public servant charged with the performance of a necessary yet very disagreeable duty—notwithstanding all the years of anxiety and deprivation, of loss and suffering to self and friends caused by this man's persistence in prosecuting me, for no crime, be it remembered, except that of telling some very unpleasant truths, and for trying to waken the public conscience to a sense of responsibility for the abuses that shelter under our present sex and marriage system—notwithstanding all this, I pity rather than blame the man McAffee, and would not, now or at any time, change places with him for any consideration whatever. I pity him as being the victim of bad heredity, or unfortunate environment, or both, just as I pity any pervert or degenerate specimen of the genus homo, and would be glad to do anything in my power to induce him to change his mode of life, his life of mental and moral prostitution and criminality, as I very honestly and sincerely regard the life of a professional inquisitor, commonly called an "inspector" of mails.

During the past fifteen months four articles in LUCIFER have been selected as "suggestive and degrading" by the censors, all of which were written by women, not one written by a man; all written by women of culture, of refinement, of mature age—one a grandmother. Is it probable that these women are less capable of judging as to what is proper to place before the eyes and minds of the young than are the men who have put their seal of condemnation upon what their sisters have written for publication? What say our readers?

Next issue of LUCIFER will probably contain a summary of the history of the postal statutes under which prosecutions are brought against editors, publishers, book-sellers, etc., for alleged violation of the canons of "moral purity," so called.

SEX RADICALISM.

At last, after long delays and postponements wholly unlooked for and very provoking, we are promised, once more, that some time during the present week the booklet "Sex Radicalism" will be ready to ship to purchasers. As already announced, the price per single copy, paper cover, will be 25 cents; six copies for one dollar. Bound in cloth, 50 cents each, with usual reductions to those who buy to sell, or to give away.

The chapter headings are as follows:

Chapter I—Who are our Teachers?
Chapter II—What must we learn in Health Science?
Chapter III—Sex as a Social Force.
Chapter IV—What is permanent in the Puritan Ideal?
Chapter V—Puritan Sex System as it actually is.
Chapter VI—The Sex War.
Chapter VII—Sex Denial under Bondage and under Freedom.
Chapter VIII—What is Marriage?
Chapter IX—What made Emancipation possible?
Chapter X—An Ideal of Sex Life.

A goodly number of very excellent hand-books have already been written and published treating upon Sex as the controlling force in human life, but while all are good and useful, it is believed that "Sex Radicalism," by Dora Forster, fills a place not yet occupied by any of the previous writers on sex reform.

Besides the ten chapters named, there are ten pages of selections from the pens of Robert B. Kerr, Edward Carpenter, Percy B. Shelley, Dr. E. B. Foote and others in the same line of thought.

The publisher's preface, in part, reads thus:

"The mistake of Christendom, above all other mistakes, is its failure to give a rational education to children in regard to sex. And growing out of this fundamental mistake the crime of Christendom, above all its other crimes, is its treatment of womanhood and motherhood in the sex-relation.

"Out of this mistake of mistakes, out of this crime of crimes, more than from any other cause or causes, have grown up the inequalities, the despotisms, the slaveries that now curse all the nations of the world calling themselves Christian.

"Much the same impeachment will hold as against the non-Christian or pagan nations of the world, but when the comparative advancement in general intelligence of the so-called Christian nations is considered the above charges are more conspicuously true, more pre-eminently true, as against the latter named nations or communities of people.

"Havelock Ellis, the distinguished Sexologist of England, is quoted as saying:

"'I regard sex as the central problem of life. And now that the problem of religion has been practically settled, and that the problem of labor has at least been placed on a practical foundation, the question of sex—with the social questions that rest on it—stands for solution. Sex lies at the root of life, and we can never learn to reverence life until we know how to understand sex—so at least it seems to me.'

"Doctor Ellis puts it mildly. If we cannot 'reverence life' without a knowledge of sex, then the murders, wholesale and retail, for which Christian nations are conspicuously notorious are directly traceable to a lack of knowledge of sex."

We are glad to report that orders for "Sex Radicalism" still continue to reach this office in gratifying numbers, and the prospect now is that a second edition will be called for in the not distant future.

LUCIFER'S SYMPOSIUM.

Since May last the question of LUCIFER'S future has been considered in "Committee of the Whole," as the men who make and unmake our nation's laws are wont to say. Several hundred letters have been received from subscribers and helpers giving their views as to what, in their opinion, would be the wisest and best course to pursue in order that the best results may be achieved by the paper that for more than two decades has been called LUCIFER THE LIGHT-BEARER. This long-drawn symposium may seem to some readers quite unnecessary—that the space so occupied could be put to better use. One or two of these have expressed the opinion, in language most emphatic, that the editor shows too little independence in the matter of proposed changes, and that he should decide for himself without consulting the opinions or wishes of others, whether friends or foes.

If LUCIFER'S editor were an autocrat, or if he owned the millions of William Randolph Hearst, or of Carnegie or Rockefeller, then such advice might be quite right and proper. But while it is quite true that an editor and publisher should have a mind of his own and that the final decision of what the name of the paper should be, also as to its place of publication, frequency of issue, price per year, etc., should rest with him, it is certainly quite right and proper that he should consult with his helpers, his co-workers, in regard to important changes, such as those just mentioned.

Speaking in the first person, instead of the third, I would briefly add, for this time, that in publishing letters from friends in reference to changes I have tried to treat all fairly and impartially, having due regard for the limitations of space, not wishing to have other important matter crowded out to make room for the symposium on changes.

"But why continue the discussion so long? Why not act? Why not decide and be done with it?" has in substance been asked by more than one.

Several reasons for this delay might truthfully be given, but, for the present, one only must suffice, and that reason is sufficiently explained in this current issue, entitled "The American Inquisition at Work."

For several months past I have been officially notified, from time to time, that the "Sword of Damocles" hangs over LUCIFER'S head. In other words, that the Inquisition is getting ready to strike a blow that will probably mean the beginning of another long and hard fight for freedom of speech and of press, if it does not mean the final extinguishment of LUCIFER'S light.

This fact, this threat, seemed to me reason enough for indefinitely postponing the decision in regard to changes, especially change of name. That I was seriously considering a modification of the old name, many of LUCIFER'S most faithful friends and efficient helpers know. But to do anything that might be construed as a weakening, a compromise with, or a surrender to the forces of suppression, was to me intolerable—an idea not to be entertained for a single moment.

Am I right in taking this view?

M. HARMAN.

BOOK REVIEWS.

"Thoughts of a Fool, 258 pages; $1.50. E. P. Rosenthal and Company, Chicago and London. Chicago Offices, Northwestern University Building.

Whether "the ways of God are as foolishness to man" or not, certainly the ways of some men are as foolishness to the world in which they live. The author of "Thoughts of a Fool" writes as though she (the author is reputed to be a woman) was proud of the appellation of fool, which title she opines will be hers when the world has read her book. Cheerfully she takes the name and the fame, only bent upon delivering her message to that world. In twenty-five chapters of autobiography, criticism, wit and argument Evelyn Gladys unbosoms herself to all the rest of creation, and tells it what she thinks of it.

There is no worship of custom in these pages, nor is there either any bowing down to sacred ideals; everything is tried and measured by standards at once unique and original; standards which the author derives from her inner consciousness, so to speak, after perceiving that the world is a place where people talk and yet do not do; a place where it is only necessary to profess a belief in a thing, and not at all necessary to do that thing. Moral standards, religions, philosophies, sciences, marriage, government and all the other sacred vessels of our varied virtues are taken up by her only to be cast down and broken into fragments.

The author of "Thoughts of a Fool" is an iconoclast of the first order; and she would sweep away without compunction all our idols. She works in a very original manner and in a style which makes up in vigor for whatever it lacks in other ways, and which sparkles with wit and laughter. She is not too particular about her language, either, seeming to look for the words which will express her wherever they may be found, and coining words without compunction if such are not forthcoming.

The book is radical to a degree beyond most radical books; nor does it stop with mere attack, but builds up where it tears down, and in the cheerful spirit of a physician who feels that he has done you a service by removing something which has given you distress for long.

The author claims to be a child of love, and in a chapter entitled "My First Case" eloquently champions her own cause and that of all other independent women, setting forth their claims in a manner which the truly good would find it rather hard to effectively meet. She seems to realize the evil of authority in general, and in various chapters shows that she understands the value and importance of liberty.

Replete with fun and apt illustration, appealing to tears and smiles alike, "Thoughts of a Fool" asks us to take off our masks and be introduced to ourselves, and almost persuades us that we will not want to disguise ourselves any more, accomplishing the task by talking to us in such a way that we feel at once glad and strong. W. F. B.

"Things as They Are," by Bolton Hall, is an interesting volume devoted to Tolstoi-ism—the doctrine of unselfishness carried into practical life. That the author is not a blind imitator we gather from the first chapter, an essay on lying, a practice which Mr. Hall defends on the grounds that it is part of the world's evil and must therefore be borne, share and share alike, by humanity; that an attempt to evade it by establishing a "little private heaven" of truth and goodness amid the world's warring elements must result in failure. It would be interesting to obtain reports from more who have tried the experiment. Mr. Hall's attempt evidently did not give satisfaction.

The volume contains, among other interesting chapters, one on Education, in the line of Herbert Spencer's argument; and one on Legislation, attacking the latter author's views as to the increase of this evil, the argument being that the majority of enactments now passed are merely adaptations of old laws to new conditions, and that in reality freedom of every kind is increasing.

One-half of the book is given over to fables, which may please those who find symbolism necessary to their daily welfare. On the whole, the volume deserves recommendation as suggestive if not as instructive literature.

Less can be said of "Even as You and I," by the same author. This volume of parables may be best commented on by a reprint of the first number, "The Learned Teacher."

"At the forks of the highway of life a man set up a guidepost to point the way to the heavenly city. He wrote it in beautiful Aramaic, and put it behind a tree. Still the people went astray. Then he set a woman in the road to point out the guidepost. The people could not understand it: (it was excellent Aramaic). He got a professor to help her. The professor translated it to everybody. The people said they did not believe that either the woman or the professor knew the way themselves, and that they were a nuisance, anyhow. Then the man set up an arrow on a post. The people saw it, and went the way it pointed."

It is a pity the author did not profit by this example and tell us in three words what he meant, instead of putting it in beautiful Arrow-maic.

Laurium, Mich. OSCAR SCHLEIF.

Mankind has never wholly recovered from that reign of insanity. Indifference to many of the plainest health laws of nature is still the reproach of our so-called civilization. Our moralists rant about the golden streets of the New Jerusalem, but find no time to expurgate the slums of their own cities; our missionary societies spend millions to acquaint the natives of distant islands with the ceremony of baptism, but refuse to contribute a penny to the establishment of free public baths.—Oswald's Bible of Nature.

Either to reproduce the perfect likeness of an individual in cold, inanimate marble, or in the warm coloring of oil, is considered a superlative gift, and ranks among the highest accomplishments. The ability to produce a word-picture in form accurate and exquisitely dainty, is another rare gift. Gifts are many. Yet the most marvelous of them all, the supernal gift of Motherhood, lies ignored or rejected at the threshold of almost every woman's life.—Margaretta Gray Bothwell.

Virtue consists, not in abstaining from vice, but in not desiring it.—B. Shaw.

VARIOUS VOICES.

S. J. Leslie, Newburgh, N. Y.—"Enclosed please find $1.00 for renewal. The writer considers LUCIFER the grandest paper published because of its advocacy of sexual science. There is no education so necessary to-day, and nothing more conducive to the happiness of men and women than advanced ideas on sex matters."

J. G. Hunter, Sheridan, Wyo.—"Enclosed find $2.00, as I promised in my letter of January 7th. Use it in any manner that you choose. I think it is needed as much to pay running expenses and postage as any way. Stick to the sex question. That is what the people are more ignorant of than anything, and that is what they need to know."

Aurin F. Hill, 13 Isabella street, Boston, Mass.—"Sex Reform set apart by itself would be a failure, the same as other reforms have failed by going apart. With several departments ideas are sent into minds of many who would not care to read the paper if it were all sex reform. One page of a sort (class) will do more education where needed than many pages of one line—Sex Reform in too large doses. LUCIFER, the Light Bearer, is a good name."

W. E. Taylor, Mt. Vernon, O., 503 W. High street.—"Have you any subscribers in or near this town? If so, will you give me their address? My subscription to LUCIFER expired about a year ago and you don't know how much I have missed it. Please place my name again on the list and I will remit the amount in a few weeks. Enclosed find stamps (10 cents) to pay for sample copies to the persons named in this letter."

[Though an old "Buckeye" myself I am not very familiar with the geography of that state, and so will ask our subscribers living near Mt. Vernon to write to Bro. Taylor, if they care to make the acquaintance of an old-time reader and helper of LUCIFER.—M. H.]

Anon, Cincinnati, O.—"I agree with 'Nemo' that under present conditions women should be slow to invite the slurs and sneers of ignorant or thoughtless people in their advocacy of the purity and beauty of sex and their right to freedom in the sex relation. As yet the subject is too little understood and there is so much danger of doing harm instead of good at this stage of enlightenment.

"Moreover, women want to be sure that their position on this most important (to them) of all questions is the right one before they enter into it heart and soul. And unless a 'vital interest' is at stake no woman should feel called upon to make a public avowal of anything that will tend to humiliate her in the eyes of unthinking or conventional people.

"Unfortunately, yielding to sex attraction even when mutually ardent, does not by any means always insure an unselfish, much less an abiding, respectful love, and experienced people are under great responsibility for their utterances to young, impressionable or inexperienced girls and women.

"So far as men are concerned, it is too often the case that when trouble comes in at the door, love flies out at the window. And, oh, the pity of it! All women have not the clear, beautiful soul of a 'Hester Prynne' or a 'Monna Vanna.'"

Janet Gordon, Cincinnati, O.—"A line in Adeline Champney's article published in the last issue of LUCIFER strikes me as being so odd that I cannot refrain writing about it to you. It is this:

"'Laura Smith Wood is a free woman, a free mother, who is trying to sustain herself and children outside the conventional bondage which superstition imposes upon her sex.'

"Now, it is a part of that same superstition which decrees that the free mother shall sustain her children.

"Any woman has the right to motherhood under whatever conditions she chooses to accept, of course I am not questioning that, but is it either good or wise to discard only part of any superstition? And are the women who are assuming entire responsibility for children really helping or bettering the race? Has any woman a right to bring a child into the world deliberately knowing that that child will have neither a father's love nor companionship? A woman's duty is not to herself alone, but to her child and its father as well."

ON THE FAMILY.

A change somewhat similar to that in the position of Jealousy has taken place in the role of the Family during the progress of society into and through the period of civilization. In the primitive human association the Family was large in extent, and the outline vague; the boundaries of kinship, in cases where the woman might have several husbands, or the husband several wives, were hard to trace; paternal feeling was little or not at all developed; and the whole institution rested on the maternal instinct of care for the young. In the middle societies of civilization, and with monogamic arrangements, the Family grew exceedingly definite in form and circumscribed in extent. The growth of property and competition, and the cellular system of society, developed a kind of warfare between the units of which society was composed. These units were families. The essential communism and fraternity of society at large was dwarfed now and contracted into the limits of the family; and this institution acquired an extraordinary importance from the fact that it alone kept alive and showed in miniature (intensified by the darkness and chaos and warfare outside) the sacred fire of human fraternity. So great was this importance, in fact, that the Holy Family became one of the central religious conceptions of the civilized period, and it was commonly thought that society owed its existence to the Family—instead of, as was the case, the truth being reverse, namely that the Family was the condensation of the principle which had previously existed, though diffused and unconscious, throughout society.

The third and future stage is, of course, easy to see—that is, the expansion again of the conception of the family consciously into the fraternity and communism of all society. It is obvious that as this takes place the family will once more lose its definition of outline and merge more and more again with the larger social groups in which it is imbedded—but not into the old barbaric society in which the conception of human fellowship lay diffused and only dimly auroral, but into the newer society in which it shall be clear and all-illuminating as the sun.

Thus the Family institution in its present form, and as far as that form may be said to be artificial, will doubtless pass away. Nevertheless there remains, of course, and must remain, its natural or physiological basis—namely, the actual physical relation of the parents to each other and to the child. One, perhaps, of the most valuable results of the Monogamic family institution under civilization has been the development of the paternal feeling for the child, which in primitive society was so weak. To-day the love of man and wife for each other is riveted, as it never was in ancient days, by the tender beauty of the child-face, in which each parent sets with strange emotion his own features blended with the features of his loved one—the actual realization of that union which the lovers so desired, and which yet so often seemed to them, after all, not consummated. The little prolongation of oneself, carrying in its eyes the star-look of another's love, and descending a stranger into the world to face a destiny all its own, touches the most personal and mortal-close feelings (as well as perhaps the most impersonal) of the heart. And while to-day this sight often reconciles husband and wife to the legal chains which perforce hold them together, in a Free Society, we may hope, it will more often be the sign and seal of a love which neither requires nor allows any kind of mechanical bond.—From "Love's Coming of Age," by Edward Carpenter.

HUMAN NATURE.

It is a monthly magazine, now in the fifteenth year of publication. It is Unique, Eclectric and Scientific. It treats of Phrenology, Psychology, Health, Sociology and all subjects which pertain to the welfare of humanity.

The character of men and animals is in accordance with their physical organization. This is determined by size of body and brain, shape of head, texture, temperament and facial expression.

HUMAN NATURE illustrates these principles by picture and pen, and teaches its readers how to read character, its ethics are ennobling; its style, while strong, is sprightly, and its literary standard high. You need HUMAN NATURE. Address

PRICE FIVE CENTS. CHICAGO, ILL., MARCH 2, E. M. 305, [C. E. 1905]. WHOLE NO. 1034

UNDER THE HARROW ONCE MORE.

Pursuant to instructions from headquarters at Washington, D. C., as outlined in our issue of Feb. 16, the United States censorship of press and mails has begun another crusade against Lucifer and its editor. On Friday of last week, United States Deputy Marshal Bach made his appearance at our sanctum and, introducing himself, read a warrant issued by Commissioner Foote of this city for my arrest, charging that I had "knowingly" deposited in the postoffice an "obscene publication, namely, Lucifer," etc.

At the commissioner's office in the Monadnock building, I was asked whether I would be examined on this charge at once or waive examination and be released on bond for my appearance in case an indictment should be "found" against me by the United States grand jury, soon to be impanelled in this city. Acting on the advice of friends, I waived examination and entered into bonds in the sum of $1,000, with one surety, for my appearance when called to answer to the charge aforesaid.

Next day, two of the daily papers, the "American" and "Inter Ocean," sent representatives to get Lucifer's side of the story of the arrest and its cause. Sunday morning the "Inter Ocean" contained the following "write-up" on its first page, the first six or seven paragraphs being display head lines:

"Back to Jail for View on Free Love at Age of Eighty.

"Philosopher Who Urges Abolition of Marriage Cheerful in Face of New Conviction.

"Suppression of divorce causes moral impurity.

"Meredith believes in short term marriages. I go him 'one better.' Away with marriage altogether.

"Man and wife should live in houses widely apart.

"After a spell of married life the thoughts have all been interchanged, the songs have all been sung.—Moses Harman, Who May Again Be Sent to the Penitentiary for His Published Views on Marriage.

"Ready to go to prison rather than to give up his teachings against marriage and in favor of 'free love' alliances, Moses Harman, the octogenarian philosopher and editor of the Lucifer, is busily preparing for his departure to serve his fourth and perhaps last term in some United States penal institution.

"He began life as a Methodist itinerant, advocating the abolition of ceremonial or other formal marriage. He gives as one of his reasons for his relentless fight against marriage that he was forced into wedlock through the desires of conventional parents.

"Three times has Harman been sent to the penitentiary for his unmasked attacks on marriage and its abuses. He cheerfully expects to be convicted again.

"On Friday he was taken into custody by United States Deputy Marshal A. A. Bach on charges of sending prohibited matter through the mails. He was released on $1,000 bail.

"FREE UTTERANCES CAUSE ARREST.

"In his unique library at 300 Fulton street the aged editor gave a lengthy interview last night while resting from his final inventory before his 'departure for prison.'

"'I was arrested this time,' he said, 'for sending through the mails one of the books which I edited, but which was written by Dora Forster, an emancipated woman. It is called "Sex Radicalism," and contains nothing but sound advice on the marriage relation.

"'It says, for instance, that if man and wife lived in houses some distance apart at intervals they would be able to keep up courtship indefinitely. After a spell of married life the songs have all been sung and the thoughts have been interchanged. Then comes the time when the husband regrets that the emotion of the first meeting will never come again.

"AWAY WITH MARRIAGE.

"'If the abuse of marriage cannot be abolished without the abolition of marriage as an institution, away with the institution. Let nature and reason rule and responsibility govern. Let humanitarians lay down the laws, and not alleged law givers who have one wife at home and another "wife" at their respective capitals.

"'The evils of liberty can be cured by more liberty. Evils which spring from licentiousness cannot be cured by legislation. You cannot make moral people by law.'

"'You believe in limited families?'

"'Certainly. Roosevelt in his anti-race suicide talk is the typical politician. Politicians always want quantity instead of quality.'"

The "American's" report of the case has, at this writing, Sunday eve, not yet appeared, but the Chronicle of Saturday morning contained the following, with the usual proportion of display headings:

"Defies Law to Decry Marriage.

"Moses Harman, More Than 80 Years Old, Held for Postal Violation.

"Editor of Magazine Which Attacks Wedlock Renews Fight After Prison Terms.

"For years, it is declared, Moses Harman, more than 80 years old, has been the editor of a magazine which constantly wars against marriage and against the treatment and education given young women by their mothers and has twice served terms in the penitentiary, so great was his love for his theories.

"After his release from the penitentiary several months ago, he again took up the editorship of his paper, entitled the Lucifer, with the result that he was arrested yesterday afternoon by Deputy United States Marshal A. A. Bach at his home, 500 Fulton street, on a charge of sending prohibited matter through the mails. He was arrested on evidence gathered by Postoffice Inspector McAfee and when arraigned before United States Commissioner Foote he waived examination and was held to the federal grand jury in bonds of $1,000.

"WOMAN AIDS AGED EDITOR.

"In connection with the printing of the Lucifer he has published a large number of books and articles written by a woman of the name of Dora Forster. All these articles strike at the base of the sacredness of marriage and the proper teaching and rearing of girls.

"In them it is declared that women of the United States are horrified that Chinese women are forced to allow their feet to be bound until they are crippled, when young women of the United States are subjected to treatment which has far more serious effects.

"Harman was arrested in Topeka, Kan., and sentenced to the penitentiary under the postal laws for a term of five years. He served seven months, when the court of appeals ordered the case reconsidered, because the judge who sentenced Harman neglected to include in his sentence the words 'at hard labor.' On retrial of the case the aged defendant was sentenced to one year in the penitentiary.

"RESUMES ASSAULT ON MARRIAGE.

"A short time after he completed this term he was again arrested, tried and convicted and was forced to serve another year in the penitentiary. After being released each time, it is said, he returned to his work and wrote on the subjects which had occupied his mind for years, with the result that complaints were made to Postoffice Inspector James E. Stuart concerning certain undesirable literature which had been received through the mails."

It is needless to say that these reports are mainly wide of the mark, as newspaper reports are apt to be. Instead of taking time and space in correcting these errors I content myself for this issue—the hour being now past twelve of the night on which our paper goes into type—with reproducing an editorial printed several years ago in Lucifer, giving a fairly good statement of the doctrines advocated by myself for many years past, covering many if not most of the points upon which I was catechised by the representatives of the Chicago "American" and "Inter Ocean":

The chief editorial in a recent "Chicago American" is headed, "What Can a Nurse Girl Do?" and opens thus:

"An intelligent young woman writes to complain of her lot. She says she is twenty-five years old, and has a fair education. She feels that her life is wasted because she spends it in the care of a young child, a boy four years old. 'The boy is bright and intelligent'—writes this young woman, 'but he is not my own son. Will you tell me what interest I have to live for?'"

In reply to this disconsolate young woman, this type of thousands of women and girls in cities and country alike, the Chicago "American" says—incidentally, as it were:

"Of course, a healthy, intelligent young woman ought to be married and adding to the world's children, rather than caring for some other woman's children."

This brief quotation from the letter of the nurse girl, and the comment thereon by the editor of the "American," suggest volumes. They bring us face to face with the primal trust! the basic trust upon which all other trusts feed; or perhaps I should say, without which trust no other trust, or combination to rob the masses of their equal right to the earth and its opportunities, could ever have been formed.

Careful study of man and his institutions shows that in no other way could ambitious and power-loving individuals obtain and hold, from age to age, control over other human beings of their own tribe or race. Under natural selection of fatherhood, untrammeled by the artificial or conventional rules—laws—men would be born so nearly equal in mental and physical endowment that privileged classes and orders would be an impossibility. Without privileged classes and orders monopoly of the earth would be an impossibility.

Hence the denial to women—the nurse girl for instance—of the right to have a child of her own, including the right to choose the father of that child without first promising eternal fidelity to some man—without waiting till some thing in the shape of man proposes marriage, this is the worst, the deadliest, most damnable of all the denials of natural right of which human beings have yet been guilty.

Because of this denial all other denials of natural right become possible, practicable, inevitable.

The true physician seeks for causes for the malady before prescribing a remedy. He is not satisfied with the discovery of secondary or surface causes. He seeks for the hidden, the deep-seated, the primary, the fundamental causes, well knowing that the removal of secondary or surface causes alone will not cure the disease.

If this is true of the diseases that afflict the individual it is true also of social or societary diseases—the economic ills, the industrial, the governmental or political evils under which human beings now struggle and suffer, and against which so much valiant and tireless work is being done by our reformers, our various Socialistic Organizations, our Single-Taxers, our Moral Education Societies, Temperance and Peace Societies, etc., etc.

Is it any wonder they fail of satisfactory results while ignoring the basic causes of the ills they are trying to remove?

Illustrative of the incidental results of the Motherhood Trust, hear what Dr. E. B. Foote says in regard to societary regulation of the sex appetite, the gratification of which appetite leads to and precedes motherhood:

"Men and women go up and down the earth famishing for something they cannot or will not tell you what—and finally in their blind search for what their systems crave, take to liquor, tobacco or opium."

It may be safely assumed that nine-tenths of the crimes and vices for the prevention and punishment of which laws and governments are supposed to be instituted and supported, are the direct or indirect result of interference with the sexual promptings of nature, by the thing called organized society.

M. HARMAN.

Obedience simulates subordination as fear of the police simulates honesty.—B. Shaw.

AN AGNOSTIC'S REPLY TO A GNOSTIC.

As an example of clever sophistry, James Armstrong's criticism of certain sexual theories of mine deserves attention. Otherwise it has no claim to notice. It is interesting, but scarcely instructive.

Armstrong finds argument a means for amusement. He is a verbal fencer of superlative skill who delights in exhibiting his dexterity as an expert swordsman prides in the rapid play of his rapier. And, regarded from a purely exhibitory viewpoint, it must be admitted that his performance is admirable. None is better equipped than he for intellectual contest. It is probable that as a controversialist his equal does not exist. Were he to ally himself with truth, he would be invincible. A thinker he is, but with mind more subtle than profound, fitting him with peculiar excellence for that fallacious reasoning which the superficial investigator finds so fatally convincing. But for the vital verity of things he concerns himself not the least.

For many years I have watched with interest Armstrong's mental acrobatics, and during the period of this observation he has both espoused and opposed, with impartial inconsistency, about every theory in the province of modern philosophic thought. These frequent changes of position do not appear to have resulted from any change of opinion, his ideas being always conveniently interchangeable in agreement with whatever opportunity for disputation.

In this respect he reminds me of a story about Tom Marshall, Kentucky's famous legal luminary and inspired inebriate. On one occasion he was hastily called in by the defense in a criminal trial. He had no detailed knowledge of the case, but attorneys for the accused depended upon his readiness as an advocate to secure their client's acquittal. When he responded to this emergency call Marshall was deeply immersed in his cups, and his muddled mind failed to fix correctly the relative positions of the parties to the trial. He denounced the defendant with vitriolic vituperation, exhausting his remarkable powers of revilement in the effort, painting a picture of guilt that appalled his hearers and made conviction seem a certainty.

"Tom! Tom! you're on the wrong side," whispered the prisoner's dismayed chief counsel, tugging at Marshall's coat tails. Thereupon the brilliant and resourceful dipsomaniac gathered his straying faculties to recover his lost ground.

"This, gentlemen of the jury," he thundered, "is the fallacious line of argument that presumably will be followed by the prosecution in an attempt to convict this innocent man, and I present it to you in advance in order that I may demonstrate to you how false and misleading it is."

Then followed an eloquent appeal for the prisoner that resulted in acquittal.

Doubtless, without the least intending to be so, Armstrong is right on one point. There is, in truth, no difference between myself and his pet Thomas cat, as he so pleasantly puts it. That is, there is no essential difference. As a monist, I must admit this. Whatever difference exists is only one of degree. Both were evolved from identically the same elements, and are invested with the same attributes, varying in relative proportion according to the needs of our respective natures. I cannot help being sib to the feline race any more than I can help it that Armstrong is my brother.

It is Armstrong's custom in argument to transcend the limitations of positive knowledge and take refuge in the realm of nebulous conjecture, well aware that from among the possibilities of the unknowable any statement it may please him to make none may hope successfully to controvert. Thus, he asserts that "Nature is wholly unconscious." Whether or not this is true, I do not pretend to know. Not being gifted with Armstrong's cosmical discernment, I am less dogmatic than he; my modesty with reference to these macrocosmic matters inclining me toward agnosticism. But if Nature be unconscious, what then is the source of human consciousness—whence comes the manifest intelligence of Armstrong and his "pet Thomas cat"?

Armstrong declares Nature is without design. I confess I am quite as unable to disprove this assertion as Armstrong is to prove it. But assuming it to be true, since Armstrong has said it, how are we to account for the unfailing accuracy of Nature's processes? Why do not contradiction and chaos result from this alleged aimlessness?

Why is it there are no accidents in Nature? How is it that she is so infallibly systematic and inerrantly precise, if she is herself an accident? The freak or "sport" in Nature, albeit always the result of man's violation of natural law, is so infrequent as to be valuable for museum purposes.

In answer to this Armstrong will doubtless say something about the "conservation of Nature." That is merely a phrase of convenience, without definite meaning. It cannot adequately account for the fact that nothing exists except responsively to some demand—naught is created except out of the stress of conditions. The First Cause precedes creation. If such a paraphrase is permissible, I would say that Necessity is the mother of creation. A need arises, and lo! straightway its complement exists where nothing was before. It may be there is no Infinite Intelligence upon which the dependent individual draws; but whether insensate or not, Nature, the All-Mother, not only provides for every need of her creatures, both animate and inanimate, but she comforts and consoles ceaselessly, she adjusts eternally, forever healing wounds and hiding scars. This is not sentiment; it is a statement of fact which the atheist as well as the pantheist must admit. Nature tolerates no superfluities. Nothing in the universe can long survive the obsolescence of its utility, as witness the vanishing process of physiological vestigia. How then, in the absence of design, does Armstrong account for this convenient and very desirable arrangement?

The reference to the typewriter automatically producing manuscript in similitude of Nature's process in evolving "puppies and philosophers," does not seem to me consistent. Possibly this is because I do not understand it. Armstrong modestly admits that I have not his "true metaphysical insight into Nature." Owing to my mental shortcomings, I am unable to conceive of law independent of design, which constrains me to congratulate Armstrong on the fortunate fact that, under the accidental arrangement of things he has so conclusively demonstrated to his individual satisfaction, he was not accidentally born a "puppy" instead of a philosopher."

WALTER HURT.

[The controversy between Brothers Armstrong and Hurt, though very interesting reading, borders too closely upon the metaphysics of the "Schoolmen" to be altogether suitable matter for LUCIFER'S very limited space, and therefore, with the very best of feeling toward both, I shall be compelled to ask these good friends to select some other arena if they wish to continue their display of skill in crossing intellectual swords.—M. H.]

THAT SCAPEGOAT ANARCHY.

What a blessing that we still have this word and its sublime ideal among us; Anarchy, terror of our age, terror to the coward in the hut as well as on the throne,

. . . . "but it the earth shall see!
I am an Anarchist! Wherefore I will Not rule and also ruled I will not be!"

These three lines of John Henry Mackay came into my mind when I read in recent numbers of Lucifer several letters in which the writers suggested that Anarchy in Lucifer's columns should be suppressed and Lucifer made a pure and simple advocate of Freedom in Love and the Sex Question in general. The writers undoubtedly meant it well, but forgot to consider the question from all sides, partiality and lack of information perhaps being the causes of one-sided views also.

Now, all flattery aside, Lucifer is an advanced journal and its readers are advanced people. As this is generally admitted, it must also be granted that this could not be the case if Lucifer had not an editor advanced in modern thoughts on most lines pertaining to social and individual conditions in our system of society. Therefore it is a mental impossibility for an editor of an advanced journal to continually harp on what is considered the one and main string and never touch the others, which are more or less related to the one, in order to bring out the harmony. Thus he sounds, besides the main string, the strings of discontent, of joy, of pain and tranquility; he tells us of experiences in the past and, guided by these, he peeps into the future; he gives his views on government and postoffice tyranny, on colonization, on Freethought, Socialism, and a hundred other topics, and why in the name of common sense should he cowardly refrain from writing on Anarchy? Those who would have him do so, desire an impossibility; they, like the postoffice censors, desire him to suppress an advanced thought and not be true to himself. We are in favor of a free platform, how then can we be so intolerant and shun Anarchism? We are in favor of freedom in love; to gain this point the individual must be free also, and is there anyone more in favor of individual freedom than the Anarchist? Many, or perhaps most of you stand for variety in love, in pleasure, in work, in eating and drinking, etc., why not for variety in thoughts, which is as important as any other mentioned variety?

It is true, Lucifer is making headway very slow, too slow for us all, but an occasional remark on Anarchism, pro or con, is not the cause of it; the real cause is that freedom in love, free motherhood, radical reform in the sex question, is, like Anarchy, a new thought and still regarded as too advanced and too unconventional by the majority living in the conventional darkness. To make a concession or compromise to the Illiberals by banishing Anarchy from Lucifer's columns in the hope of gaining their good will is bad policy, for "against ignorance even gods battle in vain" (Schiller). To the Illiberals, sex reforms, as they are advocated in Lucifer, are just as horrible as Anarchy, and to please them you would logically have to drop both Anarchy and sex reform. This will, fortunately, not be the case, because in spite of the slow progress, our cause is not a hopeless one, and Moses Harman did not go through his many experiences just for the fun of it. Let us be true to ourselves, let us be tolerant and set an example of a free platform, free thought, free speech and free press in Lucifer, and when a question needs to be sifted from an Anarchist point of view, let us do so.

CARL NOLD.

PRESENT SEXUAL MORALITY ILLOGICAL.

And the type of men that I conceive emerging in the coming years will deal simply and logically not only with the business of death, but with birth. At present the sexual morality of the civilized world is the most illogical and incoherent system of wild permissions and insane prohibitions, foolish tolerance and ruthless cruelty that it is possible to imagine. Our current civilization is a sexual lunatic, and it has lost its reason in this respect under the stresses of the new birth of things, largely through the difficulties that have stood in the way and do still, in a diminishing degree, stand in the way of sane discussion of the matter as a whole. To approach it is to approach excitement. So few people seem to be leading happy and healthy sexual lives that to mention the very word "sexual" is to set them stirring, to brighten the eye, lower the voice and blanch or flush the cheeks with a flavor of guilt. We are all, as it were, keeping our secrets and hiding our shames. One of the most curious revelations of this fact occurred only a few years ago, when the artless outpourings in fiction of certain young women who had failed to find light on problems that pressed upon them for solution (and which it was certainly their business as possible wives and mothers to solve) roused all sorts of respectable people to a quite insane vehemence of condemnation. Now, there are excellent reasons and a permanent necessity for the preservation of decency and for a far more stringent suppression of matter that is merely intended to excite than at present obtains, and the chief of these reasons lies in the need of preserving the young from a premature awakening, and, indeed, in the interests of civilization, in positively delaying the period of awakening, retarding maturity and lengthening the period of growth and preparation as much as possible. But purity and innocence may be prolonged too late; innocence is really no more becoming to adults than a rattle or a rubber consoler, and the bashfulness that hampers this discussion, that permits it only in a furtive, silly sort of way has its ugly consequences in shames and cruelties, in miserable households and pitiful crises, in the production of countless needless and unhappy lives. Indeed, too often we carry our decency so far as to make it suggestive and stimulating in a more unnatural way; we invest the plain business of reproduction with a mystic religious quality far more unwholesome than a savage nakedness could possibly be.—H. G. Wells, in "Anticipation."

Let us not burthen our remembrances with a heaviness that's gone.—The Tempest.

OUR CONTRIBUTORS will please bear with us. It is simply impossible, under ordinary conditions, to print half the articles written for Lucifer's columns, and now under the extraordinary conditions the difficulty is greatly increased.

AN EMERGENCY FUND PROPOSED.

Again our old-time friend and helper, Arthur Wastall, comes forward with a plan that he thinks is demanded by the exigencies of the times. Writing from London, South Africa, he says:

"So Lucifer has been struck another 'back hander' by the powers that be! You have taken it in the right spirit, however, and I, too, am inclined to think that out of the apparent evil will come good.

"Persecution is to be expected, and I suggest that we sex reformers, independently of class, creeds, tags or labels, unite in endowing our only organ with a fund to meet exigencies caused thereby. As a change of tactics or policy appears to be impending, why not make this a standing feature of the new order?

"For my part I will subscribe $5 yearly to the periodical, whatever its name, and a like sum yearly—until the amount is deemed adequate and it is closed—to some such extraordinary expenditure fund, to insure its continuance in all times of persecution and stress. Then if the crass stupidity of officialdom in the United States becomes too great, let our Journal of Sex reach us from some more enlightened part of the globe, such as Japan, for instance."

Brother Wastall then refers to the failure of the London "Adult" a few years ago, and thinks we should profit by the mistakes of the earnest and every way excellent people who, for a time, conducted that admirable reform journal. Upon the question of responsibility for failure, I prefer to say nothing, since I am not in position to judge. Proceeding, Friend Wastall says:

"In my opinion, what is then immediately wanted is a Lucifer 'Emergency Fund' of say $500 minimum and a doubling of the subscription list for 1905. This as a start. Then with the increase to both funds that should accrue when contemplated changes are inaugurated, we shall surely ere long be in a position to resist successfully even frontal attacks from no matter what quarter.

Cordially always,

"ARTHUR WASTALL."

In a postscript, the writer of this letter adds: "Will mail you another pound first of next month, and another in March. Am anxious to hear more of the colony project. A nucleus of the right stamp of refined women is the first step, I think, towards formation.—A. W."

Thus it is seen that Brother Wastall is not formulating plans for others to carry out, but is quite willing to bear his share of the hard work. This he has been doing for a score years or more.

As to his suggestion in regard to the first requisite for success in establishing a colony is to secure the co-operation of intelligent and refined women: Colony life means home life and there can be no real home without woman, acting as the "nucleus," the attracting, the centralizing, the unifying, the creative element thereof.—M. H.

CAUSE OF THE TROUBLE.

The two articles pointed out by the United States prosecutor as the cause of Friday's arrest are, (1) "A Sex Ideal," by Dora Forster, printed in Lucifer of Nov. 24, 1904, and (2) "More Thoughts on Sex," by Sara Crist Campbell, in Lucifer of Dec. 28, 1904. Our readers who have kept a file of last year can see by reference to these two numbers what it is that has called forth the censure of the guardians of public morals. Those who have not kept a file can see a copy of "A Sex Ideal" by sending for a copy of the pamphlet, "Sex Radicalism," now being mailed from this office, price twenty-five cents, paper cover. No copies of Lucifer, Dec. 28, are now obtainable.

COMPANIONSHIP.

There are various objects for companionship. Every combination of two or more persons must have for its object the advantage of companionship, and the advantage of accomplishing more than could be done by each individual member working alone and single-handed.

Success requires that all parties to a combination must be congenial. Each must possess merits such as will attract the others.

An equal combination or partnership calls for partners possessed of equal merit in some respect. Both justice and success demand this.

This will be true so long as we continue to maintain conditions of individual ownership.

Freedom means a condition of equality.

Slavery means a condition of inequality.

Slavery exists because we live under a condition of individual ownership and also a condition of inequality.

Were all persons equal, there could be no slavery. Taking the world as a whole, of course, we know people are not equal.

At the same time we know that by dividing up into groups of say one hundred, there are those in each group who are congenial—who by their merits attract each other.

Would they set themselves about it, very likely they could be divided into smaller groups of congenial partners, ranging from two to say ten in each group, and these embracing nearly every person in the one hundred group.

We witness persons forming groups, partnerships or combinations for the conduct of business enterprises. As a result, we witness the accomplishment of gigantic undertakings.

We witness mountains, rivers and lakes being tunneled, large manufacturing and vast commercial enterprises, even continents being crossed by railroads.

All these being but results of combinations.

Take it on a smaller scale, we witness homes being organized and maintained, and this usually by the combination of two or more persons. We find that wife and husband are not imperative in the organization and maintenance of a home. For instance: When away at school we witness the formation of groups or clubs for purposes of home making. Two to a dozen or more students will procure a dwelling, often hire a housekeeper and conduct a home.

The point we wish to make is: Why do so many radical people live and work alone and single-handed?

Why do they suffer isolation from their kind and often endure poverty, by tugging along alone and single-handed?

Why not take notice and draw some good and practical lessons from what is going on in the world?

Why not be practical? Why not change locations and get together in groups, small or large, and form combinations in business and in living and emerge as much as possible from the slavery of our times?

Two or more men can combine and maintain a home all together, when neither one alone could very well do so. Two or more men can combine and run a shop, store, factory, or a farm, when neither working alone and single-handed could do so. This being true of men, it is also equally true of women.

All this being true, why not both radical men and women put forth their best efforts to get together and form combinations of two or more for mutual benefit, both in the matter of maintaining homes and in the conduct of business? Why continue to cling to the chains which isolate and enslave?

The writer has in mind numbers of bachelor women who toil for hire, dwell in uncongenial boarding houses, suffer isolation from those of their kind, spend all they make and continue to toil on and on, seemingly without a ray of hope, unless it be of something about as unreasonable as that some bird of the air will bring to them some man suited to their taste whom they may marry and form a combination with.

Yes, and the writer also knows of about an equal number of bachelor men about equally as miserably situated and equally as unreasonable and equally as helpless to saw off the chains that enslave them.

Again: There are fully as many men and women tied in marriage to uncongenial mates, who continue to suffer untold miseries and who feel that the devil is on one side and the deep blue sea on the other; that to remain they suffer, and to saw it off and break up their homes they may suffer still more.

Why not all these suffering ones exercise some good, cool, common sense?

Why not all saw off the chains that enslave them? Why not change locations, get together and form sensible combinations in groups of two or more and maintain new and better homes, and also conduct such lines of business as they can?

This is what the writer wants to witness.

SUBSCRIBER.

IS MARRIAGE CONDUCIVE TO CONNUBIAL FELICITY?

Editor Lucifer: Your interesting paper comes regularly, and with your kind permission, I would like to make a few comments on the above caption. Does marriage under the present law induce connubial felicity? I do not believe it. Every citizen, however, is obliged to go through the ceremony under the edict of the law and the church, "what God hath joined together let no man put asunder," yet I notice that through the same court of justice, which is founded upon this law, that there is not a city in the United States but whose calendar is teeming with applications to give the lie to what God hath joined together.

In my opinion, God has about as much to do with it as the "trusts" have in lessening the price of commodities. One robs the people of the coat of a divorce, and the other of what they eat, drink and wear.

When God joins you to the one you love, the priest expects a fat fee for it. Men go into partnership and remain partners just as long as it is mutually agreeable, and no longer. Marriage is really a partnership, and why should a priest be called upon to form a partnership in the name of God, when that partnership is so easily dissolved by law, and not by God? In my opinion, if marriages were made by contract, there would be less divorces, for the simple reason, that if both understood that they were both on their good behavior, the man will, when he realizes he has a good wife, and the woman knows she has a good husband, be more likely to fulfill their part of the contract.

The most perfect union between man and woman I have ever met was by a verbal contract between them. That man was a devoted lover every day, and the wife (so called) could never do too much for her "dearly beloved's" happiness. Neither God nor a priest had anything to do about it. Does the animal kingdom, or the birds of the air, call in a priest in the name of God to unite them? It is love, and love alone, which should unite a man and woman. Will evolution ever evolute mankind up to the point attained by even the animal kingdom? They have no divorce laws, neither do they call upon a priest to marry them.

By-the-by, Bro. Harman, I obtained to-day one of your photos from that charming little woman, Mrs. Fry, and at once decided that you were a much better looking man than myself, and in order to convince you of the fact, I shall send you one of mine, and if you are an impartial judge I am sure we will not disagree upon that point.

I remain, very truly yours,

Los Angeles, Cal. G. MAJOR TABER.

[The photo came all right—many thanks. On careful comparison of the two, I beg to differ from the decision of Brother Taber. Perhaps the trouble is that neither of us is "an impartial judge."—M. H.]

FOR THE LOVE OF WILLIAM PLATT.

William Platt, you are delicious. The humor of pitying my pessimism could not be excelled. They say you are an Englishman, but if there is no Celt in you, I'm an Irishman. Shake, Billy! Bedad, when I come to England I'll seek you out, sure.

But now, after the laughter and applause, let me say one more word to our audience. I am a serious man and I don't want this witty and eloquent rainbow of yours to befog the real issue.

Our difference may be stated in a few words: Platt says, whoever you are, if you love enough you will have good enough children. I say nothing against love or faith, but if the workman's optimism causes him to omit putting a good share of his love into the fastidious test and selection of materials he will do some damned bad building. Selah!

Don't only wash your dirty cups by drinking out of them, and don't rely on drunkards to beget Beethovens.

The priest says, my blessing will give you God's blessing, and Platt says love alone will give you lovely babies, but the stock-breeder winks and smiles and puts his runts to the knife, notwithstanding. Neither sentiment nor superstition enters into the breeding of prize pigs.

Love's leaning on a rotten stick doesn't make the wood sound.

The question is not one of optimism or of pessimism, but of common sense. J. WILLIAM LLOYD.

There has been much talk about the present-day barrenness and childlessness of women. There is a reason for it—sexual and economic. When the community, or a portion of it, begins to stand by a mother in her sexual equality and right to her motherhood as an individual; and when there is more social co-operation financially for coming children, there will be a change. Many now cry out that the community (in the shape of the government) should assist those willing and glad to become mothers. Something can be done now, to make a beginning. Public thought can at least be agitated; and a stronger and stronger sentiment aroused, which, in the future, will become operative. X.

Success depends upon mental vigor; mental vigor depends upon the right use of your faculties; use makes them more powerful. Only the thoughtful succeed; do not let your brain atrophy; do not let your brain freeze. Do not let it ossify. Do not let it petrify.—Suggestion.

VARIOUS VOICES.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

[Full name and address of writers in this department can generally be obtained on application to the editor.]

Geo. J. Callender, St. Madeline Village, Trinidad, British West Indies.—"I enclose money order for $2, one for Lucifer and the other for 'God and My Neighbor,' by Robert Blatchford. I am trying my uttermost endeavor to raise some subscribers for Lucifer in my vicinity."

Herbert A. Gries, Central House, California.—"Enclosed find money order for $5, to pay for Lucifer one year; also for 'God and My Neighbor, $1; also for 'Love's Way to Perfect Humanhood,' by Agnes Benham, $1; also 'Love's Coming of Age,' by Edward Carpenter, $1. I will take six copies of Dora Forster's 'Sex-Radicalism,' $1, and also six copies of 'The Right to Be Born Well,' when published, and send the money later."

Aurin F. Hill, 13 Isabella St., Boston.—"Lucifer for Feb. 16, 1905, is before me, open at page 252. We should ACT—work and forever vote for equality, liberty and justice for all mankind. You should place Article I of the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States as a regular part of a heading for one page of Lucifer. A company of public speakers and writers should always be ready to defend each case of persecution. All useless and evil laws made by man should be abolished as fast as possible."

James B. Elliott, Secretary Paine Memorial Association, 3515 Wallace St., Philadelphia.—"I wish, if there are any admirers of Paine's work for political, social or religious reform among the Lucifer readers, they would send their names at once to me. I would like to have a representative in each state of the Union, also in England, if possible. There is not a single representative [of the Paine Memorial Association] in the Southern states, nor from Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont or Rhode Island. What has become of them all? We have particular need of as many as possible to help transact important business that requires immediate attention."

S. O. Bishop, Brodhead, Wis., Feb. 21.—"Am at a great loss to know what to say, or to think. Is Lucifer, our 'Star of the West,' destined soon to set, never to rise again?

"Or is a fight all that is needed to save it?

"If fight we must to save Lucifer, I will do all that I can, though it be but little. Whatever you and our best counselors agree on, you may depend on me to assist all I can.

"For the enclosed ten cents, send me another copy of No. 1,033, if the extras still hold out."

[Our supply of No. 1,033—Feb. 16—is ample to meet all reasonable demands.]

Sam Cohen, New York.—"Just received Lucifer and cannot find words to express my feeling of indignation! Is this the land of the man whose birthday we are to celebrate next Wednesday—the man who signed the Declaration of Independence, and who fought so long and hard for freedom?

"Or are we living in Russia?

"Alas, that it should come to this!—in a land where so much precious blood was shed for liberty of speech and of press.

"But surely no man who deserves the name will remain silent. A protest, loud and strong, should now be heard, all over the land, against this inquisition—a protest that shall reach the dull ears of those who hold the reins of power. Yours in protest."

A Friend, Denver, Colo.—"You will find enclosed a five dollar bill, for which you will please send Lucifer one year to each of the three persons herein named. For the remaining two dollars you may send sample copies to some of the teachers of Pennsylvania, whose names and postoffice addresses I also enclose. Send my copy of Lucifer to my roommate, ———. He is his own boss, but I am working for a corporation."

[This is a sample of many letters received by us, that is, so far as injunctions of secrecy are concerned. For several years this intelligent wage slave has been sending us part of his earnings to use in sending copies of Lucifer to teachers and others who, as he hopes, will read and do a little thinking on their own account, but knowing by experience and observation that "corporations have no souls," and that they don't allow their employes to have souls they can call their own, this wage slave tells us in so many words, "I will stay with you as long as you keep my name secret." And this, in the land of the free!—M. H.]

Hulda L. Potter-Loomis, Chicago.—"Replying to letter signed 'Anon, Cincinnati, O.,' in issue of Feb. 16, I would like to say that while it is true that 'the beauty of sex and the right to freedom in sex relation' is 'little understood,' there is much more 'danger of doing harm' through woman's silence upon this vital subject than by the most radical expression of our views. That is the only way we can hope to make an impression upon the minds of women that have grown apathetic in regard to their condition of slavery to men, and in many instances such women have to be startled into a realizing sense of that condition by the very boldness of some emancipated woman's utterance.

"Women who have the courage to do this will ever command the respect of seriously thinking people who witness and are appalled by the increase of the criminal classes and are looking for a solution of the problem which this condition of affairs presents, and they recognize in this advocacy of woman's freedom from the unconditional bond of slavery established by institutional marriage, not only a possible, but a probable remedy, or at least a preventive of further increase of criminals, which is now unavoidable as long as children are conceived under protest by mothers all over the land. As for the 'slurs and sneers of ignorant or thoughtless people'—what do they amount to? Some day they will be breaking their necks to catch up with the band-wagon.

"'Anon' further says 'unless a vital interest is at stake no woman should feel called upon to make a public avowal of anything that will tend to humiliate her in the eyes of unthinking or conventional people.'

"Have we not catered to the opinions of 'unthinking or conventional people' long enough?

"There is a 'vital principle at stake' in this issue of woman's freedom. It is the borning of the child that will emancipate the race. The woman who recognizes her 'divine right' to the control of her own body, to bestow her affections where she chooses, and to engage in the sexual relation only with the man she loves, instead of being forced to submit herself to the embraces of a man who has lost his power of magnetism for her, and whom in many cases she fears or loathes and despises, can never be 'humiliated' by the snubs or sneers of those who have not sense enough to be humiliated by their own degrading subserviency to enforced sexual relation with the men or women whom they no longer love, although 'the law' calls them 'husband or wife,' as the case may be.

"I am perfectly willing to stand for the responsibility of my own utterances upon this subject and do not fear for the consequences upon the young.

"For the sake of future love and happiness of generations to follow us, let us not be cowards—and let me assure the faint-hearted ones in this cause: When you calmly rise above all fear of the world's opinion you will find all adverse opinion taking flight, and former critics giving the consideration to your opinions that is due to them, because born of the courage of conviction."

Lucien V. Pinney, Winsted, Conn., Feb. 2, 1905.—In response to your circular letter, received Jan. 7th, calling my attention anew to certain questions relative to Lucifer and its future conduct, I take the liberty to write as a friend to a friend, without posing for publication or expecting publicity—which latter I dread, and for which, in this case, there is no necessity.

"I note in the first place that your subscription list is increasing. That is an important point, and one which should give you confidence in the course you are pursuing, for whatever may befall a paper, if the subscription list does not run down its future is secure.

"You ask for advice that you do not need; which you will not accept, if it conflict with your judgment; and which, if it but echo your opinions, is superfluous. I do not write to advise you but to do what I commend (or command) you to do, viz., put thought to paper and let it do its work—or not do its work, as may happen in the movement of events.

First, as to name. I say again, do not meddle or quarrel with your good name. To have it stolen may be counted misfortune, but to throw it away is folly and misfortune both. It is unique and appropriate and calls for no apology, explanation or defense. Those people who fancy that by changing the name you will dodge the odium of the subject matter printed under the name, are fit to go about catching sparrows by putting salt on their tails.

"Second, as to frequency of publication. Once a month and then a double dose, is my suggestion. You deal in ideas that will remain fresh four weeks, I should hope. Your method should be leisurely, your pose that of one who can wait, nonchalant and serene, without fret or worry, trusting to the potency of truth. Hurry and worry, importunity and frequent raging belong to the powers of darkness and discord. Be thou patient and unvexed, not over anxious, and not of the order of bustling busybodies and street brawlers, who cannot wait for their little thoughts to cool and clarify before they spit them into the public's face.

Third, as to confining yourself to the sex question. Confine yourself to nothing. Give publicity to the thought of radical thinkers; spread the light; nor concern yourself very much even about the spread of the light. Let the light spread itself, or let it be lost in the stygian darkness. Your business is to "get the truth once uttered," and that should be your chief concern. It is the business of men at large, of the world, to utilize the thoughts of the thinkers, the discoveries of the explorers. Let the scientist stick to his work of observation and announcement. Tell what you know, and if your telling suit me I will accept and use it in my business, or store it away for future use; if it is to me unfit, do not be discouraged or offended, my friend, if I fail in appreciation. Perhaps the need of the hour for me is not so much your gem of thought as it is a bushel of potatoes, and doubtless another day I shall vibrate in response to the same note that to-day I do not hear. Somebody will feel the vibration of his own unspoken thought in your good utterance and bless you for it. Seeds dropped by the careless birds come up and multiply their kind prodigiously, when the proper condition arrives, though that condition be a long time delayed. Seed thoughts likewise move in most mysterious ways their wonders to perform.

"Those people who would have you confine yourself to the sex question or to any other question are probably reformers, and reformers are good people, but prior to reformers are philosophers, as the architect is prior to the builder. The reformer proselytes. He strives to build himself a church, though he sometimes deludes himself by calling it a cause. He frets about a following and would have numbers swell his shout. The philosopher also knows that many hands make light work, but he does not expect the majority of men to take hold with him, and if they did he would suspect his innovation to be no better than a fad. He knows that people are not Methodists because there is a Methodist church. There is a Methodist church because of the existence of the Methodist character—as sure to produce a Methodist meeting house under favoring conditions as an acorn is to produce an oak. When it is otherwise acorns will produce fig trees, and cucumbers bring forth roses. The reformer, on the contrary, knows that the Institution is the father of the Man, and he rolls up his sleeves and doubles up his fists and with concentrated energy and blind persistence rears his institution beside the others and waits for people to flock to it—wondering why they do not.

For instance, the reformer would abolish the marriage institution; but the philosopher knows that the marriage institution is as good as the bulk of the people who are ensnared in it, and therefore he would not abolish it till people are fit to live together without it. And when that time comes, lo and behold, the institution has disappeared. This attitude of the philosopher is not inconsistent with the publication and defense of his philosophy. But there his mission ends, and he should leave to the common people, prodded on as they always are by misery, the work of adapting the new idea to the common life.

"In so far as you belong to the order of reformers, modify yourself and become more philosophic. Care less for converts and more for the blessed privilege of shedding light over the appalling darkness that besets the good old earth. Say the things that you feel delight in saying, and be content with the delight of saying them. Keep on each day so saying and you cannot be confined to anything. Each evil is but part of one stupendous hell, and though you cannot hope to deal with all the evils in one brief lifetime, you can speak out as the spirit moves and so save yourself from becoming the creed-bound victim of self-imposed and needless limitation. Indeed, there is little danger that you will do otherwise, for though you set up metes and bounds, you will surely overstep them on the first occasion."

Laura Smith Wood, the review of whose book, "Mother-Soul," by Adeline Champney, appeared two weeks ago in Lucifer, is at present practicalizing free motherhood, and it was meant at that time to state that the price of the book was 25 cents, and that anyone desiring to contribute to this cause could help her in her effort by sending to General Delivery, Tacoma, for one or more copies. A little contribution from each one will cripple nobody, and will greatly assist an individual woman and a noble cause.

"Poor girl! She is sore beset. The direful picture of herself shunned by all those more fortunate of her sex whose right it were to show her most sympathy; the thought of being unearthed from every hiding place, dragged out from every disguise, and driven over the earth like a hunted criminal; the picture of herself a prey to all the infamy and degradation to which the prudish selfishness of our conventional life would subject her did she attempt to renew her life by one of virtue—still hold her firm to her lamentable occupation, and stand in the way of every suggestion I could make to help her to freedom."—Page 58.

LIBERTY.

Benj. R. Tucker, Editor.

An Anarchistic Journal, expounding the doctrine that in Equal Liberty is to be found the most satisfactory solution of social questions, and that majority rule, or democracy, equally with monarchial rule, is a denial of Equal Liberty.

APPRECIATIONS:

G. Bernard Shaw, editor of the "Fabian Essays" and author of "The Quintessence of Ibsenism": "Liberty is a lively paper, in which the usual proportions of half-pennyworth of discussion to an intolerable deal of balderdash are reversed."

Ernest H. Crosby, author of "Captain Jinks, Hero," and "Swords and Ploughshares": "In these days of running after false gods, it is refreshing to find one American remaining unflinchingly true to Liberty, and using in her defense not his emotions, but a particularly keen and vigorous intellect and style."

William Douglass O'Connor, author of "The Good Gray Poet" and "Hamlet's Note-Book": "The editor of Liberty would be the Gavroche of the Revolution, if he were not its Enjolras."

Aug. McCraith, formerly Secretary of the American Federation of Labor: "Liberty is the only paper that points the way."

Hugo Bilgram, author of "Involuntary Idleness" and "The Iron Law of Wages": Liberty distinguishes itself among economic periodicals by the fearless discussion and condemnation of the faults of the present economic order, and exhibits its fairness by giving its opponents the fullest opportunity for criticism."

Exponent of the Society of Evergreens, composed of men not afraid-of-an-idea (and women).

Among the contributors to this series of sex articles are Drs. Greer, Conger, Hanish, Berrier, Rullison; J. Wm. Lloyd, William L. Garver, Nancy McKay Gordon, Lois Waisbrooker, Elmer Ellsworth Carey, Dora Forster, Harry Gane, James F. Morton, Jr., Mae Lawson, Herself—Ahem! And the Boss and Embossed Evergreen may have a few things to say—and many others of equal ability and familiarity with the subject.

Most of these men and women are writers of national reputation and authors of some of the most helpful books in the English language. Some of them need no introduction to LUCIFER readers, who cannot afford to miss a single issue containing this series, which opened in the January number with a powerful article by Dr. Leroy Berrier.

But this is not all. The articles of Judge Frank T. Reid, the distinguished single-tax advocate and associate editor, are attracting the attention of thinkers all over the country.

WOMAN'S SOURCE OF POWER.

BY LOIS WAISBROOKER.

Evidently this veteran iconoclast has lost none of her wonted vigor, courage and incisiveness when attacking the wrongs under which woman has suffered in all the past and still suffers—and through her sufferings the entire race of man suffers and must continue to suffer till woman is free and self-owning. "Love attraction, the Feminine Principle, is the Builder of All Living Forms," fairly well epitomizes this, the latest of Mrs. Waisbrooker's many contributions to the literature of Sex Reform. RESTRAINT.

The gray, grim ghosts
Of old authority
Clutch at my will
In rough and ruinous restraint.
Like sternly marshaled hosts
I see
The tactics of their phantom drill
Opposed to my complaint.

Theirs is the law
To break my strength of arm,
To quench my heart's desire
And crush my honest thought.
They come to awe
My spirit with the fearsome harm
Of hell's consuming fire,
By such rebellion bought.

I feel the fury of their might
Bind every impulse nature knows.
They blind me, choke my voice
And stop my ears with lies.
Their force is fright,
To check the life that grows
Unshackeled—if its choice
Reach for the open skies.

So through restraint I gain
The greatness to retrieve my little loss
Of pride.
To find all truth springs from the wreck of fear.
And what I thought was pain,
The bravery to step across
The line of prejudice, beside
Truth's banner, dear.

But, more than all,
I give my vanquished foes
Full passports to the peace
My soul has gained.
And all my song shall call
The willing from their prisoned woes
Unto the glad release
That waits the unrestrained.

SEXOLOGY IN COLLEGE.

Under the head, "Wellesley Bars the Sex Question," and under the subhead, "Ten Students of Graduating Class Who Desire Scientific Information Are Rebuked," the New York "World" of February 24, 1905, has the following article:

"Some indignation has been caused in the faculty of Wellesley College over a curious accusation from one of the graduates, who charges the college with a prudery that at least ten of its students hotly resented.

"The matter has a double significance from the fact that it is practically a test of how far the question of sex may be ignored in college training. The assumption of the college, as contained in the graduate's account, that the official recognition of it menaced the dignity of the institution leaves a wide margin for criticism and differing opinions, which seem to be forthcoming.

"The whole affair hinges on the demand of ten of the members of the graduating class for a scientific lecture on 'Reproduction.' They were peremptorily refused by every member of the faculty, and when they asked that a doctor be brought from Boston to furnish the desired treatise they were made to understand that their request was looked upon not only as unusual, but indelicate.

"The incident was brought to light by the 'Questionaire,' issued by the Wellesley Club of New York. This was intended to elicit from its members, the alumnae of the college, what benefits they had obtained from college life, what lacks they had felt, in what particulars they had found they had suffered detriment, and they were asked for suggestions for the curriculum and the general atmosphere that surrounds the college girl.

"This was sent out at Christmas. It was exhaustive, covering intellectual, moral and physical questions, and by no means neglecting that notably feminine possession—the emotions.

"Twenty per cent of the club replied, the latter-day graduates being naturally those best represented, as their college days were nearest and dearest in memory. These replies were read last Saturday at the Woman's University Club, No. 10 Gramercy Park. While the names were carefully concealed—the condition imposed that there might be no embargo on frankness—the opinions of many were too well known to their associates to fail of recognition.

"The protest from the graduate already mentioned came under the head of 'Physical.' It was addressed to Mrs. Luther Gulick, who handled that department of the voluntary statistics. The writer said she had found the 'Questionaire' so complete that only the question of sex remained to be broached. She brought it up, she said, because she believed the attitude of the college to be a mistaken one on that point.

"Then she related that toward the close of her college course ten of the students of the graduating class desired to have a lecture on reproduction. She was made the spokesman. As it had been understood among the girls that such a lecture was invariably given to the graduates before commencement, she was amazed to be received with shocked surprise by the teacher whom she consulted. After some inquiry it was discovered that a former teacher had furnished the desired lecture to two or three graduating classes as a courtesy.

"This member of the faculty had left, however. The demand that another fill her place was promptly refused. None was willing. It was then that the students applied to the highest court of appeal for a doctor, preferably a woman, who could impart the necessary scientific information. This was also refused, the girls being made to feel that it would be a reflection upon the institution. The graduate concluded her letter with the significant comment that she 'could hardly see how the dignity of the college could be compromised by what was a necessary part of the knowledge of every grown woman.'"

But little comment seems called for in a case like this. The clipping tells its own story. That the publication of incidents like this in the popular papers, like the New York "World," will attract serious attention all over the country, would seem probable, and that public educators cannot much longer neglect the most important of all the departments of human physiology and psychology, is morally certain.

Two or three copies of this clipping have been sent to me by subscribers to LUCIFER, for which attention I now return hearty thanks, and will ask all who may see articles treating upon the subject of introducing sexology into popular institutions of learning, to send such articles, marked, to this office.

M. HARMAN.

FROM THE AUTHOR OF "A NEW RELIGION."

Palmerston, New Zealand, Dec. 12, 1904.

Dear Sir: I have had the pleasure of receiving several sample copies of LUCIFER and herewith enclose you 50 cents for six months' subscription to your paper. I trust you received safely the copy of my book, "A New Religion," expounding a new system of marriage, posted you some time ago.

The more I read of the sexual discontent which undoubtedly exists, much of it unwritten, the more confident I become that "A New Religion," in conjunction with the Longdillism and a perfect system of banking, embodies the only true and practical solution of the sexual problem that ever has been or can be devised by the ingenuity of man.

You might publish articles dealing with the evils of the existing system of marriage until doomsday and advocate free love and all the rest of it, but you will not succeed in altering human nature, and the chances are that you will do a great deal more harm than good. So far it appears that the general tendency of all free-thought teaching and "apeals to reason," in preference to appeals to instinctive knowledge of what is right, have been productive of more evil than good, as witness the effect of Thomas Paine's and Robert Ingersoll's writings upon the life of your able contributor, Helen Philbrick, whose painful letter appears in your issue dated Sept. 15th.

And I think this is but one example of the general effect of such writings upon the minds of those who imbibe them. Most free-thought writings, whatever good (or bad) they may ultimately do, have so far simply inflamed the minds of readers and awakened such discontent that they, in many cases, have relinquished "the creed which until that time had been their strong defense in the hour of temptation," and followed the teachings of the false prophets, only to discover too late that the following thereof led them "to the portals of death, and with the wrecking of virtue their happiness and peace of mind died," to use the words of your correspondent. And so it will be until the end of time.

I know you will refer me to your remarks in reply to Mrs. Philbrick's letter, where you state Mrs. P. only imagined her happiness was wrecked, because she is not yet emancipated from old ideas and customs. In this statement you only show how insignificant and imperfect are the reasoning powers of man when compared with the Supreme Reason of the Almighty Creator of all things, whose laws we can only discover by observation and experience, or by instinct—instinct, which reason can destroy or pervert, but can never create. Instinct makes every one of the millions of protoplasm of which the human body is composed, each does its own particular work in its own time and place, so that every bone, muscle, nerve, etc., is formed just as it should be to make a perfect man; yet all the reasoning powers of mankind could not turn one hair white or one black, much less become the power behind creation.

There are three reasons for marriage under existing social conditions which you entirely ignore in your advocacy of free love. These reasons are: First, by registering the names of each couple who desire to live together the state can compel each father to maintain his own wife and children. If marriage was abolished there would be no law compelling a man to do this. Second—Marriage, as your prayerbook informs you, was instituted to prevent fornication. Thirdly—Marriage prevents the spread of venereal diseases. All of which reasons you utterly ignore in your teachings.

The Oneida community, after thirty years' experimenting upon free love, while it awakened to the realization that there was a sexual problem that demanded solution, had ultimately to admit that the complex system of marriage did not solve the problem (see the Oneida Community, by Allen Estlake), and never can solve it until we have fixed seasons for love and marriage and the reproduction of the human species, at intervals of at least four years apart, as I have clearly shown in "A New Religion." No doubt such a suggestion will seem strange and Utopian to many of your readers and contributors, but this very fact proves its necessity, as the position assumed by your followers (if they leave this fundamental principle out of their religion) may well be likened to a lot of habitual drunkards who, having imbibed with the liquor a settled conviction that the habitual use of intoxicating liquors is not only natural, but absolutely essential to the health and well being of the human race, hence devote their attention, not to the abolition of intoxicants, but rather to the discovery of some means whereby they can use them even to excess, without any after injurious effect. And hence in preference to supporting measures calculated to make the obtaining of intoxicants difficult, attempts are made to remove every barrier, so that every one can drink to the dregs.

There is one reason why free love as advocated by you is utterly impractical with civilized human beings, and that is that women seem to be prepared to agree to physical union frequently, almost at any time. And though they may tire of one man when tied to him, would never be able to resist a fresh amour with a stranger if the law sanctioned it. And the same rule applies to men. This tendency is as unnatural and far more injurious than a chronic craving for strong drink, and would certainly lead to the destruction of all the higher faculties and aspirations. But as it grows with what it feeds upon, it is as difficult to prevent, were marriage abolished, as is the craving for strong drink among habitual imbibers. Hence the failure of free love wherever it has been tried. But the legal establishment of fixed seasons for intercourse, in 1908-1912, 1916-1920, and so on, would overcome this difficulty. And an ideal system of marriage could then be established, and each male and each female could choose their own partner for each love season. Whereas, were we to abolish the existing system of marriage and sanction free love as ordinarily understood, the mass of the people would degenerate into nothing better than a lot of prostitutes and whoremongers. Only the strong will and Christian aspirations of Mr. Noyes prevented this occurring in the Oneida Community, and even then it was only possible by the institution of many rules absolutely impossible of application to society in general.

I entirely uphold those of your contributors who maintain that the sex question is largely an economic one. If we had fixed seasons for reproduction and between times the sexes kept apart, as do the people of New Guinea, which accounts for their high standard of morality, and civilized people before they are married, the question would arise, How are the women and children to be supported between times? I have worked out a scheme of finance which fully answers this question. The idea is to form an unlimited endless tontine with shares of £25 ($125) each and the money derived from those shares would be invested in land and the land leased or sold to the members for life, but at their death it would again revert to the society, to be resold or let for life to one of the surviving members. The rents derived from the investments of the society would be divided (1) as a life annuity to all female members, (2) a further annuity of, say, $1.25 per week for each child born in accordance with "The New Religion"—that is to say, between the ninth month of each leap year and the third month of the year following, but not otherwise, payable until the child is sixteen. (3) In old age pensions to male members. (4) As cover for accidents, etc.

On the death of each member the shares purchased would become the property of the surviving members, or rather the investments purchased with those shares. So that with the death of members the society would become wealthy and wealthier. This scheme is dealt with at length in the "Nation Builder," a paper I am publishing, and I propose calling the society "The New Kingdom Society."

Trusting you will publish this letter for the benefit of your many intelligent readers, I am, etc.,

C. P. W. LONGDILL.

P. S.—My advice to Mrs. Helen Philbrick is to occupy her child's mind as much as possible with intellectual matters. And let the same power which develops the child into an adult develop her sexual nature in due season; and then her instincts will be true. Assuming age 20 to be the youngest age at which males and females should reproduce, calculate the first leap year when she will be old enough to marry, and instill into her mind the fact that that is the year when she should marry her first love mate.

C. P. W. L.

Having little inclination and perhaps less ability as a controversialist, my first impulse is to let the above long letter stand or fall by its own merits or demerits, asking our readers to give Brother Longdill a fair and candid hearing, accepting or rejecting as seemeth good to them.

Moreover, my time is so nearly monopolized with other matters just now that it seems something akin to criminal waste of space and energy on my part to rehash the arguments so often used—and by writers far more capable than myself—to show that the doctrines of "creation," "supreme reason of the Almighty Creator," "instinctive knowledge of what is right," etc., to show that these phrases no longer represent the thought of advanced, matured and unbiased thinkers and investigators, in the fields of theology and of morality—including, of course, psychology, sexology and biology; to show, in fact, that these quoted phrases are now in the main meaningless.

Inasmuch, however, as my silence would be sure to be misconstrued, I will briefly as possible notice a few of our New Zealander's more important points.

First, let me say that, to my thinking, all ideas of right and wrong are the growth of human experience, dating back long before what is called the dawn of human reason. Upon these inherited ideas of right and wrong are based all religious creeds, all codes of politics and of morals. That these ideas of right and wrong, and the systems of theology, etc., based on them, were originally suggested by human ignorance, ignorance of the facts of nature rather than by real knowledge of these facts, is now accepted as true, not only by the people called "free-thinkers," but also by the great majority of cultured theologians as well.

Why, then, spend time and space, and possible fraternal feeling also, threshing over again the old chaff? Religion and politics are no longer regarded by people of culture as proper subjects of anathema, or of vituperation and abuse, and very rarely is any one sent to prison because of heterodox views in regard to "God" or "Government." In regard to morality, however, especially that part of the moral code that concerns sex—sexology—involving and including the reproduction of the human race, a wider difference of opinion still exists as to whether people should be free to live their own sex life as they are now free to live their own religious life.

Evidently Brother Longdill thinks people should not be free in any of these particulars. In his opinion Freethought—reason in religious matters—leads to the "portals of death"; so also preaches the Roman Catholic church, and most Protestant churches. Likewise Freedom in Love, commonly called free love, leads to the "wrecking of virtue," wrecking of "happiness and peace of mind."

Logically enough, our founder of a "new religion" refers to the use of intoxicating beverages in illustration of his argument. Though not a perfect analogy, it answers the purpose fairly well. Yes, prohibition of intoxicants, or of any kind of food or drink, does not make one temperate or moral; neither does prohibition or regulation of the sex appetite make any one virtuous or moral. On the contrary, by depriving people of the right and power of self-ownership, self-control, the tendency is to weakness, degeneracy, immorality, vice, criminality.

As to the three reasons given for "marriage":

First. "The State can compel each father to support his own wife and children." The attempt on the part of the state to do this has always proved a disastrous failure, as we all know, just as its attempt to compel every man to be honest and pay his debts has always proved a disastrous failure. Horace Greeley was right in his contention that the abolition of laws for the collection of debts would be a move in the direction of greater honesty and better citizenship. So, as I maintain, the abolition of laws compelling every father to support his own wife and children—including laws against bigamy, concubinage, etc., would be a move in the direction of greater purity, greater honor and honesty in the sex relation.

Second. "Marriage prevents fornication." Does it? On the contrary, marriage laws create the sin, or crime, of fornication. That which is forbidden is sure to be committed. Let true education, combined with liberty and responsibility for one's acts, take the place of legalized prohibition, or statutory regulation, and the evils of premature sexuality, of ill-advised or of excessive sex indulgence, would soon be reduced to a minimum, as compared to now.

Third. "Marriage prevents the spread of venereal diseases." Does it?

On the contrary, I maintain that the evils of "prostitution"—including the diseases inseparable from the "social evil," are largely if not chiefly due to the attempt by church and state to compel women and men to live a "continent" or "chaste" life, as commonly understood by those terms.

The axiom of the great English essayist, Macaulay, was never more true than in its application to the sex problem, namely, "the evils of liberty"—whatever they may be—"can only be cured by more liberty"—by liberty to correct the mistakes of ignorance, of youthfulness and of misdirection.

Several other points seem to call for notice, but this article is already much too long. The history of organized religions shows that they have all enslaved women, and through the enslavement of womanhood all religions have enslaved manhood also. Such being the verdict of all the past, is it probable that the new religion proposed by Brother Longdill would prove an exception?

M. HARMAN.

THE NEW THOUGHT.

We have many new, unarticulated movements that challenge the attention of the world. A list and definition of each would be useful and ought to be made. Some journal in making out such a historical, lexicographic statement would render an excellent service to the country.

We have been flying apart and gathering together into small groups here and there to assert our individual feelings and thoughts, and in so doing have rendered some valuable service to ourselves and to others. But a little historic retrospect will show us that the great stream of history has always been accompanied by eddies on either side, which usually re-enter the main current, and pass on down the stream of life. They modify the stream more or less, but comparatively not very much, for the human river, like geographical ones, has a tendency to clarify itself.

This historic study will sober us in regard to the value of our own personal views and influence. The disposition to find fault and to find all the wrong in the world in others, is unscientific and baneful.

This is said with a view to getting at a sober and sane starting point for a scientific study of the meaning and value of the New Thought.

The scientific method and habit of mind have come slowly to be the arbiter in all human affairs. We may answer the question, "What is right?" by answering its synonym, "What is scientific?"

The mere profession of a belief in science, and the reading of scientific books do not make us scientific in our work or thought.

I was talking, the other evening, with a woman who is most persistent in demanding a scientific economy in human affairs; and yet she insisted that the American women were all hypocrites, and the men all fools, and that we are the descendants of criminals, and have no characteristic but greed. Now anyone knows, on a moment's reflection, that such judgments are not only historically indefensible, but indicate a habit of mind, temporarily at least, incapable of dealing fairly with any question.

I am almost daily engaged in teaching young people science—and find that the slovenly habit of seeing and thinking is quite prevalent. To see things as they are and to state just exactly what you see, is a rare attainment, and comes after years of careful training and self-discipline.

We may take as an illustration, Tolstoy—who is a master in the great art of seeing and writing correctly, and yet, when it comes to portraying the best side of society, is he fair; or does he appreciate the value and splendor of science, or even of art? All of us who admire him so much, deprecate this seemingly needless limitation.

It is a reasonable inference that any institution that persists has in it good. "Nothing walks with aimless feet," and hence in dealing with institutions already in existence, we should interpret them, and deal with them on their merits.

This would give new thought movements the vantage of fairness—and in human affairs this is much.

LUCIFER: ITS MEANING AND PURPOSE.

LUCIFER—The planet Venus; so called from its brightness.—Webster's Dictionary.

LUCIFEROUS—Giving light; affording light or the means of discovery.—Same.

LUCIFIC—Producing light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing, and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

CONGRESS SHALL MAKE NO LAW RESPECTING AN ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, OR PROHIBITING THE FREE EXERCISE THEREOF; OR ABRIDGING THE FREEDOM OF SPEECH, OR OF THE PRESS; OR THE RIGHT OF THE PEOPLE PEACEABLY TO ASSEMBLE, AND TO PETITION THE GOVERNMENT FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES.—First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

ERRATUM: The number of LUCIFER containing the article complained of by the prosecution—written by Sarah Crist Campbell—is whole number 1,028, dated December 8, 1904, not December 28, as stated in last issue.

OUR ATTITUDE.

The attitude of LUCIFER's editor, and of those who take similar ground toward the postal censorship, is not that of defiance, as such; not that of "contempt of court," to use a technical phrase, but purely and simply the attitude of American citizens attending strictly to their own business and molesting or invading no one, the attitude of men—and of women as well—who know their rights and who dare maintain them against all comers.

Speaking for myself alone, and requesting others to do the same, I would say that, with Garrison, Philips, Theodore Parker and others, I believe in heeding the "higher law," or, more correctly, the higher principle, that of equal justice for all and privileges for none.

The slave-ocracy of half a century ago, and the United States officials at their back and beck, denounced the Garrisonians and punished them as "law-breakers." Epithets such as this, fines, ostracism, prisons, were as nothing to the Garrisonians. Their reply to their accusers was:

"I can be harsh as truth and uncompromising as justice. I will not equivocate; I will not prevaricate; I will not excuse. I will not retract a single inch, and I will be heard."

This, as I understand it, is the attitude of LUCIFER, its editor, and its logical co-operators, in this defensive fight against what may rightly be called the "American Bureaucracy," otherwise called the American Postal Censorship, or the American Inquisition.

The Garrisonians demanded freedom of speech, freedom of press, and freedom of action—of non-invasive action. They demanded the right to preach Abolition of chattel slavery, north and south, and the right to help the fleeing slave to freedom.

The campaign of the Garrisonians was one of education. They recognized the use of the common mails as a necessary means of carrying on that campaign. To limit their propaganda to word of mouth, to meetings, public and private, would have been to keep back the campaign of education many years, if not forever. The enemies of freedom for the black slave tried hard, but in vain, to get laws passed by Congress making it a criminal offense to send "abolition documents" through the common mail.

In like manner the advocates of freedom for woman from the slavery inherent in sex ownership of her person by man, now demand their equal right to the use of the common mail to carry on their propaganda, their campaign of agitation and of education.

To the sex reformer the enslavement of womanhood and motherhood in statute marriage—canon law marriage, institutional marriage—is none the less real than was the enslavement of the African under institutional chattelhood. With John Stuart Mill, the sex reformer recognizes marriage as one of the forms of "serfdom," and when the effect of this form of serfdom upon the coming generation is considered the sex reformer maintains that the enslavement of womanhood and of motherhood is the worst of all forms of serfdom.

I have said the slave-ocracy, the slave-holding oligarchy, failed to get Congress to make it a criminal offense to send "abolition documents" through the common mail. What the advocates of serfdom fifty years ago could not do, the advocates of serfdom now have succeeded in doing. Before the war of nationalization, of centralization, of imperialism, of which war the abolition of chattelhood for the African was an incident, not an object—before this war the traditions of the earlier years of the American Republic, so-called, had some weight with Congressmen, judges and Presidents. Before this war it was impossible to get a law passed by Congress, signed by a President, and canonized by a supreme court, plainly "abridging the freedom of speech and of press," but after the general demoralization of all classes consequent upon a four years' carnival of murder, of robbery, of ravage and devastation, and after the character itself of the American government had changed from a federation of states to a de facto monarchy or imperialism, it was no longer a difficult thing to get laws enacted abridging or abolishing the citizen right to freedom of speech, of press and of inviolable mail—for the benefit of classes whose interest it is to keep womanhood and motherhood in a condition of ignorance and serfdom.

Time and space being exhausted, I close for this issue, hoping soon to devote another chapter to an historic account of the method by which the inquisitorial postal laws were passed by the most notoriously corrupt Congress that ever convened on American soil.

MEETINGS AND LECTURES.

ELBERT HUBBARD—"Fra Elbertus"—the world-famous "Roycrofter," editor of the "Philistine," East Aurora, New York, will speak at the Studebaker theater, in this city, March 26, 8:15 o'clock. Subject, "The Gospel of Work." Seats, 50 cents up.

The Social Science League holds public meetings every Sunday evening at eight, in Room 913, Masonic Temple, Chicago. Lectures and discussions free.

The Chicago Society of Anthropology meets every Sunday at 2:30 p. m., 17th floor Masonic Temple. Public invited.

RESPONSES TO THE CENSORSHIP.

Here are a few extracts from letters received within the past two weeks, referring to the recent arrest of Lucifer's editor:

"The battle for liberty did not cease with the triumph of the Declaration of Independence, nor with the framing of the Constitution of the United States. 'Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.' 'Offenses must needs come, but woe unto him by whom the offense cometh.' 'If the God within says well done, what are other gods to thee?' 'Trust to the fate of coming years.' I enclose a money order for ten dollars to help keep up the vigil."—M. R., Redmon, Ill.

"Lucifer of March 2 reached me yesterday. Words cannot express the indignation I feel, or my contempt for those who occupy the chairs of government and who use their power to crush the weak. I wonder how much longer our blockhead American citizens will continue to vote such people into power.

"Once I said, 'I will give five dollars each year to help keep Lucifer in existence, if I have to scrub floors to earn the money.' Here are the five dollars.

"Cannot one or two hundred of your subscribers come to the front and show what kind of stuff they are made of? There are many people who can talk glibly about liberty, etc., but when it comes to sacrifice they are not in it. We could each give the labor of one or two weeks every year for the benefit of Lucifer. To my mind all people who have risen above the level of brutes will be willing to sacrifice a little for so great a cause—the cause that holds aloft a nobler and truer ideal.

"When the government crushes you, Mr. Harman, it crushes me; it crushes my sisters and my brothers, and I must do what I can to meet and defeat the oppressor. I send you thoughts of freedom and love. May strength to endure be given you. From your friend, Olive, Whitewater, Wis."

"Enclosed find a two-dollar bill to help your fight against the enemies of liberty and justice. Yours for the Revolution, W. C. W., Bismarck, Mo."

"My dear Mr. Harman: I hope you are not again to go through a series of persecutions. This thing is abominable. It is about time that the American people should shut their mouths about Russia. Hoping for your personal sake that the trouble will blow over, Yours, Edgar D. Brinkerhoff, New York city."

"You have my earnest sympathy in your struggle against the tyrannous spirit of the so-called moralists and puritans. I wish you good speed, and send you a dollar for a year's subscription to Lucifer. Alice Groff, Philadelphia, Pa. March 6."

"Moses Harman, Dear Friend and Brother: I saw in the paper to-day an account of your arrest. I am glad to know you were not compelled to lie in the 'bastile.' It pains me exceedingly to think of you having to undergo another trial, but I know your persecutors are merely blind to the value of the work you are doing for the good of humanity. You at least have the satisfaction of knowing that all who really know you are fully convinced of your honesty of purpose, your great-hearted humane impulses, your unimpeachable integrity and the genuineness of the zeal which has prompted you for so many years to make a noble and unrelenting war on the hideous superstitions which have combined to enslave womanhood. But the pioneers of progress must bear the heavy burdens, hew wood and carry water in order that the fruits of their unflinching labors may be enjoyed by future generations. You have the consciousness of doing a noble work and you know that you have my fullest sympathy as well as that of thousands of others whose minds have been enlightened by your teachings. You may be assured that whatever may be the outcome of the persecution as regards yourself, your work will be carried on along the lines which you have marked out. I shall always be ready to do my part in any way possible to continue the work. Sincerely your friend and co-worker.—Jonathan Mayo Crane, New York city, Feb. 25."

"You have our sympathy and support in your fearless exposition of the great natural laws and principles on which creative function is based. These principles will and must be recognized and applied some day in the life of humanity. Cordially yours, W. H. Dower, M. D., Temple Artisan, Oceano, Cal. March 3, 1905."

"I see by enclosed clipping from local paper that more villainy has been perpetrated. They complain of 'anarchy,' but their high-handed despotism—denying us privileges we pay for, is bringing anarchy faster than we could hope to do by the use of propaganda. Likewise in regard to Free Love. As for sympathy in your distress—Ah! words are cheap. But do not fail to demand any service in my power to render. If financial assistance is desired to juggle with our anarchy-breeding monstrosities called courts of justice, please let me know—if you should still be at home. Give my regards to your daughter and granddaughter. Yours for freedom and humanity, J. B. Phinney, Springfield, Mo. Feb. 28."

"My Dear Mr. Harman: I am very sorry to see you are having more trouble in your good work. I am an earnest friend to you and believe in many of your reform ideas, and do not see any cause for your having this trouble; will hope matters will turn in your favor.

"If I were to make any suggestions regarding Lucifer, would say, make it a monthly magazine at $1.00 a year; have some illustrations, and get as many advertisements as possible.

"I enclose check for $2.00. Please give me credit on my subscription to Lucifer for $1.00 and send me books, of your selection, for the other $1.00. With love and best wishes to you and Lillian, from your true friend, Geo. F. Patch, Burlington, Vt. March 5."

"My Dear Mr. Harman: I am sorry to say that I have not yet received 'Sex Radicalism' and it may be that your arrest explains its non-appearance.

"Of course I am sorry that you should be annoyed for sending that through the mails. While in all probability I will not agree with the doctrine (which, however, I have not yet read) I am yet very much in earnest over the matter of the maintenance of free speech.

"If I were in Chicago, it would please me to offer you my services in your defense. So far as my study of the legal question goes, I am persuaded that similar cases have not been properly defended. However, the precedents have become so numerous that it may be too late to secure a reversal. Very truly, Theo. Schroeder, New York city, March 4."

Edwin C. Walker writes from New York that at a meeting of the Sun-Rise Club of that city, also at a meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club, earnest appeals were made for moral support and financial aid for the prosecuted paper and its editor by several speakers of national reputation, among whom were named Bolton Hall, James Morton, Jr., Moses Oppenheimer, Edward W. Chamberlain and others. In response to this appeal $26.70 were raised for the defense at the Sun-Rise Club, and almost the same amount at the Manhattan Liberal Club, which sums were duly turned over to the treasurer of the Free Speech League, Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr.

All money sent to this office by friends of Lucifer for defense in court, if such fund should be needed, will be sent to the treasurer, Dr. Foote, at New York, else held here subject to his order.

Our readers everywhere are kindly requested to send us names of persons who might be interested in Lucifer's work if they could see a sample copy.

LUCIFER'S HELPERS.

James Freeman, $1; J. B. Phinney, $2.35; J. G. Hunter, $2; J. Al. Wilson, 50c; B. F. Cheney, $1; Mrs. M. M. Johnson, $1; Friend, $5; A. Wastall, $5; W. M. Miller, 75c; Olive L. B., $5; W. C. Wagener, $2; J. S. B., $4; C. Nold, $1; F. Bassora, 50c; M. R., $10.

Once more, sincerely thanking these good friends for timely co-operation, we once more ask those who have not sent names to whose owners they desire to have LUCIFER sent, to do so now. As often before said, while it is doubtless true that the majority of such trial subscribers will not renew when time expires, the seed thus sown is probably never lost, but will have its effect in liberalizing, educating and humanizing the readers, and this even though a large portion of the papers should at first be destroyed in anger or in fear.

We would also suggest that instead of spending the whole amount contributed to this fund, in scattering copies of LUCIFER, a portion might well be spent in distributing leaflet literature, such as Brother Wentworth's article on "Divorce," which is now reprinted from LUCIFER of a few weeks ago, and which is now sent out at the nominal price of 25 cents per hundred, including a partial catalogue of LUCIFER'S pamphlet literature. This leaflet would doubtless suggest others named therein, to those who would prefer this kind of educational work rather than to send nothing but copies of the fortnightly LUCIFER, or back numbers of the weekly.

M. HARMAN.

REVIEWS—VIEWS.

Moses Harman has requested my opinion of two little books which he has sent me for review, "Jeanette" and "Sex Radicalism."

"Jeanette" is a vivid story, remarkably well-written, but somewhat sensational. Aside from her physical beauty, however, the heroine is not presented in a particularly attractive light—she seems weak and mentally colorless, for which, if one cannot blame her, one may not praise her, either. But the moral and merit of the story is its strong exposition of the conspiracy that presents its almost impenetrable front to any "Delilah" who would reform—a conspiracy of the roué and religionist, of the prudish and prudent, of the malicious and the conventional. As a means of breaking this conspiracy which forces down and holds down the "fallen woman," this story should do much good.

"Sex Radicalism" is one of the best things written for many a year in this line. It is so temperate and fair, and calm and kind in tone, and such care is used to employ words not offensive, yet scientifically accurate, while all due honor is paid to the finer issues involved and touched upon. It is rather a book of suggestions than of offered solutions, but, nevertheless, the road in most places is so clearly pointed out that few can fail to find their way, once started. One often wishes, however, in places, that more had been said. It is a woman's touch all through, but a woman, brainy and thoughtful and scientifically nurtured.

I sincerely regret, however, that the work begins by an attack on Christianity as mostly to blame for modern sex-ignorance and bondage. This not only arouses prejudice against the book at the start, from a great many in whose hands we might wish to place the work, but I feel it also is not true.

The sexual subjection of woman can, I believe, be traced back always to war. When war began, violence dominated life, all lusts were allowed to the victor, whatever was desired was seized by force, slaves were made, and woman was enslaved and her sex held subject to her captor, whose property she was. Lust and rape started in war, and lust and rape, in open or secret forms, held woman subject to man, and still hold her, as far as she is held. This has been, and is now, practically universal, all over the world, without regard to the religion or no religion of the people. Wherever religion has organized as a priesthood, desiring power and emolument, it has connived at and sanctioned this subjection of woman, but Christianity has been no worse than the others. Organized religions always let institutions alone, and, if they are strong, support and sanction them. The church is always on the side of the strong battalions. When Dora Forster's ideas become common and respectable, she will find the church blandly blessing them. And there are too many infidels and socialists stubbornly supporting monogamy for us to throw many stones. Our enemy in the case is not the church, but the law, and back of the law, and making and enforcing it, the lust of the average man to own the woman he desires, the perverted ideal of the woman, which man has forced upon and inbred and trained into her, to give herself entirely to the man she loves, to absorb him wholly to herself. But when we have once broken the clutch of the law, when marriage and divorce are private, not legal matters, and no legal restrictions are placed upon sexual knowledge, the rest will be merely a matter of moral courage and evolution through experience. All we need is the freedom to educate, and the honor of private conscience in sex relation; but free mails alone will soon give us all the rest.

Therefore, honor and support to Moses Harman, and to all who, like him, fight for the free expression of knowledge and thought.

J. WILLIAM LLOYD.

"Free America," by Bolton Hall, is a volume of over 200 pages of statistics, exposition, argument, denunciation and theory. The main idea is single tax, but the author also incidentally attempts to clear up every subject connected with it. Statistics are proverbially of small value except to the very limited number who are in a position to verify or refute them. Of more interest, however, is a certain kind of evidence such, for instance, as is here offered in the amusing symposium of contradictory opinion relative to the cause of present hard times, quoted from the daily press. Other good things are strewn through the pages, for instance: "More laws? Oh, yes, you can have more laws, but the daily walk and conversation of a citizen of New York is regulated now, as nearly as can be counted, by twenty-one thousand and sixty laws." "Plenty of room on top means on top of you." A blemish is the wasting of eleven pages on newspaper clippings describing extravagant fancy balls, etc., side by side with distressing instances of poverty. We thought that such childish bids for sympathy had, with characters of the Little Nell type, gone out of serious literature. As well exhibit an elephant together with a mouse and point out a moral that one is the result of the other. Whatever the book's demerits, in regard to redundancy and detail, there can be no doubt that it serves its evident purpose of calling attention to the growing monopolization of land and the possible dangers arising out of concentrated ownership. Here the author has been successful, and no one can read the book without a fuller sense of the economic changes going on about us.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Full name and address of writers in this department can generally be obtained on application to the editor.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

D. D. Thompson, Va.—"Enclosed find $1 for the two copies 'Sex Radicalism,' the balance to be used as you desire. Will try to do more later. Am sorry to hear you are in trouble again with the P. O. Hoping they will tire of their persecution of you."

C. Peterson, Manti, Utah.—"Dora Forster is a fearless champion of the right—one whose labors the present generation cannot appreciate, but whom future generations will rise up and call blessed. Yours for the Social Revolution."

Tom Swinburn, Office West Virginia Humane Society, Charleston.—"I think you are right in what you say of 'Lucifer's Symposium' in last issue. I had a thought—but perhaps an unpractical one—of sending Lucifer through the mail under seal and adding the postage to the price, in case they shut you out of the newspaper mail. One thing I want to know: Why not bind the volumes as they are completed? And if you have back numbers, why not bind them? Surely many subscribers would like to have the old issues bound.

"Can you supply such bound volumes? I have been saving my copies nearly from the first, to bind. If you have them bound I want them, as I can buy from time to time. If you can bind from now on, I will take one copy as issued and another copy to be by you retained till the volume is complete. Then I will pay for the binding, etc., also. I have this arrangement with the 'Searchlight,' of Waco, Texas. Enclosed find $2. Please send 'Jeannette,' 'Strike of a Sex,' 'Vice, Its Friends and Its Foes,' 'What the Young Need to Know,' and credit the rest on subscription."

[Yes, we have bound volumes of Lucifer for several years, and will have other volumes bound whenever there is call enough to have an additional lot bound. Would like to know how many want to adopt the plan spoken of by Brother Swinburne. The price at present is $1.50 per volume of fifty-two numbers, well bound in substantial cloth; postage or expressage is 25 cents per volume. If a considerable number could be bound at one time the price could be reduced.]

Emma Wardlaw Bost, Moyenne Island, Seychelles, Indian Ocean.—"I should like 'Institutional Marriage.' Lucifer is a splendid paper. What you say personally is extra pleasant to me, as it is almost exactly what I think myself. Have you read William Thompson on the 'Wrongs of Women'? He wrote before Mary Wollstonecraft, and I think it is out of print now. Bebel's 'Woman, Past and Present,' is splendid."

[I have never seen Thompson's book. If some reader will send us a copy or tell us where it can be had I would be duly grateful. I regret to say that the booklet, 'Institutional Marriage,' is now out of print.—M. H.]

Agnes Benham, Adelaide, South Australia.—"What a terrible slur to speak of our South Australia as a land 'originally settled by convicts'! It was nothing of the kind. Hardy, energetic, enterprising pioneers were our forbears! But people at a distance find it hard to discriminate between one State or Colony and another. Even the principal convict settlements have long ago worked out their stain. Any amount of other blood has intermingled, and better environment has had its effect on descendants. Besides, in the old days you know they sent a man to prison for stealing a hare, or even 'transported' him for 'poaching.' The poor fellow may have been not at all a bad sort. 'Tis hard to see your family starve when game abounds."

[If I spoke of Australia as having been "settled by convicts" it was with no intention to cast a "slur" by so doing. I have always maintained that the people sent to penal colonies by the English government were probably better than those who sent them there, and that their conduct when left alone in their new environments proved that they were not really criminal in character. Am glad to be corrected in regard to South Australia, however.—M. H.]

B. M., New York.—"Have received the six copies of 'Sex Radicalism,' and am glad to possess them, and now await 'Right to Be Born Well.' Send me, if possible, 'The Truth About Love,' or tell me where I can get it. I was acquainted with the author, but did not know she wrote upon that subject. Can you find me Jane Hume Clapperton's 'Vision of the Future'?"

[Will our readers kindly answer these questions? We had a copy of "Truth About Love" in this office, but loaned it, and now forget to whom. Will the borrower kindly return it?—M. H.]

Helen Barton Howard Philbrick, Miles City, Mont., March 4, 1905.—"Lucifer readers: Will you, for my sake, forgive the editor for wasting space belonging to you by publishing this personal letter, giving some points that I, your grateful friend and recipient of large help through you, wish you to see as plainly as I see them?

"I have large and beautiful co-operative educative plan outlined, and I want to find the strong and wise ones to whom to present it, ones who are not so egotistical as to think they know all there is to know.

"I have writen the editor of this paper till I am so disgusted with his ability to do no more than sing his own song and then 'sing it ag'in' that I could, as well as I love him, just enjoy thumping his head on a board if I could find a board hard enough to make an impression.

"I have sent him the best presentation I can of the 'leaders' to the plan, also charts of 'God,' 'Devil' and 'Holy Trinity,' through and by means of which may be taught the ethics which will dig the root of Capitalism up and burn the stocks and branches in the fire of intellect and feeling and—common sense, and he will take the MSS. for a cushion to his chair while he writes back to Montana for 'my health.'

"I never was so 'mad' at any one I really loved, as I am with him; and I love him because, God bless him! he wants to see the fair thing done by my soul (my only child).

"Will the strong thinkers, the people who have something more than personalities to write of, please write to me? I got several propositions of a personal nature when I wrote before and—dear, dear friends, let me tell you lovingly, it is the welfare of our children that I seek, and not a—'partner.' Yours for Science."

[I plead guilty to this soft impeachment, in part at least. Yes, I have failed to read all our good friend has sent, simply for lack of time. But I have spent some hours in careful study of her rolls of manuscript—enough to make two or three good sized volumes—and have tried to understand the charts of "God, Devil and Holy Trinity," but must confess my failure thus far to fully grasp the occult meaning thereof. Am willing to admit that the fault is probably in my lack of comprehension and lack of time to give these carefully prepared documents the study they deserve. Am waiting for the pressure of business to let up a little, so that I can do better. Thanking Sister Helen most sincerely for her interest in Lucifer and its editor, I close by protesting that I have never yet made a "cushion for my chair" of her charts and manuscripts, but am keeping them carefully, subject to her orders, whenever she can find some one better able to do them justice.—M. H.]

THE PIONEER ORGAN OF ANARCHISM.

LIBERTY.

BENJ. R. TUCKER, EDITOR.

An Anarchistic Journal, expounding the doctrine that in Equal Liberty is to be found the most satisfactory solution of social questions, and that majority rule, or democracy, equally with monarchial rule, is a denial of Equal Liberty.

APPRECIATIONS:

G. Bernard Shaw, editor of the "Fabian Essays" and author of "The Quintessence of Ibsenism": "Liberty is a lively paper, in which the usual proportions of half-pennyworth of discussion to an intolerable deal of balderdash are reversed."

Ernest H. Crosby, author of "Captain Jinks, Hero," and "Swords and Ploughshares": "In these days of running after false gods, it is refreshing to find one American remaining unflinchingly true to Liberty, and using in her defense not his emotions, but a particularly keen and vigorous intellect and style."

William Douglass O'Connor, author of "The Good Gray Poet" and "Hamlet's Note-Book": "The editor of Liberty would be the Gavroche of the Revolution, if he were not its Englishman."

Aug. McGrath, formerly Secretary of the American Federation of Labor: "Liberty is the only paper that points the way."

Hugo Bilgram, author of "Involuntary Idleness" and "The Iron Law of Wages": "Liberty distinguishes itself among economic radicals by the fearless discussion and condemnation of the faults of the present economic order, and exhibits its fairness by giving its opponents the fullest opportunity for criticism."

Postage, 5c.

MARRIAGE IN FREE SOCIETY. Edward Carpenter. One of the best short works on the subject. Daintily printed. A charming little gift book. "Love is doubtless the last and most difficult lesson that humanity has to learn; in a sense it underlies all the others. Perhaps the time has come for the modern nations when, ceasing to be children, they may even try to learn it." 25c.

TOKOLOGY. A book for every woman. By Alice B. Stockham, M. D. Illustrated. Tokology teaches possible painless pregnancy and parturition, giving full, plain directions for the care of a woman before and after confinement. The ailments of pregnancy can be prevented as well as the pains and dangers of childbirth avoided, and women need not go down to death giving birth to children. English, German or Swedish. $2.25.

HILDA'S HOME; A Story of Woman's Emancipation. Rosa Graul. With Macaulay, Rosa Graul would say, "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman will be less loving and lovable, or that man will be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish. 424 pages. Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

THE NEW HEDONISM. Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old asceticism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new Hedonism says: 'Be happy and you will be virtuous.' In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediæval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproducing function." Paper covers; 20 large pages; twelve copies, 50c; single copy, 5c.

OUR WORSHIP OF PRIMITIVE SOCIAL GUESSES. E. C. Walker. Contents: Love and Law; The Moloch of the Monogamic Ideal; The Continuity of Race-Life, and Tyranny; Food and Sex Fallacies, a Criticism; When Men and Women Are and When They Are Not Varietists; The New Woman; What Is She? What Will She Be? The State Hiding Behind Its Own Mistakes; Bishop Potter's Opinion of Divorce; Love; Its Attraction and Expression; Is She an Honest Girl? Lloyd, Platt and the Pitiful Facts; Social Radicals and Parentage; Anthropology and Monogamy Love and Trust Versus Fear; Reflections upon Reading William Platt's "Women, Love, and Life." 15c.

KAREZZA. Ethics of Marriage. Alice B. Stockham, M. D., author of Tokology. Karezza gives a high ideal to parental functions and pleads for justice to the unborn child. Karezza is really a supplement to Tokology and elucidates a theory of marital relations, which leads to individual growth and a closer bond of union, the practice of which at all times gives complete control of the fecundating power. Karezza controverts the prevailing ideas of baseness and degradation associated with the sexual nature, makes a plea for a better birthright for the child, for a controlled and designed maternity and aims to lead individuals to a higher development of themselves, through a knowledge of their creative powers. Karezza is the product of knowledge and experience, and is presented to the world with a deep abiding faith, that its teachings will lead individuals to purer lives, to right understanding and appreciation of the sex functions, to intelligent control of propagation and finally through right adjustment in most sacred relations, to the ideal marriage. Levant cloth, prepaid, $1.

LOVE'S WAY TO PERFECT HUMANHOOD.
By Agnes Benham.

An excellent companion for Carpenter's "Love's Coming of Age." The keynote of the book, found on page 74, reads thus: "The soul itself is pure and heavenly, and if at the moment of conception and through the prenatal time when it is building its earthly house it could meet with entirely responsive and congenial conditions, then would the earth be peopled with a race of gods." Price $1. Published by the author, Agnes Benham, Adelaide, South Australia. Orders may be sent through this office.

SOCIAL FREEDOM.

BY HULDA L. POTTER-LOOMIS.

The term "social freedom" is of recent origin; at least it is not to be found in Webster's unabridged dictionary, where other terms, such a "social interests or concerns, social pleasures, social love, social benefits, social happiness, social duties, social communications, and social relation," are all mentioned, which naturally leads us to the inference that whoever coined the term "social freedom" was of the opinion that the world had advanced to the point where human beings might be accorded a fuller measure of freedom in their social relations than they have enjoyed under the restrictions and limitations established in ages past.

There are many phases of social life and there are many persons writing and lecturing upon most of these phases, while there are but a few courageous ones who are willing to discuss the phase which pertains to freedom in the sex relation; and thus I am taking this opportunity to advocate that which seems to me the underlying principle of all the other phases of our human social relations.

Many physicians and scientists who are quoted as authorities on insanity do not hesitate to declare that restrained or restricted sexual desire has been the cause of insanity in thousands of cases, while the gratification of sex desire by unnatural means has been the cause of insanity in thousands of other cases.

Experts in matters relating to criminology agree that crime is the result of perverted sex instinct or desire, yet none of these authorities have the courage to advocate fredom of sexual intercourse as a remedy for the cases now in hand or as a preventive of future possible cases.

When human reason hangs in the balance, when human lives and happiness are imperiled, when insane asylums, jails, penitentiaries and so-called reformatories are filled to overflowing and constantly increasing in number, can we afford to be biased by petty prejudices and hypocritical forms of conventionality and custom and shall we refrain from putting forth our best efforts to establish a new and better order of things?

New and better structures are continually being erected upon the ruins of the old. The wheels of progress will never advance while they remain imbedded in the ruts of past centuries. Surprising discoveries await mankind in the depths of the unexplored forests. Still untrodden fields hold vast treasures of gold and silver and precious stones for the courageous ones who will venture there.

Why should we hesitate to leave the long traveled highway of conventionality and custom? Whatever these may have contributed to the welfare of society in the past, they cannot be expected to contain all of wisdom, nor all of happiness for humanity. To be happy is the chief end and aim of human existence.

No one can be happy while chafing under the restrictions which society now enforces upon the strongest and, without doubt, the best instinct of our natures, namely, that which manifests itself through the affections.

Strange as it may seem, while the clergy, who are largely responsible for this state of affairs, recognize the evils which have grown out of the restrictions and limitations referred to, they steadfastly refuse to place the blame where it rightly belongs, and vainly suppose that they can overcome these evils by still greater restrictions and are using every effort to get them established by law.

Their efforts with regard to uniform divorce laws is only one instance of this, and we do not object to being put on record as making the prediction that they will utterly fail to accomplish their object, if the result of past effort is any criterion to judge by.

Moreover, we predict that their refusal to remarry divorced persons will result in the determination of such persons to dispense with the services of clergymen and justices of the peace as well, when they desire to remarry, and thus set the fashion for those who have never been married to do the same.

Thus unconsciously does man overreach himself when he presumes to set up limitations to nature, for nature knows no limitation and will not be restrained without causing much havoc and destruction.

Thus believing, we have no hesitancy in advocating the utmost freedom in sexual relations as in all other relations, in order that human health, human happiness and human progress and development may be hastened.

We are well aware that whoever conceives of, or advocates, or practices anything which is contrary to that which is called "the established order of things" is called "radical," or "extremist," and is liable to be misjudged and roundly abused, for radicalism means "root-work—the uprooting of all falsehoods and abuses," and it is not saying too much to say that the one who attempts to uproot all the falsehoods, the errors and abuses which have become established through social limitation has set for himself, or herself, no easy task. We are encouraged to make some slight attempt in this direction, knowing that whatever measure of freedom has been secured by mankind has come through the efforts of individuals who were far-seeing and courageous enough first to conceive of greater benefits to be derived in a new and different order of things; secondly, to openly advocate the same, and thirdly, to put their ideas into practice in their own lives in defiance of adverse opinion and social ostracism; aye! in defiance of persecution and even death itself.

It has become more or less unpopular in these days to put to death those who differ in opinions from the powers that be—perhaps owing to the fact that the more dissenters put to death the more numerous they became. It is still customary to criticize and ostracize and even persecute in various petty ways those who dare to show their contempt for conventional decrees and customs, and are honest enough to satisfy, as far as possible, all the needs of their three-fold natures—physical, mental, and spiritual—in the simplest and most natural manner, without recognizing any necessity to practice hypocrisy and deceit, or suffer shame or condemnation because thereof.

One kind of people who doubtless would be most severe in their criticism of the idea of freedom in sexual relations can only be classified as the fig-leaf contingent of society, because the Bible story of Adam and Eve in the garden of Eden clothing themselves with fig leaves to cover their nakedness seems to be the most fitting illustration of those who clothe themselves with pretended virtue (it is nothing less), which only serves to direct attention to the shameful thoughts generated in their own minds, which none might discover, if they did not, like old Adam, cry out and confess: "I was afraid because I was naked, and I hid myself."

The "fig-leaf contingent" is but little if any worse than the class which I shall speak of as the "white feather brigade," who hate the sham and pretense, the hypocrisy and deceit of conventional life, and realize the possibilities for human happiness in a larger measure of social freedom, yet they are afraid to stand firmly by their convictions, and so they continue to wear their particular badge of slavery, which might as well be a "fig-leaf" as a "white feather" except that it is the manifestation of a slightly different stage of development, as one who has advanced from the primary department into an intermediate grade of schooling.

There is another species of critics that are certainly in a class by themselves, who apparently pose as the "advance agents" of reforms and reformers.

The only difference between them and the advance agents of Barnum and Bailey's circus is, that the circus agent goes ahead of the circus, bills the town, and stirs up the enthusiasm of the inhabitants in order to get them ready for the circus which is surely coming, while the advance agent of reform tells the reformer his "ideas are all right, but the people are not ready for them yet, and he had better get under cover, and stay there until the dear people have all the time there is in which to get ready."

The Chicago newspapers have a full staff of these "advance agents" of social freedom.

The next in order are the "past masters," who are not wearing fig leaves, and have forgotten what a white feather looks like, it is so long since they wore one, and they are so far ahead of the "advance agent" that the agent cannot even see the dust they raise to blind the eyes of those who are toiling after them.

This class have discarded the cloak of orthodox religion, and conventionality, and are not afraid that it should be known that they have exercised the utmost freedom in all of their social relations, but they have "got wise," so to speak, and having "run the gamut" of human experiences, they consider themselves eminently qualified to give a great deal of advice to others, so they tell us that "while of course it is natural and right, and therefore there is no necessity for condemnation in the fullest satisfaction of sex desire, it is better to rise above it, or overcome it, rather, by the power of our 'wills' governed by 'Reason.'"

How grand, how lofty and sublime it sounds, and how the idea suggests to our minds a state of development in which we might find ourselves "monarch of all we survey"; truly a consummation devoutly to be wished, but, unfortunately for us, as we seek to climb upward toward that dizzy pinnacle, we meet so many returning travelers that it becomes a cause of wonderment, and we fall into the natural error of jumping to the conclusion that they became weary before they reached the goal and so discouraged, retraced their steps.

We learn better after a while,—at least that has been my own experience, for I am willing to stand in the "confessional" if by so doing I can better illustrate the point I desire to make clear.

So, then, I confess to having tried the "queenly act" of sitting triumphantly upon "Reason's throne" for a whole year, and at the end of that time I cheerfully and willingly abdicated that position in favor of the next aspirant who was bound to find as I did and as so many others found before me, that the "throne of Reason," so called, is a cold, barren place, absolutely devoid of every element that is calculated to add to human comfort and satisfaction, except as a place of contemplation or retrospection for those who have the full consciousness of having enjoyed every experience they had ever desired.

Many persons pose as occupants of "Reason's throne" whose intellectual faculties have been developed at the expense of the physical, and therefore they have never possessed a desire for sexual intercourse and are unconscious of the fact that they have missed any desirable experience that is common to humanity. Such persons are frequently held up as models of so-called "virtue and morality" and they are often found sitting in judgment upon their fellows, and giving utterance to severest condemnation of their "immoral" acts.

We do not hesitate to say that such persons are credited with a virtue which they do not possess, and even their reason and judgment may be questioned, since no one is, or can be, qualified to pass judgment upon so vital a matter, who knows nothing about it.

"Hearsay evidence" is challenged in any court, and in the case in question the evidence of those who have qualified as witnesses, through actual experience, is overwhelmingly in favor of more freedom and less restriction in the natural expression of our sex natures.

I realized all of this only when I tried for a year to occupy the position of "judge" while fully cognizant of a sense of having missed an experience which I longed for with all the strength of my nature, the experience of loving and being loved without limitation, so I climbed down "off of the throne" and came back to earth, so to speak, "to qualify." So much for those who are the chiefest among the objectors to the establishment of greater freedom in the sex relation.

Every objector is entitled to the privilege of choosing his own class, while I pass on to a consideration of the objections generally advanced by the individuals I have referred to, and bring such argument to bear upon them as I may be able to do, in this effort to break the chains which the past has fastened upon humanity, and establish true freedom in self-expression for all.

FROM ANOTHER CONVENTIONAL MORALIST.

[In No. 1,035 of LUCIFER the second page was monopolized by a letter from a defender of old-time standards of morality living in New Zealand. In this issue a like courtesy is extended to a Christian clergyman whose home is in Ohio, U. S. A. In this way LUCIFER'S management vindicates its claim that all sides are heard in its columns. Brother Potts is a paying subscriber to LUCIFER. He does not ask the freedom of its platform—as some do—without helping to defray the necessary expense of publication. As in the case of Brother Longdill, and of others who antagonize the radical views of the editor and principal supporters of our journal, I now ask for Brother Potts a courteous, fair and candid hearing.—M. H.]

"Dear Moses Harman: This is the sacred Sabbath Day, and I have just returned from the English Lutheran Sunday school, where I taught a class of adults on John vii, 37-46, concerning 'Jesus at the Feast of the Tabernacles,' A. D. 29-33. It was very interesting to myself and the class. We all seemed to drink in the spirit of the lesson. The presence of the divine spirit was very manifest, to enlighten our minds, and to warm our hearts. The time was all too short, as expressed by the class, to drink in the whole lesson. There were but five in the class, and myself—six in all. There were two wives, their husbands not present, but living in happy wedlock; two husbands, wives not in the class, but they are living happily, as I know. The one married man present is the father of a son who last summer graduated from the college and seminary at Springfield, O., and is now in the active ministry. The other one a single young man, and myself, bereft of a wife with whom I had lived from 1861 to 1901—forty years. Our first and fourth son, with mother, I am assured, are over in the land of peace and beauty. I am on this shore, with two sons and their wives.

"What a pity, it seems to me, to break up the present order of society, when we have nothing better to offer in its place, even defective as it is in its present stage of advancement. Is it not so that, after all, bating the defections from the ideal, that the aggregate of human happiness lies in the present order? Monogamy in its highest and truest conception is the divine ideal. We can not improve upon it by any other system. It is the best results of the highest ideal of the most progressive civilization. Everything else has been tried. This prevails, in conception, in civilized life. Generally we have not come up to the ideal. But instead of destroying what we have for some vague and untried theory, it were better to perfect what we have. So it seems to me.

"I am sorry for your recent legal affliction. But I cannot see how the civil authorities could do otherwise and be consistent with themselves.

"So far as I understand you, I sympathize with the end you have in view—to be well born and well bred; to free womankind from sexual slavery; but I cannot approve of your methods of reaching these ends, nor do I think the plans you propose will reach the results you desire. It seems to me that you are in a mist and a delusion. I do not impugn your motives.

"'It seems to me that the remedy lies in the Sunday school lesson of to-day, March 5, 1905. If any man earnestly desire any good thing in this life, or in the life to come, let him come unto me in spirit and in truth, in mind, heart and life, and imbibe my truth, my spirit, my disposition, my self-control, my life. He that believeth on me or accepts in sentiment and practice the foregoing facts,' as the Divine Truth has said, 'out of his inward, spiritual affections shall flow an abundance of the things he so earnestly and truly desires.' The Divine Likeness will most assuredly bring divine results. The fullness of the Divine Truth and the Divine Spirit are a sufficient remedy for all life's ills. These will lead men to a divine choice in wedlock, and to the proper course of life after marriage in all things toward each other afterward. The Truth of God is the power of God unto salvation or deliverance from error to all those who believe and show their knowledge and faith by their conduct.

"Yours most truly,
"JOHN VINTON POTTS.

"North Robinson, Ohio, March 5, 1905."

I have really no desire to enter a lengthened controversy with Brother Potts, believing that personal controversy is very apt to degenerate into a struggle for victory in argument, in which struggle the discovery of truth for truth's sake becomes a secondary consideration or is lost sight of altogether. Having once held very similar views myself, I can easily understand how our critic can be a thoroughly honest man and yet defend that which now seems to me wholly unscientific, absurd and irrational.

As I see it, the teachings attributed to the man Jesus are suited only to a very ignorant and undeveloped age of the world. His views of human government were those of the paternalist and autocrat, using those words in the customary sense. Take the first two verses of the "Sunday school lesson" referred to by our Ohio friend—

"In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink. He that believeth on me as the scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water: (But this he spake of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive: for the Holy Ghost was not yet given; because that Jesus was not yet glorified.")

In the first place, it strikes me that this is the language of a religious enthusiast or fanatic, rather than that of a philosopher, or even a man of good common sense. It is the language of one who wishes to be a leader of men, a founder of a sect or new religion. In all times there has been no lack of men who sought leadership through assumption of superior holiness, or superior knowledge of what they claimed to be the "will of God." If the Roman governor had not committed the blunder and the crime of putting Jesus to death there would probably never have been an organized Christian church; never have been the long succession of religious wars growing out of the attempt to convert the world to Christianity; never have been such a thing as the Roman Inquisition, and never have been such attempts to throttle freedom of speech and of press as we see to-day, in support of so-called Christian morality, and Brother Potts—kind-hearted man as he is—would not now be found among the supporters of the law that would deprive me of liberty and property because I conscientiously oppose a system that enslaves the mothers, and through slavery of motherhood in the sex relation enslaves the whole human race, and bars the way to human progress.

I close by reminding Brother Potts that I do not oppose monogamy as such, nor any other form of sex-association. It is the denial of liberty to choose or refuse that I oppose. That many people live happily in the monogamic relation and raise children that are a blessing to their parents and to the world, is doubtless true, but this does make it the less true that enforced monogamy is perhaps the worst of all forms of human slavery.

"WOMEN, LOVE AND LIFE."

One of the strong, virile, aggressive, uncompromising, unconventional, independent thinkers and writers of our era of transition from faith to reason, from superstition to science, is William Platt, of London, England. Though not an iconoclast of the old, to the extent that most of LUCIFER'S contributors are iconoclasts, Mr. Platt's books show that he is by no means a worshipper at the shrine of Madame Grundy, nor is he follower of Paul or Peter in his theological views.

In order that our readers may better understand the attitude of Brother Platt towards the sex revolution, I herewith make some selections from his book entitled, "Women, Love and Life":

"A lady at a ball dropped her garter, and the humanity present divided into two usual classes, either smirked with the lewdness of humanity, or blushed with the lewdness of humanity. But the great King Edward took up the garter and said, 'Let the shame be on the thinker of shame,' a thing for all eternity to remember.

"And the great King, pursuing his noble thought, founded an order of Knights, the Knights of the Garter. And the meaning of their foundation was this—to cry out their eternal truth that to men noble of nature garters and the thighs they bind, flesh, sex, nakedness, all is grand and holy,—let the shame be to the lewd man who smirks, let the shame be to the lewd man who blushes, to loose libertinism, lust and lechery; to grovelling Grundyism, bastard Bowdlerism, prurient purity—society-ism—but no shame to the pick and chivalry of men, no shame to the 'Knights of the Garter.'"

"Love is grave and terribly in earnest. Love is short-lived man's one chance of eternity—a beautiful eternity springing as it does out of the love for him of the girl he loves. Love then thinks first of the children to come—it is that we call honor in love.

"It is the thought of the children which issues the command to a girl that she must make her lover swear, before he reaches her body, that he will own proudly to the fatherhood of the children of their bodies: that vow we call marriage. People say "It is for the protection of women"; were it only that, a woman would be justified in setting it aside; but is more than that, it is for the protection of the race; that is why it is so deep a rule of honor. A man who touches any woman, no matter whom, without having married her, is no man; yet the woman who allows a man not married to her to touch her is one whom no person with a heart will judge—the suffering she is bound to meet will atone—yet let all remember that the law of honor is marriage. And remember that there is no true marriage save that which welcomes the children into the world with joy; lust-beds, not marriage-beds, are they that are dead to the hope of children; and the crime of murdering men is as nothing compared to that of bringing babes unloved into the world; death is a quick misery, lack of love when young and the shame of such bastard birth is a long-stretched misery. And love goes yet deeper into the point of honor—love is one of the supreme creators of honorable living. Certain it is indeed that a man's most honorable deeds, be they for a woman's sake or not, will be inspired by the thought of some woman; and a woman's most honorable deeds, be they for a man's sake or not, will be inspired by the thought of some man. Quite simple it is that when we love we should seek before all things to be worthy of our sweethearts; but beyond that it seems as though, love being our strivings for perpetuation, some instinct cried out to us that when in love we must raise ourselves to our highest spiritual possibilities; that the race may continue to hold in it something that is noble. And so rich is true love in high and honorable feelings that men in stark love will die if that woman fails them whom they long for; feeling that their only true eternity is lost to them."

LUCIFER: ITS MEANING AND PURPOSE.

LUCIFER—The planet Venus; so called from its brightness.—Webster's Dictionary.

LUCIFEROUS—Giving light; affording light or the means of discovery.—Same.

LUCIFIC—Producing light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing, and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

CONGRESS SHALL MAKE NO LAW RESPECTING AN ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, OR PROHIBITING THE FREE EXERCISE THEREOF; OR ABRIDGING THE FREEDOM OF SPEECH, OR OF THE PRESS; OR THE RIGHT OF THE PEOPLE PEACEABLY TO ASSEMBLE, AND TO PETITION THE GOVERNMENT FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES.—First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

NOTICE.

I am spending a few weeks in Chicago in the interest of radical propaganda. Any desiring to arrange for lectures or personal visits may address me care of Charles T. Brown, 79 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill. This applies not only to Chicago and Illinois, but to all states bordering or near Illinois on any side. I trust to meet many friends of LUCIFER in this city. As my future plans must be made rapidly, those intending to write should do so at once. JAMES F. MORTON, JR.

WHAT OUR CONTEMPORARIES ARE SAYING.

From letters and clippings received at this office it would seem that the late arrest of LUCIFER's editor at the instigation of the postal censors has been made a subject of note and comment by many editors and newsgatherers. A few of these are here reproduced:

Under the head, "The Latest Outrage," the editor of the "Demonstrator," Lake Bay, Wash., makes the following earnest and cogent appeal to the readers of that brave young giant of western journalism:

"The unspeakable cowards who are carrying on the national conspiracy against free speech are never satisfied. By the time this reaches the readers of The Demonstrator most of them will already have learned that Moses Harman, the lifelong champion of freedom, justice and intelligence, has again been arrested by the haters of human progress. The matter singled out for especial censure is the able presentation of "Sex Radicalism" by Dora Forster. At the time of writing the outcome is uncertain. When I reach Chicago I will report the matter in full to The Demonstrator. In the meantime I urge all readers to wake up and take a hand in the fight. Our own liberties are at stake in it. The penalty of indifference is enslavement. In my pamphlet, "Do You Want Free Speech?" I have sounded the note of alarm, and exposed the plot to destroy our remaining liberties by the underhanded methods of the slimy thing known as Comstockism. Those who have not read this exposure will realize the seriousness of the present situation much better by doing so. Almost alone among writers and editors I have declared this to be the great issue of the hour, and have urged all Liberals to join the Free Speech League, and build up a powerful movement in defense of freedom and justice. Lethargy and indifference are ruining us. We have seen the murder of Ida Craddock, the infamous deportation of John Turner; and our shameful failure to be aroused by these outrages has emboldened the agents of reaction to attempt the present crime. Will you, readers of The Demonstrator, persist in the slothfulness which has already produced this evil condition; or will you, even tardily, awaken? If you had stood by the Free Speech League as I have so long pleaded with you to do, we should to-day have a powerful associative movement capable of doing battle with the medieval plotters and subjecting them to crushing defeat. Enough mischief has been done; but there is still time to save something. The league, although crippled by your inaction, still exists, and has taken steps to aid in this great contest. Where will you stand? Will you sit back idly and let others contribute all the means and do all the work? Or will you appreciate the privilege of doing your share? Consider well, if Liberalism is more than a name to you. JAMES F. MORTON, JR."

One of the latest candidates for popular favor in the field of journalism is To-morrow, a monthly magazine issued as the organ of the People's Industrial College, located at 1926 Indiana avenue, Chicago. The head of this college and editor of the magazine, To-morrow, is Oscar L. Triggs, late a professor in the Rockefeller University, Chicago. In the April number of To-morrow appears this very significant paragraph, under the head, "An American Press Censorship":

"At times it seems that the words of men like Milton, and his equally great successor as an advocate of liberty, John Stuart Mill, were likely to be forgotten, and restrictions placed upon the press which would effectually throttle it and nullify its power for good. Anthony Comstock, rebuked in a thousand courts is still at work confusing all right relations between art and expression, and suppressing indiscriminately works of art and literature and the gutter type of writing and printing; and others, imbued by the same zeal and the same lack of wisdom, are following in his footsteps and attacking at random all that does not square with their prejudices in the way of book, picture and periodical. The loss to liberty is being felt in all this, but little is being done to prevent further encroachment, which seems impending. Moses Harman of Chicago, the aged and long persecuted editor of LUCIFER, is the latest victim of pruriency and stupidity, and will probably have to stand trial for having spoken plainly on sex matters. The interests of truth are at stake here, and this case should be kept in mind."

The largest of the distinctively "materialistic" Free-thought papers of the United States, and, since the death of the Boston Investigator, the oldest, is known as the Truth Seeker, New York. In its issue of March 18 The Truth Seeker has this to say in regard to the late arrest of LUCIFER's editor, and of the causes which seem to have led to that arrest.

"The idiocy of the suppressors of free speech is again illustrated in the recent arrest of Moses Harman for sending through the mails copies of LUCIFER containing essays on free love. While these essays are physiologically puerile and sociologically impossible, they have harmed no one who has read them, and hitherto but few have read them compared to those who will now struggle to obtain copies. We have had LUCIFER right along, but never saw anything in the essays to compensate for the time spent in reading them, and we venture to say that if the postal authorities had let them alone they would have fallen into an innocuous desuetude deeper even than that of the ex-president who coined the phrase. Persecuting them by prosecuting the publisher will raise a clamor for them greater than the demand for the pamphlets of the late Ida Craddock, and if the publisher is worldly wise he will put a big price on the articles and raise a defense fund by their sale.

"For many weeks Dora Forster has been writing in LUCIFER upon 'Sex Radicalism,' and the tenth article in the series seems to have been the straw which broke the camel's back. The attention of the postoffice was evidently called to the contents of the paper by the Canadian postal authorities who have fined LUCIFER as a paper not fit to circulate in that country. The Canadians have paid the same compliment to The Truth Seeker, but failed to obtain the co-operation of our own postal department in suppressing it. Another writer for LUCIFER is Sara Crist Campbell, and this person's communication entitled 'More Thoughts on Sexology' is obnoxious to the law.

"Dora Forster advocates free love, denouncing what she terms puritanism in social life, while the Campbell person advances the early teachings of the Oneida Communists as desirable for present day practices. While the articles are mostly tommyrot and hogwash, there are no obscene words in them, and they contain nothing at all likely 'to deprave and corrupt the morals of those whose minds are open to such influences, and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall,' unless their minds are weaker even than a Sunday school scholar's. We do not believe the prosecution can find any one whose morals have been depraved and corrupted by them, and until such injury has been proved it is a most unjust and tyrannical act to imprison the publisher of LUCIFER.

"Moses Harman is now about eighty years old. He is one of the most kind-hearted men we ever met—honest and truthful, encroaches upon no one's liberty of thought or act; an estimable citizen, a true friend, intelligent far beyond the average; in short, a man of the most exemplary kind. If the world was peopled exclusively by men like him there would be no need of policemen, judges, or law courts. The court which condemns him will condemn itself. The law which imprisons him is a brutal law. The persons who are persecuting him have no conception of what he considers his work to be, and are only desirous of making out a case to enrich their records of convictions. But it would be better—a thousand times better—that they drew their wages of sin for doing nothing than that they should work such an infamous injustice as to imprison a man like Moses Harman for printing some foolish stuff from writers who mean well even if they do not know."

I have often found occasion to speak in terms of hearty commendation of the work done by The Truth Seeker, its editor and leading contributors, especially in defense of freedom of speech and in opposition to the un-American legislation under which freedom of speech and of press have been denied and outraged, and now it gives me decided pleasure to be able to chronicle another instance in which the paper founded by D. M. Bennett has been true to the spirit and example of its founder.

Lest, however, I be misunderstood, I would here discriminate a little.

Most sincerely do I thank the editor of The Truth Seeker, Eugene Macdonald, in my own name and in the name of all who feel an interest in the continued life of LUCIFER, for his energetic protest against the work of the suppressors, the censors of press, the prurient prudes who use the public mail to disseminate their own literature, but deny to others the rights and privileges they claim and use for themselves; but while very honestly and candidly giving voice to these words of commendation, I would be untrue to my own convictions of right and truth if I should fail to enter a mild protest against part of the quoted editorial of The Truth Seeker.

While Eugene Macdonald has been even more kind and landatory, when speaking of LUCIFER's editor, than I could expect or claim for myself, I cannot overlook the fact that he has been scarcely kind, just or civil to my friends, Dora Forster and Sara Crist Campbell.

These are the real names of real persons; then why should quotation marks be used when their names are mentioned? And why should any one speak of the last named as the "Campbell person"? There may have been no insult intended, but the similarity of this mode of expression to the well-known method employed by some things in human shape, who try to destroy the good name of their human sisters by such phrases as "the Campbell woman," "the Jones woman," etc., cannot be overlooked by the observant reader.

Then as to the words "tommyrot and hogwash"! Perhaps I do not know the meaning of these terms. Perhaps Brother Macdonald simply meant that the writings of Dora Forster and Sara Campbell were beyond his powers of comprehension, or something of that sort, and that he meant nothing ungallant or disrespectful toward these cultured and every way reputable and honorable contributors to LUCIFER's columns.

Not wishing to get into a controversy with any one, and especially not with any of the defenders of freedom of speech and of press, I close by saying, in brief, that to my thinking the dogmatic spirit is not the scientific, the philosophic spirit. To my thinking none of us are wise enough to be justified in assuming oracular knowledge, or good enough to be justified in assuming a pharisaic tone when speaking of our fellow human beings and of their views of life and its problems; and, finally, while I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, I here and now venture the prediction that in the coming years, when mankind shall have outgrown its ignorant prejudices in regard to questions relating to sex, the names of Dora Forster and of Sara Crist Campbell will be held in grateful and honored remembrance, when, perchance, the names of some editors of reform journals of to-day—my own name perhaps included—will be held in comparative light esteem, if not entirely forgotten.

M. HARMAN.

RESPONSES TO THE CENSORSHIP.

From a good-sized basketful of letters from friends in reference to the latest attempt of our paternal government to throttle freedom of speech and of press, I take, almost at random, the following as samples of the whole, sincerely regretting that LUCIFER's space is so small that but few, comparatively, of these letters can see the light of print in its columns. Asking our friends to kindly take the will for the deed, and hoping in the not distant future to make such changes in LUCIFER's columns that a greater number of contributors can be given space, I desire once more to return heartiest thanks for all the good words of sympathy and fraternal regard received in letters or otherwise since the last visit of the United States deputy marshal to LUCIFER's sanctum; also sincerest thanks to all who are sending or have sent financial help to be used in defense in court, or in any other way to keep the banner floating at LUCIFER's masthead.

"Editor LUCIFER: Again the American eagle, which has become a bird of prey, has clutched you in its talons. I am amazed, for I had come to believe the time had passed by for a repetition of such gross injustice as had been meted out to you in the past.

"Liberty! We have no liberty in this government, nor in any other government, in fact. The words liberty and government are antipodal, in meaning. It is as Crosby stated, we build monuments only to our dead; hence, we have the monumental fraud of 'Liberty enlightening the World.'

"The secular press is now discussing the marriage question about as plainly as does LUCIFER. I think it is religious prejudice more than anything else that prompts the Comstock gang to persecute you as they do. You have my hearty sympathy and co-operation in the work of striking the shackles from humanity to the extent of my ability. I hope you will have ample moral and financial support in this our battle for the rights of free speech, a free press and the inviolability of the mails.

Sincerely yours,
"JULIET H. SEVERANCE, M. D.,
"578 E. Sixtieth St., Chicago."

"Dear Friends of Freedom: What! must Moses Harman go to prison again? It is a monstrous outrage! More unreasonable and more astonishing than were the persecutions of Galileo for holding that the earth has a right to rotate and revolve; or than the persecutions of Harvey for standing up for the blood's right to circulate.

"LUCIFER obscene? It is no more obscene than a fresh blooming rose! The postoffice officials call knowledge obscenity. If LUCIFER were read by men only, the postoffice department would not oppose it. If Ida Craddock's books were read by men only, they would not be condemned. Men are afraid that knowledge will spoil women for the service of men.

"I was once postmaster of a fourth-class office in Dakota. Many circulars came to the office. Among them one day I found one full of genuine obscenity, yet it was an open circular bearing a one-cent stamp. Every postal clerk or official could read it who chose to do so, but none condemned it. It advertised 'Attraction Wafers.'

"I have seen cards advertising different brands of tobacco which contained the filthiest, lowest insinuations imaginable. They pass freely everywhere and no postoffice official classes them as obscene.

"The Kreutzer Sonata is not allowed to pass through the mail. Why?

"What of the Decameron, a book handed down from generation to generation for five centuries? Evidently men consider it a valuable book, for it passes freely through the mails; and yet in it lust plays naked on an open stage. Why do not the postoffice officials interfere? Is it not because this book contains nothing calculated to endanger man's rule over woman?

"BERTHA MOORE,
"478 Williams Ave., Portland, Ore."

"When you sent me the first sample copy of your paper about two years ago I considered it rather 'strong medicine,' but was struck by your chaste language and the cultured style in which you approached delicate subjects, and I took it as a proof that there must be a noble sentiment underlying it all. Since that time I have been reading, and corresponded with a number of libertarians, such as E. C. Walker, J. William Lloyd and James F. Morton, Jr., and I am now fully convinced of the soundness of your position. I am convinced that what humanity needs is not more laws, not more courts, not more scaffolds, or more hangmen, but more enlightenment and more liberty. And as for you, Brother Harman, if you should be called upon once more to go to prison for conscience's sake you may rest assured that your friends will not forget you nor the good work you have done for them. I would like to have your photo if you have any left, and will send you the price by return mail.

"Yours for the Social Revolution,
"C. PETERSON,
"Manti, Utah."

HOW TO HELP LUCIFER TO WIN.

Several plans are being proposed by which it is believed LUCIFER's readers and patrons can most effectively help to win the defensive fight against the censorship of press and mails. One of the most practical is doubtless that voiced by "R. T."—a nom de plume—who writes from West Virginia, in these words:

"Am sorry about your late trouble. Will help financially when the time comes. I like LUCIFER as it is."

Here follows an order for ten dollars' worth of ammunition to extend the work of education to which LUCIFER is devoted. Among the books and pamphlets ordered are twelve copies of "New Hedonism," by Grant Allen; seven copies of "Sex Radicalism," by Dora Forster; four copies of "Jeannette, the Reclaimed Delilah," by a "Man of the World"; two bound volumes of LUCIFER, etc., etc. Evidently Brother "R. T." means to help to awaken the public conscience to a sense of the need of better standards of morality by circulating cheap radical literature among his neighbors. Apparently he is emulating the example of a friend in Ohio, who, a few years ago, invested about $35 in LUCIFER's cheaper literature for the purpose of starting a circulating library.

Here is a copy of a recent letter from a friend in Kansas voicing the same method of helping LUCIFER to win its unequal battle for freedom and justice:

"Dear Mr. Harman: I am very sorry to hear of your arrest. I think you surely will win the martyr's crown, but as money is more effective than words, will enclose postoffice order for $5 to pay for those books I got in the winter, and renew my subscription to LUCIFER. Hoping that right will prevail and that you will soon stand free and justified before the world, I am

"Sincerely yours,
"MRS. S. A. BAYLOR."

And here is still another:

"The six copies of 'Sex Radicalism' you sent came duly to hand and I inclose herewith a dollar to pay for same. As my time is much occupied lately, I am unable to devote much of it to canvassing or propaganda work. But rest assured that if I can place more copies of the booklet, I will surely do so. I was much surprised to learn of your arrest in connection with this interesting and valuable publication, which ought to be in the hands of every intelligent person in the world. Hoping that you may succeed in justifying yourself and vindicating your course, I am

Fraternally yours,
"C. H. WESSELER.

"Ouray, Colo., March 22, 1905."

One more only must suffice for this time as samples of letters of encouragement from those who feel that LUCIFER's battle is their battle as well:

"I enclose money order for $2 on books. I received the two paper-bound pamphlets all right. Since I got my last LUCIFER, I do not know what to think. Can there still be people who desire to see children born of mothers who are nothing but sexual slaves? An old man who has watched LUCIFER's struggle for years said to me the other day: 'Mr. Harman has given his life to help women, but they do not pay any attention to him.' But I could not agree with him. All I am I owe to LUCIFER and its teachings, and I think there are others. I am not fortunate enough to be a mother, but I know if I ever become a mother my children will not be slaves, thanks to LUCIFER.

"I am a wage-slave, spending most of my time in another woman's kitchen, and cannot do much to help you, but oh, I hope you will come out on top. I would gladly pay $5 a year for LUCIFER once a month rather than to see it suspended.

"Sincerely yours,
"LENA SELIE.

"March 12, 1905."

Whether the battle for freedom of speech and press is won in this generation cannot now be foreseen, but if won, or when won, the victory will be mainly due to those who furnish the "sinews of war" and who tirelessly work to change public opinion in regard to such vital questions as those discussed in LUCIFER's pamphlet literature. Once more, good friends, please accept heartiest thanks for timely and generous co-operation.

M. HARMAN.

IMPORTANCE OF FREEDOM OF SPEECH.

The cause of free speech is the cause of man. A gagged mouth is worse than a shackled body. Truth is born of open discussion. The days of the inquisition were the darkest days of the human race. A beneficial censorship is a contradiction in terms. Every censor is, consciously or unconsciously, an enemy of humanity. The paltry excuses for restriction of free discussion sometimes to be heard from pulpits or read in newspaper columns, always have their genesis in corrupt motives or in gross ignorance. No honest man needs to fear the open discussion of any question. When all sides are given a full hearing, there can be no fear of the defeat of the truth. Conscious error likes to creep into dark holes and shuns the bright light of day. The whine that the opposition should be suppressed comes from cowards who have no real faith in the convincing power of that in which they pretend to believe. The persecutor brands himself in the eyes of the coming age. He may triumph for the moment; but his memory becomes a stench in the nostrils of future generations; and his cause is doomed, unless worthier advocates succeed in purifying it from the stain. Comstock is the greatest enemy of purity in the United States, as Philip the Second of Spain was in reality the deadliest foe of Christianity, and as those who suppress the utterance of anarchist opinions are the worst traitors to the government they profess to adore. The crowned madman of Germany has done more to bring monarchy into disrepute than the entire radical press of Europe; and his lese majeste laws have only succeeded in bringing him into richly deserved contempt.

In all ages the truest lovers of mankind have toiled to imbue their fellows with the spirit of open-mindedness. The cause of free speech numbers the most glorious martyrs in history. Socrates, whose name we hold in reverence to-day, was murdered by the Athenian people for seeking to lead them to think for themselves. Bruno in death and Galileo in imprisonment paid the penalty of loving truth more than public opinion. Roger Bacon upheld the cause of scientific research against unnumbered persecutions. Milton perceived that no error was so fatal as the suppression of thought, and penned his glorious Areopagitica, which remains to this day an unanswerable argument to all who, either from mental weakness or from a tyrannous disposition, seek to set bounds to human speculation or expression. Voltaire, Paine and a host of others have followed in demonstrating that free minds and free lips were necessary in order that men might grow and learn. In our own land Elijah Lovejoy gave his life for the principle of freedom of the press; and from his martyrdom was born the grand apostleship of Wendell Phillips in the cause of freedom. We stand indeed on holy ground when we approach the sublime company of those who, through the ages, have striven to secure, not only for themselves, but for all mankind, the right of unfettered utterance on every theme. Well for us if we are found worthy to tread in their footsteps, and to bear the most humble part in this great work.

Never was the cause of free speech in greater need of fearless championship. The people of the United States seem drugged or stupefied on this vital issue. For thirty years Comstockism, trailing its slimy length with the immunity afforded by plausible but damnably false pretenses of concern for public purity, has sunk its venomed fangs deep in the flesh of men and women immeasurably purer than their persecutors. The foul murder of Ida C. Craddock was but an episode in the filthy career of this spawn of utter vileness. More recently the growing spirit of Imperialism has proceeded to almost incredible lengths. Free speech is confessedly strangled in Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, and restrained even in Cuba, where the United States cannot pretend to have any right to meddle. Sedition laws, the enactment of which utterly destroyed the Federalist party of a hundred years ago, are to-day complacently received by the degenerate issue of sires to whom liberty was something more than a name. The Declaration of Independence is trodden under foot and spit upon by the present rulers of our land as containing too strong an affirmation of human rights. Workingmen are denied the privelge of peaceable assembly and the right to reason with their fellow workers. All these are but symptoms of a great and growing disease, the cure of which lies in the development of public intelligence.

This is the cause to which we have pledged ourselves. In our work for freedom of expression we invite the co-operation of all who believe in according to others the rights they claim for themselves. Human rights are without exceptions. White, black, brown, yellow or red of hue; male or female, young or old, poor or rich, of every class and rank; Catholic, Protestant, Buddhist, Jew, Mohammedan, Mormon, Theosophist, Spiritualist, Mental or Christian Scientist, Dowieite, Koreshan, Atheist or Agnostic in religion; Republican, Democrat, Prohibitionist, Socialist, Single Taxer or Anarchist in political alliance or social philosophy; all these and all others are entitled to the full and free expression of their ideas of truth, and should be protected in it. Not all of them can be right. Perhaps none of them is wholly right. But out of the friction of their contending views is kindled the spark of truth. All true progress must come by the road of freedom of expression. Let us, therefore, build well for the millions who are pressing ahead, that their course be not checked by stumbling blocks unworthy of an enlightened age.—James F. Morton, Jr., in "Do You Want Free Speech?"

Subscribers who receive more than one copy of Lucifer, when not ordered, will please use the extra copy or copies to induce their friends to subscribe, it only for a trial trip of three months for 25 cents. Stamps received in payment. As the paper weighs less than one ounce a copy can sent to a friend in a common 2 cent letter, with an ordinary sized sheet of note paper.

SEX RADICALISM.

BY DORA FORSTER.

The following is the table of contents:
Chapter I—Who are our Teachers?
Chapter II—What must we learn in Health Science?
Chapter III—Sex as a Social Force.
Chapter IV—What is permanent in the Puritan Ideal?
Chapter V—Puritan Sex System as it actually is.
Chapter VI—The Sex War.
Chapter VII—Sex Denial under Bondage and under Freedom.
Chapter VIII—What is Marriage?
Chapter IX—What made Emancipation possible?
Chapter X—An Ideal of Sex Life.

"Sex Contains All," says Whitman. The fact that a Booklet of fifty-six pages, Treating of Sex in a Common-sense, Rational and Unconventional way, can Throw the Heads of the Postoffice Departments of Canada and the United States Into a Spasm of Fear for the Safety of the Mails would seem to Confirm Whitman's Axiomatic Saying. The same Charge is Made against "Sex Radicalism" that was Made against "Leaves of Grass" and "Cupid's Yokes," namely, OBSCENITY! The Opinion of some Hundreds of Readers of this Booklet is Voiced by One of their Number, who writes:

"Millions are Starving for this Very Kind of Obscenity!"

Price, 25 cents, in handsome leatherette binding. In superior cloth, with gold lettering, 50 cents. The usual reductions in price to those who buy to sell again, or for distribution. Address LUCIFER's office, 500 Fulton street, Chicago.

THE PIONEER ORGAN OF ANARCHISM.

LIBERTY.

BENJ. R. TUCKER, EDITOR.

An Anarchistic Journal, expounding the doctrine that in Equal Liberty is to be found the most satisfactory solution of social questions, and that majority rule, or democracy, equally with monarchial rule, is a denial of Equal Liberty.

APPRECIATIONS:

G. Bernard Shaw, editor of the "Fabian Essays" and author of "The Quintessence of Ibsenism": "Liberty is a lively paper, in which the usual proportions of half-pennyworth of discussion to an intolerable deal of balderdash are reversed."

Ernest H. Crosby, author of "Captain Jinks, Hero," and "Swords and Ploughshares": "In these days of running after false gods, it is refreshing to find one American remaining unflinchingly true to Liberty, and using in her defense not his emotions, but a particularly keen and vigorous intellect and style."

William Douglass O'Connor, author of "The Good Gray Poet" and "Hamlet's Note-Book": "The editor of Liberty would be the Gavroche of the Revolution, if he were not its Enjolras."

Aug. McCraith, formerly Secretary of the American Federation of Labor: "Liberty is the only paper that points the way."

Hugo Bilgram, author of "Involuntary Idleness" and "The Iron Law of Wages": "Liberty distinguishes itself among economic periodicals by the fearless discussion and condemnation of the faults of the present economic order, and exhibits its fairness by giving its opponents the fullest opportunity for criticism."

Postage, 5c.

MARRIAGE IN FREE SOCIETY. Edward Carpenter. One of the best short works on the subject. Daintily printed. A charming little gift book. "Love is doubtless the last and most difficult lesson that humanity has to learn; in a sense it underlies all the others. Perhaps the time has come for the modern nations when, ceasing to be children, they may even try to learn it." 25c.

TOKOLOGY. A book for every woman. By Alice B. Stockham, M. D. Illustrated. Tokology teaches possible painless pregnancy and parturition, giving full, plain directions for the care of a woman before and after confinement. The ailments of pregnancy can be prevented as well as the pains and dangers of childbirth avoided, and women need not go down to death giving birth to children. English, German or Swedish. $2.25.

HILDA'S HOME; A Story of Woman's Emancipation. Rosa Grant. With Macaulay, Rosa Genl would say, "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman will be less loving and lovable, or that man will be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish. 426 pages. Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

THE NEW HEDONISM. Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old asceticism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new Hedonism says: 'Be happy and you will be virtuous.'" In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediæval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproducing function." Paper covers; 32 large pages; twelve copies, 25c; single copy, 5c.

OUR WORSHIP OF PRIMITIVE SOCIAL QUESTERS. E. C. Walker. Contents: Love and Law; The Moloch of the Monogamic Ideal; The Continuity of Race-Life, and Tyranny; Food and Sex Fallacies, a Criticism; When Men and Women Are and When They Are Not Varietists; The New Woman; What Is She? What Will She Be? The State Hiding Behind Its Own Mistakes; Bishop Potter's Opinion of Divorce; Love; Its Attraction and Expression; Is She an Honest Girl? Lloyd, Platt and the Pitiful Facts; Social Radicals and Parentage; Anthropology and Monogamy Love and Trust Versus Fear; Reflections upon Reading William Platt's "Women, Love, and Life." 15c.

KAREZZA. Ethics of Marriage. Alice B. Stockham, M. D., author of Tokology. Karezza gives a high ideal to parental functions and pleads for justice to the unborn child. Karezza is really a supplement to Tokology and elucidates a theory of marital relations, which leads to individual growth and a closer bond of union, the practice of which at all times gives complete control of the fecundating power. Karezza controverts the prevailing ideas of baseness and degradation associated with the sexual nature, makes a plea for a better birthright for the child, for a controlled and designed maternity, and aims to lead individuals to a higher development of themselves, through a knowledge of their creative powers. Karezza is the product of knowledge and experience, and is presented to the world with a deep abiding faith, that its teachings will lead individuals to purer lives, to right understanding and appreciation of the sex functions, to intelligent control of propagation and finally through right adjustment in most sacred relations, to the ideal marriage. Levant cloth, prepaid, $1.

LOVE'S WAY TO PERFECT HUMANHOOD.
By Agnes Benham.

An excellent companion for Carpenter's "Love's Coming of Age." The keynote of the book, found on page 76, reads thus: "The soul itself is pure and heavenly, and if at the moment of conception and through the prenatal time when it is building its earthly house it could meet with entirely responsive and congenial conditions, then would the earth be peopled with a race of gods." Price $1. Published by the author, Agnes Benham, Adelaide, South Australia. Orders may be sent through this office.

GREAT LOVE.

It takes great love to stir a human heart,
To live beyond the others and apart.
A love that is not shallow, is not small,
Is not for one or two, but for them all.
Love that can wound love, for its higher need;
Love that can leave love, though the heart may bleed;
Love that can lose love, family and friend;
Yet steadily live, loving to the end.
A love that asks no answer, that can live
Moved by one burning, deathless force to give Love, Strength and Courage—Courage, Strength and Love,
The heroes of all time—are built thereof.

CHARLES P. STETSON in "Light of Truth."

SOCIAL FREEDOM.

PART II.

BY HULDA L. POTTER LOOMIS.

It is said that any religious doctrine can be sustained by Scriptural authority, and while I might also turn to the Bible and find ample justification for the sentiments I have expressed upon the subject of social freedom, I consider I have a better source from which to draw conclusions, and therefore turn to Mother Nature for a fitting illustration to use as a basis in the argument in favor of the condition under discussion.

I find the illustration I desire in the trees upon the plain and in the forest.

On the plain or in the open field the tree towers in majesty toward the sky, or spreads itself around, or slants along the ground, according to the innate bent of its nature, or in harmony with the providential breeze that sways it; but in full expression of its own needs and desires it responds lovingly, silently and tenderly to the warmth of the sunshine and the caress of the rain-drop; its roots draw grateful nourishment from the soil, and harmony and peace prevail while the tree develops and expands to the fullest extent of its nature.

In the forest it is different. There the tree is forced to conform to its environment and the limitations placed upon it by its surrounding companions.

It grows, as best it can, toward the light wherever light may be. Forced to modify its natural habit, in obedience to the pressure of circumstances over which it has no control, it takes such form and grows to such height and breadth as its neighbors allow it to do; all its energies being directed to the preservation of life in any shape, and at any sacrifice. May we not justly draw a comparison here between the trees and ourselves?

Left to ourselves, or surrounded only by Nature, we become outwardly that which the spirit within would fashion us to—but placed among our fellows, crushed and crowded against each other, shackled by conventionalities and customs, restrained by unjust and unnecessary laws, pruned and bent by the force of public opinion, we grow to be much like the trees in the forest, differing from each other only according to the light we can get which straggles through the intermingling of the heavy foliage of traditions, creeds and dogmas.

The tree, however, has less power to choose or reject its own environment than we have, and our power to do this should be governed wholly and entirely by our own human desires, unrestrained by the dogmatic authority of others.

Human desire is the true spur to human progress, and we mark our progress by the fulfillment of our desires.

Thus I unhesitatingly and unqualifiedly re-assert that human desire in all matters pertaining to social intercourse should be the sole guide to individual action just as our appetite is our sole guide in the choice of food, and that all legal and conventional restrictions should be removed in order that absolute freedom in the expression and development of every natural function may be established.

I also confidently assert that according to the strength of our individual desire, this happy condition will be attained.

It may be argued that many people have abnormal desires, and for that reason should be restrained.

While it is doubtless true that some are abnormal, let us ask, who of us might not be considered abnormal if others than ourselves are to decide as to which of our desires are normal and which otherwise?

Moreover, who shall say that abnormal tendencies would not become greatly modified or even wholly overcome if undue and unnecessary restriction was removed?

Such desires or inclinations as are generally considered abnormal in mankind are unquestionably the result of the abnormal conditions of environment into which we are born, just as a tree is handicapped in its growth and development by the crowded condition it finds itself in in the midst of the forest.

Is it not reasonable to suppose if that same tree could be transplanted into an open field, or given more space and freedom in which to grow and expand in its native soil it would develop to the utmost possibility of its nature.

We know that this is so, and just why we cannot apply the same logic to the case of the human being is hard to comprehend.

One of the objections usually made to this principle is that it is so contrary to the established social condition or custom that its acceptance would overturn the very foundation upon which society rests.

Strange to say this objection invariably comes from those who are most frequently heard deploring present social conditions.

Would it, then, be such a terrible calamity if the deplorable social conditions now existing should be overturned even to their foundations?

If a building is old and unfit for human habitation it is torn down before a new structure can be erected in its place. We may seek to refashion, remodel and repair the old building as we will, the strengthening one part but weakens another, and sooner or later the collapse of the entire structure is inevitable.

In Matthew ix: 16, 17, we find this old truth presented: "No man putteth a piece of new cloth into an old garment, for that which is put in to fill it up taketh from the garment, and the rent is made worse."

"Neither do men put new wine into old bottles; else the bottles break and the wine runneth out, and the bottles perish; but they put new wine into new bottles, and both are preserved."

And yet, at the beginning of the twentieth century, we find society trying to accommodate itself to laws and customs two thousand years old; using itself as a patch upon a conventional garment woven by a medieval priesthood.

Is it not time a garment which requires such continual and extensive patching be considered to have outlived its usefulness and be rejected altogether?

There is always a swinging backward of the pendulum which at the same time means a forward movement.

Would it not appear at this time that the force of legislation, conventionality and custom which has been brought to bear so heavily upon mankind in the past two thousand years has exhausted itself, and that humanity stands at the portal of an era of freedom such as the world has never known before?

Let us now briefly consider the subject of sexual freedom in comparison with institutional marriage.

The most striking difference between the present restrictive condition and the one herein advocated is that the first-named prevents many individuals (who for one reason or another do not enter into institutional marriage) from giving any expression to perfectly good and natural impulses and causes them to go through life unloving and unloved, thus cheating them of the sweetest and dearest experience that is given to mankind to enjoy, and too often compels men and women who have entered institutional marriage to remain in a condition that is unbearable to them, where the element of hatred is engendered and they look forward to no relief from it save the death of one or the other. And the so-called Christian church still fosters such a relation to the extent that it fain would use its influence to secure the enactment of legislation which would render it still more difficult for people to free themselves from such a hell under the plea of "preserving the sanctity of the home."

To the average married man and woman the terms "home" and "hell" have become synonymous, although each and every one of them without doubt entertain a higher conception of what "home" should be; yet all the churches and all the legislatures cannot create a home where love, the one indispensable element is lacking, any more than a builder can erect a brick house without brick.

Anyone who will conscientiously study this question cannot fail to arrive at the conclusion to which many of our most enlightened thinkers have already arrived, namely, that the chief doctrine of institutional marriage (which is the ownership by the husband of the wife's sexual organs and all that pertains thereto), is the rock upon which so many "homes" have foundered.

The promulgation of this doctrine has led to the practice of hypocrisy and deceit; it has promoted selfishness and jealousy; created discord and inharmony; engendered strife, hatred and misery, and caused the murder of many hapless men and women.

In the name of a long outraged humanity, let us abolish such doctrines, for surely the mind of man can conceive of nothing more hellish and undesirable than this.

It is unnecessary to say that in absolute freedom of sex relation the evils above enumerated would be overcome, because each individual would be taught from childhood that the sex organs were not vile and unclean, and that they were worthy of all respect and consideration; that they should be as freely spoken of as to their use in the promotion of health and happiness by magnetic contact with the sex organs of others, as well as for the propagation of the species, even as the uses of the heart, stomach and liver are now freely spoken of. We would, under this system (if it can be called such) soon learn that the magnetism of some people which did not benefit us might rightly be avoided, just as we now avoid eating certain kinds of food which we have found by experience does not agree with us or is a positive injury to us.

This is not an unreasonable proposition to anyone who will fairly eliminate long-established prejudice from his mind in a desire to assist in the establishment of a new and better condition than the old. Neither is it so difficult to put into operation as some might suppose.

The effort most needful is to destroy the idea that one individual has any right to control over any function of the body of another individual.

For the sake of illustrating my point, take a married man imbued with the doctrine of institutional marriage, who therefore believes that he is the owner and controller of his wife's sex organs and consequently would be thrown into a fit of ungovernable rage at the knowledge that she had engaged in the sex relation with another man, thus robbing him of something which he believed to be his own exclusive property; yet this same man is most frequently found arranging clandestine meetings with other men's wives, who doubtless hold the same opinion of ownership of their wives' sex organs that he himself does.

Just what the psychological condition of this man's mind is that permits him to contemplate with equanimity the prospect of sharing one woman with another man and not the other woman, is past all human comprehension, especially when he is actually better and happier with the one he shares than with the one he does not.

The only reasonable conclusion is that it is because in the one case he is limited by his idea of ownership of the woman and in the other he is not.

What, then, is the remedy? What but the one we advocate—the elimination and utter destruction of the idea of ownership.

This argument might be extended indefinitely but it has been sufficiently considered from the standpoint of meeting general objections and I desire in the closing part of this paper to dwell to some extent further upon the benefits to be derived from the conditions herein advocated.

(TO BE CONCLUDED.)

CHICAGO'S REIGN OF TERROR—A REMINISCENCE.

LA VETA, Colo., March 23.

To LUCIFER, the Light Bearer:

I have not written anything for LUCIFER for some time; have been doing other work, while I have read and kept track of LUCIFER'S work through it all, and have rejoiced over the good things in it and the agitation for freedom which it keeps up. I did not think it needed me. But I must express my sorrow that its editor is to be again persecuted, and my appreciation for his bravery and coolness.

I do not express astonishment or indignation, you will notice. I read a great deal in exclamations and startling punctuation marks, from writers who cannot get over wondering that such things happen in "free America" as well as in empires and kingdoms. I do not wonder, and it is useless to wax wrathy.

I lived in Chicago when innocent men and women were watched day and night, and whenever the authorities thought best they were arrested and hauled to the police station and subjected to a farce of an inquiry and then dismissed without a charge; when dynamite was conveniently "found" by the officers who had placed it there; when our home was watched for months, so that every friend who came to see us was marked; when people every day were arrested for speaking or writing what they thought.

I was locked up for four days once because I was writing an editorial for the Alarm, which never was allowed to appear again, and once for accompanying a friend to see her husband before the state killed him. My home has been searched without reason; desks broken open without warrant; letters kept back, opened and contents purloined. And then after eighteen long, agonizing months, the state killed four noble men who had never been proven guilty of anything but zeal for the freedom of the race, drove one to a mysterious death in his cell, and condemned three others to hard labor and solitary confinement in prison.

After this experience do you wonder that I never am astonished at anything that authority does? I am not expecting anything more from the United States government than I am from England or Russia. All are strongly entrenched governments, wielded in the interests of a class according to crystallized notions hundreds of years old. I am not even surprised or indignant when the laws, such as they are, are broken and constitutions violated.

For I live in Colorado. You know what I have seen here, and how, when our millionaire mine owners want anything, laws, constitutions, considerations of humanity—nothing stands in the way of their getting it. So when the authorities want to silence a good old man and a philosopher because he is saying dangerous (to them) things, and even try to put him in prison again where he could not live many months, I am not astonished, and it is of no use to be indignant. I can only deepen in my earnestness to do all I can for justice and freedom.

I can only point out to my suffering comrades that there is reason to hope; and that the dawn is appearing. Though we have wars, and cruelties and persecutions and violations of such liberties as we thought we had secured, still the idea of liberty is more widespread, and human hearts generally are growing softer and human aspirations loftier and greater.

Courage! Hope! Do and dare! I believe our dear old friend will be happier in prison than his persecutors can be on the outside.

LIZZIE M. HOLMES.

SENSE ABOUT SEX.

All reformers use a Christian bait. The religious workman is handed a Christian Socialist publication, or a single-tax print telling how an all-powerful God "intended" that all should have land, failing, of course, to state why the distribution was neglected. "Sense About Sex," by A Woman Doctor, is likewise infant food for those Christians we wish to stimulate regarding women's freedom and marriage. For this purpose it may be freely recommended. The elect do not need it. How hard it would be if God should try to live upto every reputation given him. In this pamphlet we read:

"Then would the world have been saved incalculable injury, disease and anguish * * * and creating God's boundless humiliation. For we shame and insult God in the exact measure that we shame and insult his handiwork."

If there is conflict between mind and body, the maker is alone to blame. If a mortal is ashamed of his work it is because of his consciousness of lack of skill. The idea of the Almighty, who knew how it would all turn out, being humiliated by the opinion of his weak creatures, is novel and diverting. He must have been ashamed when he planned man; why did he not quit, or else revise the plan?

I never could accept the idea that all things are pure, that is, pleasant to the senses. The daily details of life are offensive and our pure judgment cannot repudiate our senses. What we really need is to approach all facts with candor and bravery, but in proper time and place. When we lance a boil let us not flinch, employing the best means, but why should we make each other believe it is all pure and good when it offends every sense?

NEMO.

SEX SLAVERY.

There are two kinds of slavery—sex slavery and industrial slavery. The well-known divisions of industrial slavery are wage and chattel slavery. In this article we are only concerned with sex slavery. In the human family the woman only has been the slave of sex, as far as we know. The writer believes that all forms of slavery will decrease if not disappear altogether.

The reason why woman has become a slave to man is that she is the one burdened by reproduction. This burden has made her in a measure defenseless and the male has taken advantage of the situation.

Free woman—woman truly free in spirit, is normal. Slave woman tends to become distorted and morbid, she soon loses her magnetism. The matrimonial relations of the past, and less so in the present, are enslaving to woman. The ordinary wife is a slave. Industrial slavery has in a measure compelled the male sex to enslave the female. Woman reproducing and watching over her offspring remains at the domicile. Man goes abroad to get supplies, and a division of labor and partnership arrangement obtains.

When the race steps upward upon the socialistic plane the whole society, or the state, will look after its offspring. Woman then will be as she should be—free. She will not be forced to give her body to A. or B. for provision for the children that she loves. In sex matters she will be free to follow her tastes. Laws that resulted from capitalism will have no further utility.

Some one asks, Will monogamic relations obtain under a socialistic regime? I answer: Yes, at first, but after a time the free spirit will assert itself. Woman held in bondage for centuries will make her escape. Conventionality will hold her for a time, but she will swiftly learn that she is not obliged to cling to any one man, unless she feels very much pleased to do so. If laws are made to perpetuate monogamic relations they will incline to greater and greater laxity. The monopolistic tastes of man, no longer indulged in lines of industrial ownership, will not get much encouragement in woman monopolism. Mrs. Grundy will gradually retire and every woman will do pretty much as she pleases with her own body.

For a time some may lease themselves for life, or for a time, but as necessities of life will in no wise compel them to do this, fewer and fewer promises will be made, and all this will be for the betterment of the race, because whenever reproduction occurs between antagonized partners the offspring is liable to be more or less marked by the mental condition of the fray. The race is marked enough already with the slave-driver stamp of would-be manhood. It is marked sufficiently with the cowering slave type; the thing in woman's form that wants to be ruled by a rod of iron, that kisses the hand that smites it.

The world wants no more born masters or born slaves.

The desire to rule others is, pathological as is the desire to be ruled. The "love" that builds fences around its object belongs to a slavish and tyrant past. On an island where there are no wild animals it would be foolish to build defenses against them and shut up part of the population in these forts.

Probably the limitations set upon the life of woman arose from a desire to "protect her from enemies" perhaps as kind as the protectors themselves. Such "enemies" are fast becoming as good as other folks and there are now no excuses for fences, fortresses, etc., to protect mature woman.

If she enters the "marriage state" to-day and wishes to leave it to-morrow, it is her right. If she is being held unwillingly, some one is acting the part of tyrant.

DR. C. E. BOYNTON.

LETTER TO PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.

Theodore Roosevelt: You send forth a bugle cry of alarm: Race suicide!

"Woman suffrage is a remedy for race suicide.

If the intelligent and educated women of this country wish to put an end to the race they have a right to do so. And they can do it. But the cause of the tendency in that direction is not lack of patriotism or lack of mother-love, but lack of right conditions for motherhood!

Remove the cause and you remove the trouble.

If the mother race had a voice in the government they would very soon make right conditions for motherhood, and fatherhood, too, and then there would be no more occasion to fear race suicide.

Are you afraid to trust the mothers? Will they not do what is best for the race that they have mothered? Shame on you, if you are afraid to trust them.

Advocate woman suffrage at all times and places, boldly, fearlessly.

Are you a physical hero and a mental coward?

Don't be like a skittish horse, shying to this side and that for every old stump of superstition, tradition, custom and policy.

Ride straight ahead and get there.

How we would like to see you carrying this measure right over the fences, ditches, rocks and stumps to victory!

Enfranchised women will produce a high-standard race, intelligent, just, patriotic.

Disfranchised women are producing criminals and distorted characters of all kinds.

Can you expect a patriotic race from disfranchised mothers?

There is necessity for some rapid riding, in order to save the race. Will you do it?

Advocate woman suffrage fearlessly, or do not presume to say more about race suicide.

Yours patriotically,

Portland, Ore. MRS. BERTHA MOORE.

As frequently stated before, so now our friends are reminded that credit is given in this list to such as send money or stamps for trial subscriptions for their friends, or who buy books for gratuitous distribution, in order to introduce LUCIFER and its literature among those to whom it is now unknown. Again thanking all who contribute to LUCIFER'S Sustaining Fund we again ask those who have not done so to send names of persons to whom they wish the paper—or pamphlet literature—sent to the amount of their contributions.

LUCIFER: ITS MEANING AND PURPOSE.

LUCIFER—The planet Venus; so called from its brightness.—Webster's Dictionary.

LUCIFEROUS—Giving light; affording light or the means of discovery.—Same.

LUCIFIC—Producing light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing, and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

CONGRESS SHALL MAKE NO LAW RESPECTING AN ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, OR PROHIBITING THE FREE EXERCISE THEREOF; OR ABRIDGING THE FREEDOM OF SPEECH, OR OF THE PRESS; OR THE RIGHT OF THE PEOPLE PEACEABLY TO ASSEMBLE, AND TO PETITION THE GOVERNMENT FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES.—First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

LIFE AND ITS PROBLEMS.

In the northern hemisphere of the earth's surface life is now in the midst of its annual awakening. The vernal equinox has been passed, the days are now longer than the nights, the sun's rays strike the earth at a larger angle, the result being that vegetable life is rapidly awaking from its winter sleep and is beginning to array itself in its summer robes of green, of purple, of gold—all the colors of the rainbow.

With the return of spring animal life becomes more noticeably alert and active. Birds, beasts, reptiles and insects that hibernate, or that spend the winter in warmer climates, are now returning to their accustomed haunts and to their summer habits; prominent among which habits is that of pairing, or mating sexually, and reproducing their kind, so that their particular species shall not become extinct when they themselves succumb to the order of nature, their bodies returning to original elements.

One of the problems of life, practically the most constant and ever-pressing of all life's problems, is that of sustenance for the animal body, the parent body itself, and sustenance for the immature bodies of the younger generation. Omitting for the present all consideration of the sustenance problem—the food problem—as it presses upon the lower orders of animal life I would like to speak briefly of this problem as it confronts the human animal, and especially the more gregarious portions thereof, those that find themselves crowded together in those abnormal and unhealthful aggregations called cities.

Speaking more particularly of Chicago, the second city in size on the American continent, I find the old, old problem of "labor and capital"—which is first of all a sustenance problem, in what may be called a state of acute agitation in this great city and at this precise hour.

For several days those most interested in the just and fair solution of this labor and capital problem, the wage workers themselves, have been arrayed in conflict, either actively or in sympathy. That is to say, a labor "strike" is now on—a strike that promises to be one of the greatest ever known in the history of Chicago, perhaps extending to many other cities.

The trouble began, it appears, between the "garment workers" of the city and their employers, the workers claiming that the "sweat-shop" system is being inaugurated once more after having been partially, at least, abolished by the employer class in compliance with public sentiment as well as with the united and persistent demands of the workers themselves. In sympathy with the garment workers a section of the Chicago "teamsters' union" joined in the strike, precipitating a conflict that has already resulted in bloodshed and in throwing thousands of wage-earners out of employment, which means deprivation and suffering in the homes of those who depend on day labor for food, clothing and shelter.

What the result of this conflict is to be cannot, of course, be foretold at this writing, but judging from all past struggles of a similar nature the employer class will be the winner—in whole or in part. Even though the workers win technically, that is, although they gain what they ask as to wages, number of hours and sanitary conditions, the result will accrue to the advantage of the employer, simply because the employer class is the capitalist class.

Capital means money; money means privilege.

Money is a privileged commodity; privileged commodities make privileged owners.

All legislation is shaped to favor the man who can command money. The exceptions to this rule are not worth mentioning.

In the case of the clothing industry: A shutting down of the factories means an opportunity to work off accumulations of manufactured goods at better prices than otherwise could have been obtained. Meanwhile the idle machine eats nothing. The sustenance problem does not trouble the employer class, while it means suffering or death to the unemployed worker and to his children or other dependents.

When at length work is resumed in the factories, no matter which side wins, the wage-earner begins work loaded with debt; for while he himself may tramp and beg he cannot see his wife and children tramping and begging, therefore to keep the wolf from the door and a roof overhead, debts are contracted that will take years of unremitting toil, even at advanced wages, to liquidate; more especially is it hard for those who have families to recover from debt when we remember that under the manipulation of the various "trusts" the prices of the necessaries of life are constantly advancing.

These are a few of the problems of life that confront the denizens of the great cities—all who find themselves on the wrong side of the privileged commodity called money. M. H.

RESPONSES FROM FRIENDS.

Again a considerable part of LUCIFER's limited space is taken up with responses to the latest attempt to suppress freedom of speech and of press by the postal censorship, and again our correspondents and sympathizers are requested to exercise the grace of patience when they fail to find their letters in print. It is not because of neglect or discrimination, but simply for lack of room.

A good friend in Iowa asks how much it would cost to add four more pages to the fortnightly LUCIFER. He wants to see four pages more of short letters and of advertisements. This question brings to the front once more the problem of enlargement. The only trouble is the old, old one—lack of the wherewithal, that is, lack of the money of privilege.

Meantime our sincerest thanks are due to all who have written words of sympathy and encouragement, and who have sent money or postage stamps to help pay current expenses. Many have written to excuse themselves for not sending money, saying they would do so later, and asking that LUCIFER be continued to their address. Very few have asked that their names be dropped from the list.

It is not pleasant to ask for money, whether on subscription, for books or as donation, but if all whose subscription has expired or is about to expire would renew for another year it would enable us to pay off all debts incurred by book publishing during the winter, and enable us to print the long deferred catalogue.

NOTICE.

I am spending a few weeks in Chicago in the interest of radical propaganda. Any desiring to arrange for lectures or personal visits may address me care of Charles T. Brown, 79 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill. This applies not only to Chicago and Illinois, but to all states berdering or near Illinois on any side. I trust to meet many friends of LUCIFER in this city. As my future plans must be made rapidly, those intending to write should do so at once. JAMES F. MORTON, JR.

PURITANIC PERSECUTION IN THE UNITED STATES.

"Regeneration" is the name of a paper published in Paris, France, by Paul Robin, having for its purpose the education of the people in the all-important subject of the sex relations. "Regeneration" occupies in France a position analogous to that occupied by LUCIFER in the United States. The laws of France, however, are much less restrictive of the dissemination of information regarding the sexual relations than are those in this country, and consequently "Regeneration" is able to give its readers valuable information which an American publisher would be sent to prison for printing.

In many of its issues "Regeneration" has said much in praise of LUCIFER and its work, and its editor, M. Robin, has frequently avowed himself in the fullest sympathy with the doctrines advocated by Moses Harman. The recent arrest of the editor of LUCIFER on the charge of "sending objectionable matter through the mails" has called forth some significant comment from Mr. Harman's French collaborator in the work of freeing men and women from sex slavery. The French editor naturally is astonished that in this so-called "free country" the laws should forbid the publication of information of such inestimable value to the human species.

Following is a translation of an article which was published in the April issue of "Regeneration":

"Our venerable friend, Moses Harman, more than 80 years of age"—Note: This misinformation was gained from some American newspaper. Moses Harman is in his 75th year—"and for some twenty-five years editor of the admirable periodical LUCIFER, is for the fourth time under the claws of the abominable and hypocritical American puritans.

"On Friday, February 10, a warrant for the old philosopher's arrest was issued, charging him with having deposited in the post office an obscene publication, the journal LUCIFER. We recall that this vile trick of the Anglo-Americans is envied by our own puritans. The press is absolutely free in the United States. Every person has the right to publish what he pleases and the government cannot prosecute him for it. That is all right, but the person who buys and is offended by any such publication can cause the person who sold it to him to be prosecuted. And the protestant-clerical judges, no less atrocious than our catholic-clericals, fully endorse the action of the scoundrel detective, whether he be a regular police officer or an amateur, and impose a fine or a prison sentence or both.

"There is another phase of this judiciary-governmental scoundrelism. The person who transmits, even without knowing its nature, an 'obscene' object, even in a sealed package can also be prosecuted. And as the habitual carrier of such packages is the post office, the postmaster general, who protects the purity of his employes, young men and young women, acts as a censor in their name and prosecutes the humanitarian philosophers, sure of finding accomplices among the magistrates, the makers of misery.

"The venerable M. Harman is temporarily at liberty under $1,000 bail. Glorious land of liberty and of equality! His recent crime, which served as a pretext for his arrest, was the circulation through the mails of a book called 'Sex Radicalism,' of which he was the publisher. The author, Dora Forster, an emancipated woman, was not prosecuted.

"'This book,' M. Harman rightly said to an interviewer, 'contains nothing but sound advice on the marital relations. For example it asserts that if man and wife lived in houses some distance apart at intervals they would be able to keep up courtship indefinitely. After a spell of married life the songs have all been sung and the thoughts have been interchanged. Then comes the time when the husband regrets that the emotion of the first meeting will never come again.

"'If the abuse of marriage cannot be abolished without the abolition of marriage as an institution, away with the institution. Let nature and reason rule and responsibility govern. Let humanitarians lay down the laws, and not alleged law-givers who have one wife at home and another 'wife' at their respective capitals.

"'The evils of liberty can be cured by more liberty. Evils which spring from licentiousness cannot be cured by legislation. You cannot make moral people by law.'

"In our heart we associate ourself with M. Harman in these crimes and with others of the kind; we have committed them under one form or another, or we intend to commit them. It seems to us that we have committed even more enormous crimes, such as counseling practical sexual education to be given to the young by expert men and women, although we have been denounced for it by a magistrate who seems to have a vague tendency towards little less than barbarism—by the famous inquisiteur-commandeur, Ch. Limousin.

"Our aspiring puritanic despots are jealous of the laurels of their American co-workers. Already they have remodeled the articles of the law of March 16, 1898, with hypocrisy worthy of the Comstocks beyond the sea. Senator Leydet is to be thanked for prevention of the violation of letters which are legally permitted to be sent to the United States, which was contemplated in the Darlan-Berenger law. In the new project of a law to prohibit pornography 'Monsieur Modesty' is projecting new attempts to restrict the liberty of instructing the ignorant in matters of the greatest importance to their earthly well-being. Preparations are making for a Congress of Public Morality (!) to be held at Bordeaux, where all the clericals will be represented, the Catholic Senator Berenger, the Protestant Pastor L. Compte, the little Jew Hayem, and others. I must say that for a moment I had the naivete to believe that these men were convinced of their own honesty, but were simply in error. I now make due apology. My friends and myself will try to make amends for our error by vigorously resisting the efforts of these puritans, the really obscene, and we surely will succeed in preventing them from practicing in France such outrages as men of their kind practice in the pretended classic land of liberty."

JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

"A WOMAN, UNFORTUNATELY."

The above words are not from an account of some disaster in which a woman might be supposed to suffer more severely, but are words which, with similar ones, are frequently used by men of a conservative type of mind when some wrong, or what they think wrong, has been done by a woman.

The idea that a woman is in fault seems to excite such horror in these men as to cause them to depart entirely from truth and justice. I knew of a case some years ago of two thefts being committed at one house within a short period, both thieves being brought to "justice," when one, a woman, who had stolen an article hanging at the front door where she stood, was given a heavier punishment than the other, a man, who had walked through the house and stolen a number of things of greater value at the back door. When an explanation of the judgments was requested by those who had been robbed, the reply was that the crime was "worse in a woman."

It would be interesting to know the pychological cause of such utterances.

In the most recent instance I came upon when "a woman, unfortunately," was under discussion, there were more misrepresentations crowded into one short paragraph than I remember to have ever before seen in such a brief space. The writer ("Nemo," in the "Social Democratic Herald," of March 25) began these misstatements by instancing a socialist of many years' standing, to prove how bad anarchists may be. Readers of LUCIFER can judge how far he departs from the truth, as it is manifest to what persons and circumstances he refers. He says: "Another [anarchist], a woman, unfortunately, advocated the early development of the sex natures of children by natural and unnatural methods. A publisher, aged 75, harmless and kindly, printed the same, probably on account of his love of freedom more than from endorsement, and was arrested. If the woman writer were in his place, justice would seem to be better served."

I hope that Nemo, as well as others, may be able to throw some light on the psychological point I have raised.

DORA FORSTER.

LLOYD'S UNBLIND CUPID.

Lloyd is commendably brief; I'll be briefer. Lloyd says it is common sense to breed men as the stock-breeder breeds prize pigs! Certainly, if you look for no more than a healthy animal. Lloyd's prescription is admirable—for producing fat Pharisees.

What Lloyd refuses to see is that high spirituality cannot be bred on these porky methods. The soul is not a species of streaky bacon. It is a wild thing and defies tame methods. Lloyd mocks at me because I pin my faith on the old "blind" Cupid. Lloyd sings the "Unblind Cupid" and explains that his eyes were opened by the common sense of the pork butcher! Selah!

VARIOUS VOICES.

Full name and address of writers in this department can generally be obtained on application to the editor.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

B. F. Odell, Flagler, Colo.—"Enclosed I send you stamps for two copies of Sex Radicalism. One copy to be sent to Mrs. ——, the other to me. I am entirely satisfied with LUCIFER as it now is, except that it has too many irons in the fire. I endorse every one of the reforms that LUCIFER advocates, but others denounce some of them, while they would like to read on sexual reform. Many of them reject the whole thing rather than have their prejudices offended. LUCIFER is specially valuable as the advocate of sexual freedom, and should not drive away any that would be benefited by its teachings. But it does. True, we should not be offended by anything honestly presented by another person as true and beneficial. But this is not the case. All of us now accept things that we once rejected with scorn. I am sorry to have any one who would investigate sexual reform driven away from LUCIFER because it advocates other reforms that so excite their prejudices that they reject the whole. Let us tenderly lead them remembering how slowly we were brought to where we now stand.

"Am sorry the P. O. D. are again persecuting you. But wrongs must be done before the people can be roused to action. Martyrs have ever blazed the way to reform. The first locusts perish in the stream, and multitudes pass over their dead bodies to fairer fields. I would not crave martyrdom, neither would I shun it, if that meant the denial of truth. The noblest motto is: 'I will not equivocate; I will not prevaricate; I will not excuse; I will not retract a single inch, and I will be heard!'—LUCIFER'S and the Garrisonians' motto.

"Dear friend, to me no man stands on higher or holier ground than you. Years ago while publishing the Golden Rule I claimed you as the grandest man I knew, standing firm as a rock, though prisoner again and again. My opinion has not changed through a longer and more intimate acquaintance. I do not know how much I can help you, but your success does not depend upon outside help. You have it within yourself. 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow.' Not a jealous God in the sky, but the great universal mind, whose body nature is, and who leads the universe in unending progress."

[The above letter written by one who claims to be a Christian, is inserted entire for several reasons: First, because showing that not all Christians want to see LUCIFER suppressed and its editor thrown into prison. Second, to show that not all Christians think the sex question is either too good or too bad to be discussed in a journal designed for general circulation. Third, as an antidote or offset to the expressed opinions of those who will not take the pains to investigate for themselves the character and aims of the conductors of the journal they so unsparingly denounce. M. H.]

Heiminsha, Editor of "Chokugen, Tokyo, Japan—"We will insert with great pleasure your copy of advt. in our paper, "Chokugen," which is the second birth of the "Heimin Shimbun." And we do not want to have advt. of our paper in your paper. We only wish most earnestly to have your paper, LUCIFER, sent to us in its every issue. Yours truly."

[The above is a copy, almost exact, of a card received a few days ago, dated Tokyo, Japan, March 6, 1905. A few copies of LUCIFER have been sent by request to the "Heimin Shimbun," in return for which some copies of this Japanese Socialistic paper had been sent to us, but no request had been made by us for exchange of ads. If any of LUCIFER'S subscribers can read Japanese they are welcome to LUCIFER'S exchange copy.

It is gratifying to see how many foreign journals are taking interest in LUCIFER'S fight for freedom of speech and of press and for a higher and better morality in the science of genetics, commonly known as stirpiculture. A noteworthy instance of this interest is that from the well known French journal, "Regeneration," quoted elsewhere in this issue.]

Leroy Berrier, Davenport, Iowa—"As I think of you and your recent arrest by the U. S. postal authorities, Andrew D. White's statement comes to me. He says: 'All history shows that the first article of saving faith for any land or time is the faith that there is a power in this universe strong enough to make truth-seeking safe and good enough to make truth-telling useful.' I concur with Prof. White, and let me add all history shows that any government whose authority is not based on truth is certainly unsafe and temporary. I may not agree with you and your friends concerning the cause which you deem founded on Vath, but unless I can bring better evidence than mere authority to show that you are wrong in expressing your opinions I will fail to reform you.

"I must be frank with you relative to my ideas on sex association. I believe that the rightful tendency is towards greater social control of sex association. Accompanying this greater control is the tendency towards public education in all matters pertaining to the sexual natures and reproduction.

"You are not alone in the Comstock net at this time. Up in my old home, Minneapolis, Prof. C. W. Melchow, M. D., of the medical department of the Hamline University, also his publisher, have been netted, and Judge Lochran has sentenced them to serve one and a half years in Stillwater penitentiary. In Prof. Melchow's case the offence for which mere authority is punishing him is the mailing of circulars that advertised a scientific book on sex life. Good, the greater the outrage the sooner we shall put a stop to them.

"What a convenient use authority makes of the word 'obscenity!' Good God, I know of sex maniacs who cannot read the words beautiful woman without having 'lascivious and libidinous' thoughts aroused. According to the legal definition of obscenity the words beautiful woman are obscene. What a farce! Yet how serious it is when one is in the power of the censors.

Friend Harman, I have perfect faith that the principle in all that comprises your life and my life, all life, will turn all things to good results. May your reliance on that infinite principle be your sustenance through your trials."

James F. Clark, Albia, Iowa—Thanks for books for distribution. My dear good friend Harman, for many years my darling wife and companion helped to fight your battles (near twenty years I think) and now that she is gone I mean to take up the work right where she left off. Not that I did nothing while she was living, but we were poor, and gave dimes as we were able. Soon I hope to duplicate these dimes with dollars.

You are fighting the most noble battle that ever was fought for poor, suffering humanity. It does seem that we are not half civilized. If we did not have the positive proof it would not be possible to believe that otherwise kind and loving human beings could be guilty of such awful crimes to the unborn, to say nothing of the crimes against gentle, loving mothers, whose tears shed in secret, if collected, would form great rivers.

You, my good friend, have done more—I feel it my duty to say it—more for women than any man now living. Your work will last, and in the good time coming your name will be honored. Loving hands will no doubt erect a monument to your memory. It is my proudest hope that you may be spared many years more to carry forward this loving work you desire so much to do.

It is for you who are nearest the firing line to instruct us as to what we can do. The great majority of liberal people are poor, but I do not believe they are stingy.

I have been a reader of LUCIFER many years; have read and re-read the condemned article written by Sarah Crist Campbell, and cannot for the life of me see how any sane or sensible person in this enlightened age could find even one word that should shock the delicacy or modesty of the most refined or exacting, and still have faith enough in humanity to believe that such an outrage will not be permitted as to put you in the penitentiary for doing nothing but work for the uplifting of down-trodden humanity, the sex slaves of our race.

"I want you to get good counsel and go right after the case coming up against you. Let me know when your case comes off: I will help all I can."

F. E. Leonard, Cestos, Okla.—"Enclosed find $2.30 for six copies of 'Sex Radicalism' and for 'Vice, Its Friends and Its Foes,' and for 'Jeannette.'" One dollar for the fund for your defense at the trial that is pending as result of your recent arrest. Will try and contribute more to that fund later on. Sorry the government has marked you for further persecution because of your open and fearless advocacy of more light on matters that should be of serious concern to all mankind, but am not at all surprised. While hoping for the best, I think it well to prepare for the worst. If the lower courts render adverse decisions the case should be carried to the higher courts. Don't believe in laws and courts much myself, but it seems best to make use of them at times nevertheless."

Adaline Champney, Cleveland, Ohio—"I wish I could help you in your new conflict with the monstrous Inquisition; you have led your fight in days past and have proved your position through all the years of your work since then. It is outrageous that you should again be indicted on the old issue, practically.

"It is almost discouraging to think that these years have developed so little public sentiment for freedom and equity, that such a thing is still possible.

It is more discouraging to realize how few—how very few—outside the ranks of sex liberals will know that this is not your fight alone, but their own. It is the battle for free speech and free press, independent of opinion, issue or reform. Verily, 'eternal vigilance is the price of liberty,' and the American people have sadly lapsed from their vigilance.

"While American citizens are flocking to Washington to throw up their hats for Roosevelt and crowding about the white house of a Sunday, pressing their noses to the windows to watch their pet, the name of liberty is being outraged in hundreds of ways in hundreds of places, but it is not the business of the modern American citizen to safeguard liberty! To the average American liberty appears to have been safeguarded, once for all, forty years ago in that war between the states which crushed the 'right of secession' and forged the chain of our American Imperialism. Your editorial paragraph on that war—LUCIFER 1035—is excellent."

B. M. Jackson, M. D., Omaha, Neb.—"Enclosed please find 10 cents in stamps for issue of LUCIFER in which Dora Foster's article appeared which led the 'authorities' to become overzealous 'for the benefit (?) of the people.' May help you some in the near future. Yours for liberty."

[LUCIFER, dated December 8, 1904, containing the chapter of "Sex Radicalism" that led to the late arrest, is out of print. We still have copies of the booklet containing the desired article, which will be sent on receipt of 25 cents in stamps. M. H.]

Sadie A. Magoon, Lake Bay, Wash.—Moses Harman, woman's friend, and the friend of all humanity, is again arrested. The benefactor of the race, who notwithstanding his 75 years is spending both time and strength to make all happier and better, is arrested for doing so.

"Oh, what a barbarous age is this! Civilized? Enlightened? What conceit! What stupidity! What idiocy as well as infernalism.

"Oh, yes, I am aware of all of these modern inventions—liquid air and wireless telegraph included, also the latest mop wringer! Immense intellects in certain ways, but altogether too limited, too narrow, too one-sided to be truly great. Any person, or persons, who will cause the arrest of a man like Mr. Harman show a woeful lack of just good common sense. Intellect is simply 'no whar.' They do not possess it.

"Instead, their souls are full of malice, bigotry, and uncleanness, while their hearts are of adamant.

"They think that God, the Creator, although He made man in His own image, made that image obscene, nasty, and certain parts of it extremely so.

"So much so that people must be kept in ignorance of these certain parts or functions, and thereby suffer the terrible consequences of disease, the mad-house and premature death.

"Because Mr. Harman has brain and intellect sufficient to see all this, and is so unselfish and kind as to wish to enlighten and save the race from all these horrors and sufferings he is again arrested.

"I have reached that state of mind where I no longer feel anger toward those who have so cruelly wronged and robbed me and mine and left us to suffer in our old age, but at this last outrage to my friend, the world's friend, my indignation knows no bounds.

"'If God is such a being, full of tyranny, conceit and filth, I will hereafter 'say my prayers' to the other fellow!"

(Mrs.) H. M. Jones, New Albany, Ind.—"I am interested in LUCIFER because of its exposure of the unholy marriage system whereby is conferred upon man by religion and law the power of inflicting upon his wife every possible evil. But I think you should devote more of your paper to the interest of childhood, which must eventually be the sovereign power for directing the race to its salvation. All honor to your fearlessness."

John R. Coryell, New York—"Words are useless when it comes to trying to express my sense of the outrage done you. It is not a thing to talk about, but to work about. We are doing what we can here, and hope there may be a better outcome of this effort in the cause of free speech than of previous efforts. It is so shocking to one's sense of justice to contemplate the possibility of your being imprisoned on a charge implying impurity that I find it difficult to believe such a result can come about. Perhaps, however, this is only another instance of the triumph of hope over experience. Anyhow, I am one of many triumph of hope over experience. Anyhow, I am one of many who admire and respect you for what you stand for, and who will not only hope for, but will work for the success of the cause which is now represented by you."

T. J. Bowles, M. D., Muncie, Ind.—"Freedom of thought, freedom of speech and freedom of the press are absolutely essential for the preservation of liberty and the continuous progress of the human race, and I honor any man more than words can express who makes personal sacrifices in defence of these sacred principles. It is impossible for any human mind to conceive and formulate any valid argument against the free exercise of all our faculties, so long as we do not infringe the equal freedom of our fellow men. Enclosed find one dollar for renewal."

Geo. J. Callender, St. Madeleine Village, Trinidad, B. W. I.—"Dear Sir: I have the pleasure to acknowledge receipt of books and LUCIFER. Thanks! I also beg to tender my heartfelt sympathy for your present misfortune. There is nothing so great or so blessed for one to fight for as the love of truth and freedom. Let us, LUCIFER'S subscribers, devoutly concentrate our minds upon our editor's success in overcoming his persecutors and enemies. They shall be made his footstool."

Our readers everywhere are kindly requested to send us names of persons who might be interested in Lucifer's work if they could see a sample copy.

"Sex Contains All," says Whitman. The fact that a Booklet of fifty-six pages, Treating of Sex in a Common-sense, Rational and Unconventional way, can Throw the Heads of the Postoffice Departments of Canada and the United States into a Spasm of Fear for the Safety of the Mails would seem to Confirm Whitman's Axiomatic Saying. The same Charge is Made against "Sex Radicalism" that was Made against "Leaves of Grass" and "Cupid's Yokes," namely, OBSCENITY! The Opinion of some Hundreds of Readers of this Booklet is Voiced by One of their Number, who writes:

"Millions are Starving for this Very Kind of Obscenity!"

MARRIAGE IN FREE SOCIETY. Edward Carpenter. One of the best short works on the subject. Daintily printed. A charming little gift book. "Love is doubtless the last and most difficult lesson that humanity has to learn; in a sense it underlies all the others. Perhaps the time has come for the modern nations when, ceasing to be children, they may even try to learn it." 25c.

TOKOLOGY. A book for every woman. By Alice B. Stockham, M. D. Illustrated. Tokology teaches possible painless pregnancy and parturition, giving full, plain directions for the care of a woman before and after confinement. The ailments of pregnancy can be prevented as well as the pains and dangers of childbirth avoided, and women need not go down to death giving birth to children. English, German or Swedish. $2.25.

THE NEW HEDONISM. Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old asceticism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new Hedonism says: 'Be happy and you will be virtuous.' In another place the writer says: 'In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediæval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproducing function.' Paper covers; 30 large pages; twelve copies, 50c; single copy, 5c.

HILDA'S HOME; A Story of Woman's Emancipation. Rosa Grasl. With Macaulay, Rosa Grasl would say, "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman will be less loving and lovable, or that man will be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish. 424 pages. Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

LOVE'S COMING OF AGE. Edward Carpenter. This is a book with which few will wholly agree, but which nearly every one can read with profit and enjoyment. The subject is the relation of the sexes in the past, present and future, and it is treated with absolute frankness and fearlessness by a writer who unites a broad outlook, a strong grasp of his subject and a charming literary style. The following table of contents will indicate the line of thought followed by the author: The Sex Passion; Man, the Ungrown; Woman, the Serf; Woman in Freedom; Marriage, a Retrospect; Marriage, a Forecast; The Free Society; Some Remarks on the Early Star and Sex Worships. Notes on the Primitive Group Marriage; Jealousy; The Family; Preventive Checks to Population. The book is printed on extra book paper and handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

KAREZZA. Ethics of Marriage. Allen B. Stockham, M. D., author of Tokology. Karezza gives a high ideal to parental functions and pleads for justice to the unborn child. Karezza is really a supplement to Tokology and elucidates a theory of marital relations, which leads to individual growth and a closer bond of union, the practice of which at all times gives complete control of the fecundating power. Karezza controverts the prevailing ideas of baseness and degradation associated with the sexual nature, makes a plea for a better birthright for the child, for a controlled and designed maternity and aims to lead individuals to a higher development of themselves, through a knowledge of their creative powers. Karezza is the product of knowledge and experience, and is presented to the world with a deep abiding faith, that its teachings will lead individuals to purer lives, to right understanding and appreciation of the sex functions, to intelligent control of propagation and finally through right adjustment in most sacred relations, to the ideal marriage. Levant cloth, prepaid, $1.

SOCIAL FREEDOM.

PART III.

By Hulda L. Potter Loomis.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox, in an article entitled "Woman's Passions and Trials," published in the New York World, said:

"I have known suicide to be attempted by one weary of virtue; one who felt that in her case virtue was not its own reward, since it left her facing the shadows of middle life with no lamp of human love to light the way. There are some women to whom the lack of male companionship is as great a tragedy as the loss of virtue to others. The despair of the unpossessed can be as wearing as the remorse of the erring. We hear little of the one and much of the other. Sorrowing virtue is more ashamed of its woes than unhappy sin, because the world has tears for the latter and only ridicule for the former."

As we recognize the truth of what Mrs. Wilcox says, we cannot help wondering how she could be content with simply voicing a condition which could be so easily overcome if only women had the courage of their convictions.

It would need but the leadership of one or two such women of influence as Ella Wheeler Wilcox to start a movement in the direction of freedom in love and all that pertains to it, that would become irresistible, and would at once and for all time make it unnecessary that virtue should be held at so great a price as the death of any woman who grew weary of living without love.

How much better to make possible the other alternative of giving and receiving the love she yearned for. Nor is this the only good to be attained by such an effort.

With the established recognition of the innate right of men and women to love one or a dozen other men and women according to their desire or capacity, the shame, the sorrow and remorse which the "unhappy sinner" is now forced to suffer and endure because of the ostracism and the condemnation that the world heaps upon her, would no longer be possible, for, after all, the world sheds very few "tears" for the "erring one."

It is easier to condemn than to weep. Why not change a point of view which makes either condemnation or tears seem necessary?

How much more time the people of this mundane sphere would have in which to mind their own business and make progress in their individual unfoldment.

Then let us consider those who in the past have refused to ignore their natural right to love and sexual indulgence although unmarried, and have consequently found themselves in a condition of prospective maternity.

The maternal instinct is not governed by law; it is as natural for women to desire children as for the sun to shine, and it is unquestionably true that by far the great majority of such women would have been happy to give birth to their children and would have taken as good care of them as any woman has ever done in institutional marriage, had she not been hounded by the fear of the scorn of her friends and relatives and being looked down upon by people in general as a creature beneath the respect usually accorded a yellow dog.

Thus, many of them have become suicides, while thousands have placed themselves at the mercy of medical sharks and pirates who thrive on the money they extort from their victims for the miserable service they perform for them.

Many of these unhappy women die from the effects of the operations performed upon them, but the number of lives thus sacrificed are as nothing compared to the murder of the infants born of those unhappy mothers who do not submit to abortion.

Stifling the mother instinct that yearns and pleads for her offspring, she arranges with the particular medical shark who has had her case in charge, to find a home for her little one, which, for "a consideration," he willingly promises to do if she will pledge herself never to make any inquiries after it; she then tears herself away, little dreaming that before she reaches her home her child will have been forced out of existence.

Every large city is infested with hundreds of such "medical practitioners," whose only excuse for existence is that our present standard of conventionality and custom make them necessary.

Why should we not do away with a conventional code of ethics that can make us indifferent to such cruel and inhuman practices rather than that our ideas of morality and virtue should receive a shock.

What a "whited sepulcher" our temple of virtue and morality is and what hypocrites we are who bow before its altar!

Would to heaven that "the veil of the temple" might once more "be rent in twain" and the fires of such sacrifice be "forever quenched."

Love is the only Savior of the world, and the world will not be saved until it ceases to crucify Love.

Let the women of this fair land build a new temple, and let its altars be dedicated to Love, Liberty and Light—a new trinity, as it were. Let new fires be built thereon that shall create new warmth of hope and cheer in the hearts of men and women, and let its rays shine forth like the rays of a star, bringing "glad tidings of great joy" and happiness to the people of all lands throughout the earth.

If each and every one will endeavor henceforth to do this in their own heart and life the time will speedily come when our poets will no longer sing:

"I'm sorry for the anguished hearts that break with passion's strain,
But I'm sorrier for the poor, starved souls that never knew love's pain;
Who hunger on through barren years, not tasting joys they crave,
For sadder far is such a lot than weeping o'er a grave."

Solomon informs us that much reading is a weariness to the flesh, but neither he nor other inspired authors tell us that such or such reading is unlawful, yet certainly, had God thought good to limit us herein, it had been much more expedient to have told us what was unlawful than what was wearisome.—Milton's Areopagitica.

"What the state can usefully do is to make itself a central depository and active circulator and diffuser of the experience resulting from many trials. Its business is to enable each experimentalist to benefit by the experiments of others, instead of tolerating no experiments but its own."—John Stuart Mill, on Liberty.

Disobedience, the rarest and most courageous of the virtues, is seldom distinguished from neglect, the laziest and commonest of the vices.—Bernard Shaw.

I can easier teach twenty what were good to be done, than to be one of twenty to follow my own teaching.—Merchant of Venice.

THE SUPPOSED PRENATAL INFUENCE.

It is supposed by many people that the state of mind of a mother during sexual association and pregnancy has an important influence on the offspring. This is called prenatal influence. Precisely what effect a given state of mind may be expected to produce, is not as a rule clearly stated. It seems, however, to be thought that if a child is begotten in love and desired by the mother, and if the mother is kept in a placid state of mind during pregnancy, then the child will very likely be a useful member of society; and vice versa.

This is rather a difficult assertion to test, because we do not know very accurately how most mothers have felt on these important occasions. In some striking cases we do know pretty well, however, and I propose to give one or two of these.

It will be generally conceded that Goethe was the greatest poet, and Darwin the greatest man of science, who lived in the nineteenth century. In both these cases we know something of the state of mind of the mother before and during pregnancy.

"In 'The Story of Goethe's Life," p. 5, G. H. Lewes says that Goethe's mother "was married at seventeen, to a man for whom she had no love, and was only eighteen when the poet was born." The father was about forty at that time. Goethe was not only a great genius, but a very sane one. It is true he says that "my character passes from extreme joy to extreme melancholy," but whoever reads his life will see that he was far better balanced than almost any other poet, both in emotion and intellect. His bodily health was good and he lived to be some years over eighty.

When Darwin was born in 1809, his mother was forty-four and his father forty-three. He was the sixth child. In his little book on "Darwin," p. 18, G. T. Bettany says: "Before her famous son was born, however, Mrs. Darwin's health had begun to fail, and in 1807 she wrote to a friend: "Everyone seems young but me." Like Goethe, Darwin was a sane genius, but his bodily health was very bad.

Mary Wollstonecraft had two daughters, Fanny Imlay and Mary Godwin. Fanny Imlay was a child of love, but committed suicide. Mary Godwin was not a child of love. Her mother never cared very much for Godwin, except on the intellectual side and was fast cooling toward him for some time before the child was born. Yet Mary Godwin was strong, intellectual and serene, the very opposite of her sister who was begotten in love.

Not long ago I heard of a striking case in private life. A mother, after having several desired children, had one that was undesired. All through the pregnancy the thought of having the child was odious to her. Yet this child turned out very sweet tempered and well balanced.

Dr. E. B. Foote tells us that "when any great civilian, like Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, Robert Louis Stevenson, Rudyard Kipling, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Julia Ward Howe, Emile Zola, Henry Ward Beecher, Father McGlynn, Colonel Ingersoll, Paderewski, or others of note, come to the front in a way to rivet the attention of gravid women the prominent mental and physical characteristics of these conspicuous individuals are impressed more or less upon the plastic little creatures who are nestling beneath their beating hearts." Jefferson lived too long ago, and most of the others are too recent to enable this statement to be tested in relation to them. With Lincoln, however, it is different. He was most prominent from 1860 to 1865, and if there are a number of people who resemble him for the above reason, these people should now be from thirty-nine to forty-four years of age. I confess I have never seen an American who resembled Abraham Lincoln in person, and I have not met many who were like him in mind and character. I hope, however, that Dr. Foote and his friends will not overlook the opportunity to prove that there are a number of Americans who resemble Lincoln, that such persons are more numerous than formerly, and that most of them are now between the ages of thirty-nine and forty-four.

I think it is generally conceded that lovers are most ardent at first, and gradually become less so the longer they live together. If passion in the parents improved the children it would therefore follow that the eldest children would generally be the best, and that there would be a gradual deterioration in the average family from the eldest to the youngest. If prenatalists have observed facts to warrant such a conclusion, I hope they will bring them forward.

Finally, I am under the impression that breeders of animals rely wholly on heredity, and do not care whether there is much or little passion in the parents at the time of association. I understand that highly bred dogs which do not wish to cohabit are sometimes induced to do so by stratagems of various kinds. So long as the animals have good pedigrees breeders do not care whether they desire each other passionately or not; all they want is sufficient passion to make the begetting of offspring possible.

R. B. Kerr.

To speak, or not to speak, that is the question. Brother Kerr has been so good a helper in Lucifer's work, lo, these many years, that it goes decidedly against the grain to put myself in the attitude of opponent on this question of "Prenatal Influence." This is an argument for silence on my part. Another potent argument in the same direction is the fact that I know so little on this subject. With Dr. Isaac Newton, when approaching the close of life, I feel like saying, "A few bright pebbles and shining shells have I gathered while walking on the beach, but what are these compared with the treasures that lie in the bed of the ocean?

On the other hand it may be asked, what is the use of publishing a reform paper if we hesitate to speak our honest thought and tell what we know, or what we think we know? If I had not had strong convictions on this subject of Prenatal Impression—if I had not believed that man's ignorant disregard of the truth there is in the doctrine that prenatal impression is perhaps the most potent factor in shaping the body, mind and character of the young, whether of beast, bird, reptile or human, then there would, perhaps, never have been a paper such as Lucifer, or, more modestly speaking, there never would have been a reform journal edited and published by the individual now writing these lines.

If I know anything about the history of Lucifer and its work it was mainly because I believed that woman, through prenatal impression, could make her child strong or weak, could make it symmetrical or deformed, could make it a philosopher or an idiot, could make it a "degenerate" of the lowest type or build it so well that it would need no re-generation—if I had not so believed I would never have published the now historic "Markham letter," nor the "O'Neill letter," nor dozens more that were intended to rouse the sleeping public. Conscience to demand that woman's primal right to self-ownership, in marriage as well as out, should never be denied her, this in the interest of the unborn even more emphatically than as a matter of justice or humanity to woman herself.

Will try to recur to this subject soon. M. H.

A VOICE FROM PUGET SOUND.

Brother L. A. Rader,, editor of "Soundview," Olalla, Wash., has this to say in a recent issue of his most excellent journal:

"I regret to note that the federal authorities again have Moses Harman, the veteran editor of Lucifer, in the toils. Mankind is so easily prejudiced that I don't wonder the government is induced to fall upon some helpless victim at the beck of some poor, ignorant prude or set of prudes. The name Lucifer no doubt has had much to do with Mr. Harman's persecution—it is in the nature of a red rag to the 'virtuous.' The writer confesses that he was not entirely free from prejudice against Lucifer and its editor till he met the quiet, friendly, sweet-voiced, courteous old man—a perfect gentleman. That feeling was there and then changed to respect—admiration for one who has so loyally toiled and talked and written for the things he believed. Above all he has lived as he preached. A government that would seek to harass and make uncomfortable such a man at his time of life should be ashamed of itself. His faults are magnified, his virtues overlooked, to the end that he may be made to suffer for his advocacy of certain theories, which, if harm comes from them, can only affect those living in accordance with his teachings. We are not subjects of Russia, and are supposed to have some freedom of action without running contrary to the powers that be. We can't but pity people who are so outraged by the promulgation of ideas at variance with their own views. We hope to hear of the early release of Mr. Harman."

I would earnestly recommend every subscriber and reader of Lucifer to send 10 cents for a copy of "Soundview," or still better, send 50 cents for a year's subscription. M. H.

TO THE SUBSCRIBERS OF FREE SOCIETY.

The following letter from the editor of the weekly journal, "Free Society," explains itself:

New York, April 8, 1905.

Dear Comrade Harman: I hope you will excuse me for not replying to your kind and generous proposition in regard to filling the subscriptions of Free Society. I intended to publish a monthly magazine, in which case it would not have been necessary to burden anyone with the subscription of Free Society. But since Mr. Coryell has declined to be the editor of the monthly I have also given up the idea of publishing a periodical for the present, and so I now take the liberty to take advantage of your kind offer, and send you the list of unexpired subscribers of Free Society, and hope that Lucifer will benefit by it.

"People who have written me they would prefer to receive 'The Demonstrator' are not in the list. I mail to you to-day, but I wish you would make a note in Lucifer stating that those who prefer to receive 'The Demonstrator' must let you know by letter, including a two-cent postage stamp, or if they are already receiving both Lucifer and 'The Demonstrator' will receive the amount due them in literature by writing to me (238 E. 84th street, New York). But the order should be followed by postal stamps covering the postage, as I have no means to defray the expenses of postage.

"Should you also desire to receive the names of subscribers whose subscriptions had expired before Free Society suspended publication I shall be glad to send you the names.

Thanking you for your willingness in helping me out, I am, fraternally yours, A. Isaak."

Pursuant to this arrangement Lucifer is now being sent to all the subscribers of Free Society whose time paid for had not expired at date of suspension of that journal several months ago —except to such as had signified their desire to receive "The Demonstrator" for the numbers still due them.

It is needless to say to our new friends, the subscribers aforesaid, many of whom are old and valued acquaintances, that while Lucifer undertakes in good faith to fill out the unexpired time due to them from the publishers of Free Society, this acceptance of obligation does not mean that we are to send the number of copies that was due them of that journal. It means just half the number of copies now due, inasmuch as Lucifer is a fortnightly instead of a weekly journal.

It is also needless to say to these new friends that the cost of publishing and mailing Lucifer will now be very materially increased, and that any financial aid that these friends can favor us with will be gratefully accepted. Nothing is asked or expected as a gift, but subscriptions to Lucifer ahead of time, and orders for Lucifer's book and pamphlet literature, if accompanied by cash or postage stamps, will help to defray the added expense of the fortnightly issue of Lucifer.

ON "SEX RADICALISM."

I have been asked to give my opinion of this little work by Dora Forster by the editor who kindly sent me the pamphlet. I had not read it thoroughly when it appeared as a serial in Lucifer, and when I took up the completed work I expected to find something to criticise, but I have discovered marvelously little, and a great deal of praise. It is remarkably clear, convincing and analytical, and the style is that which makes people say, "I believe a man wrote that," though it is not true that intelligence has sex. It is simply that men have been forced to use their reason rather than their emotions, and have practiced analytical methods.

I rather expected to find, what I have deprecated in a good many radical writers, a tendency to glorify the merits of freedom without insisting upon greater wisdom. I do not believe in outside restraints—these never made a man or woman better at heart—but I do believe in teaching the young convert from the old beliefs the greater necessity for knowledge, judgment and self-control, when he is to depend upon himself entirely in the course he is to pursue through life. But I find that this writer admits the importance of this, and declares that freedom does not mean utter abandonment of control of any kind. Of course all advocates of freedom will declare that they mean this, and no doubt they do, but they have been so lax in stating it that in many instances harm has resulted that might have been avoided.

The tyro in our radical sex ideas very often falls into the way of thinking that freedom means utter abandonment to the emotions, passions, impulses without regard to consequences, and does not learn better until he has brought much suffering upon himself and those who love him. Hastily grasping the idea that man-made laws and regulations have no right to hold him, he imagines that nothing should restrain his desires and impulses, which are usually untrained and undisciplined.

I have seen a young girl with a child's ideas and a woman's passions, get an inkling of what is meant by sex radicalism, and then plunge into all sorts of bold, indiscriminate gratifications and make a record which cursed all her after life, in a few short months; love had nothing to do with her conduct; she did not know what love was. I have seen a young wife, who, learning just a little of the ideas of social freedom, imagined she was very unhappy in her relations with her husband. Then she began to flirt and to serve her husband mean, little, deceitful tricks, and to brag about it as though she had done something very smart. I have seen a great deal of this crude, foolish indulgence, and it makes me weep. I would almost rather the people knew nothing of freedom if they cannot attain some wisdom as they inculcate the ideas of liberty, only that freedom and responsibility are the roads to wisdom. Of course, I know that freedom and experience will bring the needed wisdom in time, but oh, it sometimes costs so much! With a little care on the part of teachers a great deal of suffering might be avoided.

But the writer of Sex Radicalism earnestly advocates more education on all these subjects, and urges as one of the wrongs of the present condition, the lack of teaching which is accorded the young. Liberty is the greatest of all human attainments, but enlightenment is next.

I wish everyone who thinks could read Sex Radicalism.

"A WOMAN, UNFORTUNATELY."

Being certain that women are of a quality much better than men, I used the above expression in reference to a woman who advocated what is to me obnoxious. But I did not misrepresent. If Dora Forster does not believe that I read in Lucifer the statements that certain bad habits did not harm children, and that girls should have "experiences" at "not later" than sixteen years of age, in which a surgeon and an elderly man figured, then let her look over her files. She may find it is a case of putting on a shoe that fits, as I mentioned no names.

Some radicals think to prove their mettle by opposing everything just because it is orthodox. When we see wan, pale, bony children we form a certain conclusion, and generally it is right. Now we must accept a new diagnosis because one uninformed woman says so.

We are taught by radicals that love is the only good reason for sex unions. Love does not often visit young girls by way of surgeons and elderly men, and as the world is now, girls who begin their experience in such way will continue to be the sport of men. You will say—educate the men. Very well, go about it. But first teach women to care for any child the same as their own, for this is the lesson you set for men, under the conditions given. Women want to love and be mothers. Men want to love and be fathers. Women are sure when they are mothers. Men want to be as sure as they can that they are fathers. This being the case, what is the use of advocating any plan that ignores human nature? If your variety plan requires a "Hilda's Home," then first get the home and be consistent and not try to graft a branch where it will not grow.

I have found that promiscuity for girls is abhorred by most liberal men, not from moral or religious, but for material and practical reasons. Nemo.

Don't ponder, good friends all, to send us names of independent thinkers—New Thought people, Rationalists, Agnostics, Spiritualists, Materialists, Free Religionists, Theosophists—to whom we may send sample copies of Lucifer, "Son of the Morning," "Herald of the Dawn," "Harbinger of the Good Time Coming"! We have some hundreds of copies printed extra each issue for the express purpose of sending them out as samples, and, if possible, we want several hundred new names each week, or each fortnight. And if with the names a few postage stamps can be sent to help pay the cost of wrappers and of mailing, all the better, but send the names!

LUCIFER: ITS MEANING AND PURPOSE.

LUCIFER—The planet Venus; so called from its brightness.—Webster's Dictionary.

LUCIFEROUS—Giving light; affording light or the means of discovery.—Same.

LUCIFIC—Producing light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing, and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

CONGRESS SHALL MAKE NO LAW RESPECTING AN ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, OR PROHIBITING THE FREE EXERCISE THEREOF; OR ABRIDGING THE FREEDOM OF SPEECH, OR OF THE PRESS; OR THE RIGHT OF THE PEOPLE PEACEABLY TO ASSEMBLE, AND TO PETITION THE GOVERNMENT FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES.—First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

ONE FOR ALL—ALL FOR ONE.

The doctrine of "solidity," the oneness of the human race, seems to be gaining slowly, very slowly, it is true, but yet gaining. A pointer in this direction is the sympathetic strike of the Chicago "Teamsters' Union" to help the "Garment Workers" in their struggle for a chance to live.

Our readers all have heard of the "sweat shops" of the great cities, in which the comfort, the health, the very lives of the workers are coined into money for their employers. The statement now is that for some years past, until quite recently there had been gradual improvement in the treatment of the garment workers of Chicago by their employers, and that the old sweat-shop system had been practically abandoned, but that now, in violation of previous agreements, the employers are returning to the old barbarous methods of increasing their gains regardless of the health and lives of their employes.

Against this violation of contract these workers, several thousand in number, rebelled and went out "on strike," as it is technically called. In sympathy with the striking garment workers the Chicago teamsters' union, or at least a large section thereof, although they had no grievance of their own, broke their contract with their employers and refused to haul merchandise for the Montgomery Ward Co., which company seemed to be specially obnoxious to the garment workers.

All this occurred more than two weeks ago, since which time it has been the usual history of labor strikes—each side resorting to means more or less destructive of peace and good order, to gain the victory. Judge Dunne, the newly elected mayor of Chicago, tried his hand as mediator between the contending parties, but failed. The latest statement at this writing—Sunday, April 22—is that Judge Murray F. Tuly, one of Chicago's most popular legal lights, was requested by Mayor Dunne to act as arbitrator to settle the strike, at the suggestion of the labor organizations, but that the Employers' Association, through their legal counsel, Mr. Mayer, had rejected the offer of arbitration in these very emphatic words in a letter to Mayor Dunne:

"It is impossible for the Employers' Association to enter into an arrangement of any kind concerning any labor controversy. * * * It does not seem that this question could have two sides in the mind of any law-abiding citizen."

Thus it would appear if language means anything—the Employers' Association of Chicago says to this friendly overture on the part of the mayor:

"You mind your own business, Mayor Dunne, and we'll mind ours. There is nothing to arbitrate. How can there be? Our business is our own, our own private affair. We are not doing business for the public. Our money, our land, our buildings, our machines, our stock in trade belong to us; not to the public, not to our employes. We do as we please with our own. We employ whom we please, and pay such wages as we please. If our employes don't like our wages, our number of hours per day, or the kind of work we offer, it is their right and privilege to go elsewhere; but they have no right to interfere with out business—by combination, by conspiracy, by intimidation, by dictation or by any means that would prevent other work people from accepting our terms."

All this, at first view, looks well—seems right, fair and just. But there is another side, and here lies the fatal mistake of the Employers' Association; as when they say, "It does not seem that this question can have two sides in the mind of any law-abiding citizen." Their mistake is the mistake of Shylock when he asked: "May I not do as I please with mine own?"

Shylock owned his money, and with that money had bought "a pound of flesh nearest the heart" of his neighbor, the "Merchant of Venice," and forthwith the money lender demanded his right to take possession of his own.

Apparently Shylock had law and justice on his side, even as the Employers' Association of Chicago seems to have law and justice on theirs.

I do not blame the members of the Employers' Association, any more than I blamed the slave-holders of the South, fifty years ago, for saying that there was only one side to the controversy between themselves and the Personal Freedom League of New England. The law gave to the white man the right to own and control the body of the black man. The black man's body and his labor power were articles of lawful merchandise, the same as horses, corn and cotton were articles of lawful merchandise. The slave-owner simply utilized the power and privilege given him by the law, just as the Employers' Association to-day utilize the power and privilege given them by the law of Illinois.

Hence it is easily seen that these employers have the Mayor of Chicago and the labor unions of Chicago at a tremendous disadvantage. The law is on the side of the employer class and against all who would deny them the right to do absolutely as they please with their money and their industrial "plants."

This, then, is one of the life problems hinted at two weeks ago in these columns. Our land and money laws, like the chattel slave laws of half a century ago, were made in the dim and distant past, when man assumed to rule his fellow man by "Divine Right." As a nation we have abolished the chattel slave code of laws, but very inconsistently, we retain the old barbaric land and money laws in full force, and by these laws the capable, the cunning and the avaricious succeed in making slaves of their fellow humans quite as effectively, if not more so, than did their predecessors who used the chattel slave code of laws.

It required a long and fearfully destructive war to deprive the old-time slave-holders of their tremendous advantage as law-abiding citizens, over their non-slaveholding brethren who pleaded the cause of the black chattel. Will it require an equally long and destructive war to take away from the present-day Employers' Associations the advantage they hold, as law-abiding citizens, over the men who have nothing to sell but their labor?

MEETINGS AND LECTURES.

The Social Science League holds public meetings every Sunday evening at eight, in Room 913, Masonic Temple, Chicago. Lectures and discussions free.

The Chicago Society of Anthropology meets every Sunday at 2:30 p. m., 17th floor Masonic Temple. Public invited.

Subscribers who receive more than one copy of Lucifer, when not ordered, will please use the extra copy or copies to induce their friends to subscribe, it only for a trial trip of three months for 25 cents. Stamps received in payment. As the paper weighs less than one ounce a copy can sent to a friend in a common 2 cent letter, with an ordinary sized sheet of note paper.

HOW TO WIN THE FIGHT FOR FREE SPEECH.

Many methods are being proposed by LUCIFER's readers to hasten the repeal or modification of the laws under which editors and publishers are now prosecuted, fined or imprisoned, and under which papers have been denied the mail, laws by whose sanction, apparently, one whole edition of LUCIFER was confiscated and destroyed in time of peace, by the president of the United States, through the postoffice department, which department, as we all know, is simply part of the executive division of the general government.

One of these proposed methods is to send LUCIFER to the editors and publishers of the papers—daily, weekly, monthly—of the whole United States and appeal to their selfish interest to help secure a repeal of these laws, lest they, too, should become the victims of invasion through the same abuse of power.

Another plan is to appeal directly to Theodore Roosevelt, by "petition," asking him to do his duty as servant of the people—to see that no person be deprived of liberty or property until duly convicted of crime, by the judicial branch of the government.

Another proposed plan is to send LUCIFER three months to the teachers of Illinois, and especially of Chicago, to help arouse the educators of the state in which has occurred the latest denial of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech and of press.

Several subscribers of LUCIFER have been practicalizing this plan. One whose name I am not permitted to publish writes thus:

"In my last letter I sent you two dollars for postage on copies of LUCIFER to the S——— county teachers. . . . I have been too angry to write you anything about your arrest. If the American apes let such things go without protest the time will come when we shall have nothing to read but such papers as the Christian Advocate and the Holy Bible. When that time comes I want to be in h—l (excuse me), so I will not have to associate with priests and preachers. I hope you will win. I will help you financially when the time comes, as it is not your fight alone but that of all liberal-minded people."

Besides the $2 for postage on LUCIFER to the teachers of S——— county, this man has sent several dollars to pay for trial and yearly subscriptions to LUCIFER to be sent to people in various states. Evidently he thinks the best way to win the fight now on is to rouse public sentiment by showing people what is being done to defeat freedom and justice by the public officials whose first and chief duty it is supposed to be to defend freedom and justice.

Another subscriber of many years standing, L. Kanselbaum, of this city, has contributed several dollars to the sample copy fund, and now asks that a fund be raised to send LUCIFER three months to every teacher in Chicago, and, if possible, to every teacher in this state. He has contributed a dollar to that special fund.

What say our friends generally to this plan?

A GREETING FROM HOLLAND.

To Mr. Moses Harman, 500 Fulton St., Chicago, U. S. A.:

In honor of our Nestor!

Yours truly,

DR. J. RUTGERS,
Gravenhage, Holland.

Secretary of the Dutch Neo-Malthusian League. Friend of the Ligue de la Regeneration. Friend of the late Legitimation League.

Sincerely thanking Dr. Rutgers for the honor intended in his friendly greeting, I am by no means sure that the distinction of "Nestor" of Free Thought editors rightfully belongs to me. Just why the Chicago daily papers should persistently exaggerate my age I do not know. I gave the reporters a corrected statement, but they seem to have paid no attention thereto. Perhaps they think, with Dr. Osler, that a man past sixty should be chloroformed, and that by adding five years to my true age they will help to intensify public sentiment against a paper edited by a man who has long since forfeited his right to live.

On the other hand, this exaggeration may be due to a benevolent desire to mitigate public wrath against me by the implication that I am too old—past eighty—to be held legally responsible for my acts and that at the coming trial (if it comes to that) I should be let off with a light sentence, or with no sentence at all.

But however this may be, I desire once more to thank Dr. Rutgers and all others, both far and near, who have sent friendly greetings to this office suggested by the late arrest of the editor at the instigation of the agents of the American Postal Inquisition.

SOCIAL FREEDOM.

Two or three months ago a lecture on this subject was delivered before the Social Science Club of Chicago by one of its members, Hulda Potter Loomis. The lecture was well received by a full house, so well received, in fact, that at once a movement was started and a little money paid to have it printed. Not only because it was desired by others, but because I regarded the lecture as one of the best to which I had listened for years, I decided to print it in LUCIFER, and with this view asked Mrs. Loomis to revise her essay for publication.

For convenience the lecture was divided into three parts, the last of which appears in this number of LUCIFER.

Believing as I do, and as quite a number of persons here in Chicago believe, that this lecture or essay would make a most efficient missionary document, I am disposed to ask how many of LUCIFER's readers would like to possess one or more copies in pamphlet form, on good paper and with a beautiful half-tone picture of the lecturer. The type is still standing, and if within the next fifteen days I can have orders for say five hundred copies, with the picture aforesaid, at twenty cents per single copy, or $1.50 per dozen, this pamphlet will be promptly printed and sent to those desiring it.

As an additional inducement, although I really think the prices named quite low enough, I offer with each copy of the pamphlet to send a leaflet containing the Wentworth article on the "Significance of Divorce," printed a few months ago in LUCIFER, and one of the most effective articles yet written for general circulation on that subject.

In my humble opinion the plan of sending out leaflets and small pamphlets as light cavalry, so to speak, is one of the very best methods of stirring up an interest in the subject of reform along radical lines.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

A Child of Love. "A startling story of the struggles of a girl born out of wedlock against the sins and perversions of to-day." By Margaret Grant. Published by Physical Culture Publishing Co., 29-33 E. 19th street, New York City—pages 407. Price, one dollar. May be ordered through this office.

Sense About Sex. By a Woman Doctor. Printed and published at the office of the Century, Adelaide, South Australia.

In the preface Agnes Nesbit Benham says:

"The writer of this book, herself a medical woman, could have chosen no greater field of effort, nor one likely to yield richer results, than that shown in the following pages, where she endeavors to instruct the reader in the most essential, yet, alas, the most neglected, as a rule, of all sciences, the knowledge of the laws of right generation.

"Yet every other subject pales into significance before this supreme question, How to have the best possible children born? Not only that, but, How to so control and direct the procreative energy that, when not needed or desired in one particular direction, the vivifying force may still inspire the life, burning upward and outward with a 'smokeless' flame."

A supply of this booklet has been received at this office and will be sent prepaid for the price.

Communism and Conscience; Pentecost and Paradox—Crimes and Criminals. By Edwin C. Walker. Published by the author at 244 W. 143d street, New York City. Price, 25 cents. May be ordered from this office.

The Recording Angel. By Edwin Arnold Brenholtz. "Dedicated to the World's Workingmen by their fellow laborer." Published by Charles H. Kerr & Co., 56 5th avenue, Chicago. Price not given; presumably one dollar.

NOTICE.

I am spending a few weeks in Chicago in the interest of radical propaganda. Any desiring to arrange for lectures or personal visits may address me care of Charles T. Brown, 79 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill. This applies not only to Chicago and Illinois, but to all states bordering or near Illinois on any side. I trust to meet many friends of LUCIFER in this city. As my future plans must be made rapidly, those intending to write should do so at once.

JAMES F. MORTON, JR.

A red or blue cross means, your subscription has expired, and you are respectfully requested to renew, or at least to let us know whether you wish the paper continued to your address.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Full name and address of writers in this department can generally be obtained on application to the editor.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

S. E. D., California—"Another outrage in the name of morality, eh? How long it takes to overcome the stupidity and superstition of the ages. The greatest curse is the inertia of ignorance. You have my deepest sympathy. Yours for freedom."

"P. S.—I enclose draft on Chicago for $1.25. Use the dollar for the defense fund and send me a copy of "Sex Radicalism" for missionary work. Don't mention my name in connection with the contribution. I shall know you have received it when I get a copy of the pamphlet."

Henry C. Hanson, Aurora, Ill.—Enclosed please find draft for $2 to use in your defense found against our Uncle Samuel. I believe enough dollars would keep all reformers out of jail. My motive for sending you this is selfish—an insurance fee, as it were—for I may be next if they succeeded in finding you 'guilty.' I can't imagine what plea they would find against me, neither can I see any grounds for a charge against you."

Clement E. Edmunds, Freeland, Pa.—Am extremely sorry you are again under bonds for alleged violation of the postal laws. The law is utterly wrong. In carrying the mails Uncle Sam should deliver without a single question as to contents. I believe in law and government, but not in many laws. I believe in free speech, a free press and free action, with the Spencerian limitations. Will you allow me here to say that I should like to see LUCIFER continue under that name and be published as a monthly magazine of sixteen, twenty-four or thirty-two pages, as you might deem best. May I also ask if it lies outside the scope of the paper to devote a little space to hygiene, physical culture and to food and cooking."

Irden Mackenzie, Commercial Bank, Adelaide, South Australia—"Just a little line of appreciation and gratitude for your loyal continuance of the good work you are doing with LUCIFER, which Mrs. Benham introduced to my notice many years ago. Perhaps—as with all the work that needs most desperately to be done—it is very uphill work oftentimes. People so seldom want what they need most, and in this question of relationship of woman to man the most important question of Life—seem obtuse to idiocy. Surely its strongest phase, perpetuation of the race under Love's conditions should appeal to them if they once looked about them to see the hideous results obtained under less pure giving.

"The time is coming, though, and is near at hand, when the old order will fall behind of its own worn grossness. My sincerest wishes and thanks are with you and Miss Harman in your work."

Owen Bowen, Martin's Ferry, Ohio—"Franklin H. Wentworth's article on the 'Significance of Divorce' is worth more than you ask for the paper for a year. I cannot agree with everything you write, but I believe you write what you think is true—although the damnable system has made hypocrites of the majority of us. I don't pretend to be a scholar, but have read a great deal and have observed a little and have come to the conclusion that society is in a bad shape. Is it not the economic system we live under that is responsible for all the disorder? We put dollarhood as the standard instead of manhood! * * Please keep on sending LUCIFER to me. I will have a dollar sometime to send you."

[Franklin Wentworth's admirable article on the "Significance of Divorce" has been put into leaflet form and is sold at one cent each or fifty cents per hundred. It is a most excellent eye-opener. * * * Yes, economic slavery is "responsible" for much of the disorder now prevailing everywhere, but there is another slavery still more fundamental, and I very much doubt whether any radical change in our economic systems will be made until woman asserts and achieves her independence of man-made laws in the matter of ownership and control of her person—her reproductive powers and functions. The ownership and control of woman—sexually—by man, is the worst of all serfdoms, because of its effect upon posterity.—M. H.]

Emma Wardlaw Best, Isle Moyenne, Seychelles (Indian Ocean)—"I am being continually told that 'women must be protected' and that marriage is a 'religious and sacred institution.' I enclose you some papers relating to the sacred and religious protection of child women in India. Perhaps some of your readers do not realize the cold-blooded facts of the case. We are not much better off in England, as anyone who studies the police cases is bound to admit.

"If a man brutally assaults his 'wife' he is often only bound over to keep the peace, whilst if he attacks any other woman he will get a sharp sentence. If he murders his 'wife' manslaughter is only too often the mild sentence. For murdering any other woman he almost certainly would be hanged.

"Yes, we want 'protection'—protection from marriage laws and customs. Protection from 'seduction,' a purely artificial crime—the product of marriage and from which the victim is the only sufferer.

"Protection from 'illegitimacy,' another purely artificial crime from which the woman and child are the only sufferers, and which is also a product of marriage.

"Protection from the infamous word 'bastard'—product of marriage.

"Protection from 'rape,' the only sexual crime acknowledged by nature and protected—as a husband's sacred right—by marriage.

"It is quite patent which sex is protected by marriage—all these walls and bogies built round woman show that however infamous a man's life, his rights to a virgin may be protected and his right to the fruit of her body—as his before hers—even to his sacred surname being handed onto them.

"Indeed we need protection—protection from racial hatred, ending in bloody and horrible wars, for the woman is so held as to keep races apart and prevent the universal brotherhood of man.

"Women do not share the honors of war, but all the worst horrors and possibilities are heaped upon her 'protected' head."

Mrs. F. McKenzie, Onehunga, Auckland, New Zealand—"In magazine entitled 'Now' you advertize LUCIFER three months for 25 cents. I am forwarding one shilling sixpence money order. If not troubling you too much, please forward to me 'The Convention Closing Hymn of the Christian Scientists.' If any trouble to you do not send hymn, but send extra LUCIFERS instead."

[Will some one send to us a copy of the "Hymn" described in this letter?

Our Australian and New Zealand friends are requested to be sure to buy "international" money orders when sending money to this office. The failure to remember this precaution causes delay and trouble, besides extra expense. Please be careful, also, that the letter is not overweight. The penalty of overweight is 10 cents at this end of the line.—M. H.]

F. A. Tappan, Kansas City, Mo.—"Herewith one dollar to continue my copy of LUCIFER. I am daily praying that you will rise to the mountain tops of peace, peace, prosperity, and many many years of usefulness, while your persecutors will descend to the very depths of a mental purgatory. I not only pray, but prophesy it. Yours for better times."

Lady Florence Dixie, Glen Stuart, Scotland—"Thanks for 'Sex Radicalism.' I have read it with much interest, but we must change by degrees. Let us stop the masses breeding like guinea pigs and give woman freedom; then shall follow freedom in sexual matters. I earnestly trust you will not be sent to durance vile again. Such an act would be an infamy."

Bolton Hall, New York—"I congratulate you on your late arrest. David said of his God: "He maketh the wrath of man to praise him." So does Liberty. We would not have gotten the 'Chronicle' or the Inter-Ocean' to publish accounts of your doctrines, even as paid advertisements except for your unjust arrest.

"I do not think that marriage law is the root of social evils * * * The love of liberty is a development. The savage and the wild man have it not. Dissatisfied with himself and with his fellows because he has not yet harmonized his late-found mental and emotional natures with his bodily nature, man naturally attacks the symptoms of evil which he sees and, animal that he is, tries by force to do away with what seems to him to be discord. So he regulates and enslaves his fellows and himself.

"This slavery, which is unwilling to let others be free, expresses itself now in marriage laws, now in priest rule, now in tariffs, now in land monopoly and again in custom and in other directions.

Each of us, according to what seems to him most fundamental, must attack all these forms of slavery—but never forgetting that they are all of them symptoms of a general disorder."

Agnes Benham, Adelaide, South Australia—"Have you read H. G. Wells' book, 'Anticipation?' He speaks out regarding the need for remodeling our current ideas on sex ethics. He says: 'Our current civilization is a sexual lunatic!' * * * Referring to what Arthur Wastall says concerning the need for greater concentration on one line, namely, sex reform, I am with him altogether. So are my friends here. Mr. S. says he will become a life subscriber to LUCIFER if you follow those lines. I think LUCIFER should be a sort of mental rendezvous or rallying place for many who are isolated from companionship in thought on these stirring questions—who are ill-mated or who feel lonely.

"What is that famous 'Markland letter,' for publishing which you suffered imprisonment for two years? Could you send me a copy of same? And what is the matter for which a whole edition of LUCIFER, of a recent date, was confiscated? Should like to be able to judge how much more liberal we may happen to be in South Australia. * * * Send me Sex Radicalism.

"Later: Have just received yours of January 30—very sorry to read of the Canadian trouble (exclusion of LUCIFER from the Canadian mails.) What a shame!"

[The Markland letter is now out of print, except in a few old files of LUCIFER. The confiscated issue—number 1,000 of LUCIFER—is also out of print except a few kept for files and for binding. When vol. vii, third series of LUCIFER, is bound in book form, the confiscated number will be included therein.—M. H.]

T. Gilbert Taylor, Adelaide, South Australia—"I am glad of the opportunity you afford your readers of telling you what they like in the way of sex reform journal. The Agnes Benham commune, of which I am a member, have projected a scheme of a sex reform paper to be called "Reason," with Health, Peace and Purity for its motto—to be published monthly at 2 cents per copy. I am convinced there is abundant room and need for such a paper in Australia, and that an over-seas journal on similar lines would help, or be helped by, such a publication in Australia.

"I like the old name LUCIFER. Would also welcome as a a new one, White Light."

E. F. Rotshek, St. Louis, Mo.—"Dear Friend: Enclosed find one of the allmighties in payment of the booklets, three of which I received and, as much as I have perused, I find they are in line with my thought. In reference to my communication I will say that it was not published, and I am inclined to believe on account of advocating political action, but everyone has his views, and if you think you can combat your organized enemy with all his resources at his back, politics and cannon—if you think you can vanquish his hosts with an occasional gust of hot air, single-handed, then you are welcome to do it.

"I believe in organization to achieve results. It's the law of nature. Disintegration is also a natural law, but the one serves or is subservient to the other, and serves as food for the other to achieve desired results. The one adheres to economic laws, the other separates, or imagines it can succeed without the economic condition. The side which bases its struggle on economics will succeed, will win, and the other must perish. We have those cases demonstrated over and over again, and I am amazed that otherwise intelligent thinkers are so ignorant of this fact. When we expect to do a satisfactory job we must have the bread-basket well filled before we can, unhampered, proceed with our task, and for that reason I advocate the political action simultaneously with other actions.

"As for the danger of having trouble with the postal authorities I cannot sympathize with you. Those people occupy the position with your sanction through your political inactivity; so you mustn't complain; be good!"

"Sex Contains All," says Whitman. The fact that a Booklet of fifty-six pages, Treating of Sex in a Common-sense, Rational and Unconventional way, can Throw the Heads of the Postoffice Departments of Canada and the United States into a Spasm of Fear for the Safety of the Mails would seem to Confirm Whitman's Axiomatic Saying. The same Charge is Made against "Sex Radicalism" that was Made against "Leaves of Grass" and "Cupid's Yokes," namely, OBSCENITY! The Opinion of some Hundreds of Readers of this Booklet is Voiced by One of their Number, who writes:

"Millions are Starving for this Very Kind of Obscenity!"

TOKOLOGY. A book for every woman. By Alice B. Stockham, M. D. Illustrated. Tokology teaches possible painless pregnancy and parturition, giving full, plain directions for the care of the woman before and after confinement. The ailments of pregnancy can be prevented as well as the pains and dangers of childbirth avoided, and women need not go down to death giving birth to children. In English, German or Swedish. $2.25.

HILDA'S HOME; A Story of Woman's Emancipation. Rosa Graul. With Macaulay, Rosa Graul would say, "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman will be less loving and lovable, or that man will be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish. 426 pages. Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

THE NEW HEDONISM. Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old asceticism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new Hedonism says: 'Be happy and you will be virtuous.' In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediæval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproducing function." Paper covers; 32 large pages; twelve copies, 50c; single copy, 5c.

VICE; ITS FRIENDS AND ITS FOES. Edwin C. Walker. Contents: Brotherhood of Man; The Recognition of Facts; Folly of "For Men Only"; Definition of Vice; Horrors of Prostitution; Abnormal Sexuality; Errors of Fathers, Mothers and Teachers; Persecution Does Not Reform; Prostitution and the Crusaders; The "Spoiling of the Heathen"; What Are the Effects of Raids and Crusades? The Economic Side of the Problem; Party Politics in Vice Crusading; In What Does Prostitution Consist? Some Causes of Prostitution; Two Kinds of Prostitution Compared; The Opponents of Divorce; "Purifying" the Tenements; Action for Advanced Women. LOVE'S COMING OF AGE. Edward Carpenter. This is a book with which few will wholly agree, but which nearly every one can read with profit and enjoyment. The subject is the relation of the sexes in the past, present and future, and it is treated with absolute frankness and fearlessness by a writer who unites a broad outlook, a strong grasp of his subject and a charming literary style. The following table of contents will indicate the line of thought followed by the author: The Sex Passion; Man, the Ungrown; Woman, the Serf; Woman in Freedom; Marriage, a Retrospect; Marriage, a Forecast; The Free Society; Some Remarks on the Early Star and Sex Worships. Notes on the Primitive Group Marriage; Jealousy; The Family; Preventive Checks to Population. The book is printed on extra book paper and handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

KAREZZA. Ethics of Marriage. Alice B. Stockham, M. D., author of Tokology. Karezza gives a high ideal to parental functions and pleads for justice to the unborn child. Karezza is really a supplement to Tokology and elucidates a theory of marital relations, which leads to individual growth and a closer bond of union, the practice of which at all times gives complete control of the fecundating power. Karezza controverts the prevailing ideas of baseness and degradation associated with the sexual nature, makes a plea for a better birthright for the child, for a controlled and designed maternity and aims to lead individuals to a higher development of themselves, through a knowledge of their creative powers. Karezza is the product of knowledge and experience, and is presented to the world with a deep abiding faith, that its teachings will lead individuals to purer lives, to right understanding and appreciation of the sex functions, to intelligent control of propagation and finally through right adjustment in most sacred relations, to the ideal marriage. Levant cloth, prepaid, $1.

LOVE'S PROTEST.

A REPLY TO PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.

BY LADY FLORENCE DIXIE.

The following article appeared in the "Weekly Times and Echo," London, England, Sunday, April 2, 1905. This paper is a large five-column, 16-page journal, the number of issue 3,934, hence if this number represents the weeks it has been published it is old enough to be eminently respectable. The sub-heads are mine. Ed. Lucifer.

President Roosevelt seeks to imply, in his speech to the Triennial Convention of the National Congress of Mothers at New York on March 12, that the statistics of dwindling families and the census of divorce are due to the existence of women who deliberately forego the supreme blessings of children, from viciousness, coldness, shallow-heartedness, self-indulgence, and failure to understand the difference between the all-important and the unimportant. He adds that easy divorce is a bane to any nation, being a curse to society, a menace to the home, an incitement to married unhappiness and immorality, an evil thing for men, and a still more hideous evil for women.

THE "SHRIEKING BROTHER."

Mr. Roosevelt says many funny things which have the effect of provoking the smile of mirth, but I think on this occasion he is more funny than is his wont. At any rate, he has raised another hearty laugh at his expense, and that frivolous world of women, whom he tries to lash with his tongue, goes on its way, totally unconcerned at his hysterics. When women first opened their eyes upon their stolen inheritance and began to demand that they should not longer be the disinherited, men, of the class to which Mr. Roosevelt belonged, called them "the Shrieking Sisterhood." I think we should call Mr. Roosevelt "the Shrieking Brother." It would be well if he and a few bishops, etc., with large families and over-burdened wives, would retire into a brotherhood and call around them the holy women willing to be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth with paupers, little white slaves for the American money grabber, babes of the gutter, diseased offspring of incontinence and selfishness, tramps, out-o'-works, ne'er-do-wells, and the unfit, unwanted and unwashed.

MR. ROOSEVELT'S OPPORTUNITY.

As a President, Mr. Roosevelt has not accomplished much. Here is his opportunity! He surely, who preaches the altruistic doctrine of over-population and birth of the unwanted and the unfit, must be ready to take upon his manly shoulders, in conjunction with his brother shriekers, their maintenance and support. The task will be a most entrancing and all-absorbing one. He will not, of course, be able to enjoy the luxuries of Presidential life, but that is a small matter! Discomfort, overcrowding, dirt, want, are holy realities to be cheerfully accepted in return for the unmixed blessing of seeing around you their pale-faced victims with famished eyes. The starving community of the Shrieking Brother Roosevelt would be a glory for all eyes, one upon which the world would cast gloating looks of envy, and the force of a great example would predominate. So now, en avant Mr. Roosevelt. Practise what you preach. Sell all you have and give it to the poor, then start the great breeding establishment of the Shrieking Brotherhood and support the result by your toil.

To practise what you preach is the surest way of proving to others your sincerity. When Mr. Roosevelt forswears the comforts and luxuries of the Presidential berth, and supports, feeds and clothes his family by the sweat of his brow and long hours of toil, more respect if not agreement will be awarded to his shrieks. As I have said, however, these shrieks elicit laughter the world over, not only on account of their ludicrous utterance, but because those who read them are well aware that he dare not himself practise, in a practical manner, that which he preaches.

THE INDIGNITY OF ENFORCED MOTHERHOOD.

Weighed down under the weight of barbarism and a book of fables, woman has, in the gloomy past, subjected herself to the indignity of enforced motherhood. But the day is coming when that degradation shall become as extinct as the dodo. To this hideous infliction the rotten condition of society has been the heir. What an heir! The features of the poor object are imprinted on the world and disfigure its fair face at every turn. Suffering and woe, penury, misery and want, crime and viciousness, all are the diseases which afflict society through enforced motherhood.

THE INSOLENCE OF ROOSEVELT.

This is the condition of things which Mr. Roosevelt desires to see continued. He insolently tells women that because there are some who are determined to only have children when they see fit, or who refuse to overburden and rot society by over-reproduction, pauperism, disease and food for the child sweater, that these true women are vicious, cold, shallow-hearted, self-indulgent, and fail to understand the difference between the all-important and the unimportant. With him all the important appears to be masculine self-gratification, without a thought for the worn-out woman of enforced motherhood and the miserable offspring of such. With him it is all-important that drudgery should be the portion of the female, and it is most unimportant that women should be free and should be the owners of their own persons.

THE FREE WOMAN OF THE FUTURE.

Yet I tell this shrieking brother, who seeks to foist on womankind the tyranny of the flats of his man-made book of fables, that the time is fast coming when the drudges of to-day will be replaced by the free woman of the future, who shall herself choose the father of her child, when she sees fit to have one, and who will never degrade herself by turning out by the bushel as at present long rows of miserable abortions which pass muster as human beings, and are incited in turn to be fruitful and multiply and overstock the earth with ever degenerating material, being assured that it is all soul endowed and the work of the great Architect of the Universe.

MAN'S RIGHT TO BE BORN WELL.

President Roosevelt blesses the modern form of marriage and decries divorce. But what is this latter but the result of the intolerable bondage of the present system of marriage which millions of women, ay, and men, too, are finding well-nigh unbearable. No creed or dogma can sanctify a crime, no law can enforce, without cruelty, a pernicious custom. It is man's right to be well born, and no child can be such when enforced. The free woman of the future will see to it that her child, the offspring of her wish and her choice, shall be well born. She will permit no miseries to be grafted on society. She will make it her joy and her pride to produce quality and will leave to the lower order of animals the nasty and cowardly practice of over-production.

AFTER DAWN COMES DAY.

Precident Roosevelt may strive to put back the hands of a moving clock, but he cannot alter the true time. All his shrieks will be impotent to hinder the handiwork of Evolution, which intends to award to woman the command of her own person. President Roosevelt must set his face toward the light and realise that day is breaking. Vainly he implores receding night to stay. For a time it will, but it must pass onward, for after dawn comes day.

Science has crushed to atoms the theory that the union of the sexes demands reproduction. Only the blind and the ignorant —of which, alas! there are yet many thousands—believe this, and, acting up to it, inflict society with the unwanted, the pauper and the unfit. Whereas sex union is natural and desirable, reproduction only of the fit and desired is moral. There is no immorality greater which a man can perform than to inflict on a woman an unwanted child, and there is no more cruel act than for a man and woman, unfit to produce healthy stock, to willingly give birth to a diseased child. I speak with the large experience of one who has studied this question among many races of the world and who has traced to its fountain head the source of human woe.

POINTS OUT THE REMEDY.

It is with a deep pity for that woe that I point out the remedy, while exposing the cause. Of course, there are many inequalities between men and women which must be remedied before ideal union and ideal life can be enjoyed, but these will come in time; and meanwhile the pressing need of the moment is the abolition of enforced motherhood and the recognition by society of the scientific fact that the amative and reproductive functions are absolutely distinct, and that children are not the imperative and necessary result of sex union. When the ignorant masses realise this we shall see less of over-crowding, and hear of fewer deaths from disease and misery, while the unemployed and the unfit will cease to infest our cities with their unhappy presence.

The most pressing problem of the day is that of sex. Evolution has brought us face to face with the fact that the ways of the past must cease, and that Progress demands change. The world cannot stand still. Our morals of the days that are no more are immoralities now, and many declared immoralities of these days represent now true morality. That men should fight against truth is horrible, that statesmen like President Roosevelt should use their influence to submerge it, is wrong. Happily the advance guard of free womanhood has appeared. In America she is more en evidence than here. But she is here nevertheless, as well, and with her advent a sweeping change must come.

PREACH TO MEN—LEAVE WOMEN ALONE.

Cease, then, your shrieks, Brother Roosevelt, for they will not avail. Preach to your own sex—it will listen to you—but leave the women alone. They have performed bond service too long in acting as bond slaves. The true, free, and self-respecting woman will give birth to nothing so horrible as an enforced child; her offspring will be those of true love and desire. When this becomes universal, redemption must follow, and there shall then be a free and happy people, untainted by disease and untrammelled by want and suffering. Let the shrieks, therefore, of the United States President be hushed, for they will not avail. He cannot overcome Evolution's fiats or douse the light of the world.

A RADICAL DRAMA BY A TITLED WOMAN.

Remarkable for its radical sentiments rather than its literary merit is the drama Eilabelle, or The Redeemed, written by Lady Florence Dixie and published in America by Charles Scribner's Sons. The play is written in blank verse and many of the passages are truly poetic. The theme is interesting and the language, particularly in the love passages, is often picturesque and glowing. The faults of the piece are so inconsequential, in comparison with its high civilizing purpose, that they are scarcely worth mentioning. One of them is that the gifted author makes an ignorant herdsman talk like a poet of education and culture.

Space forbids an extensive review of the interesting book, but quotations of a few passages will give some idea of the author's advanced views on the questions of love, marriage and woman's right to the ownership of her person, both before and after marriage. When King Alfonso commands his son to wed the daughter of Duke Haco the young man replies:

I cannot view as you do Woman's sphere,
Or yield her aught but fair equality.
How can I then, holding these principles,
Commit the crime of wedding Haco's child?
* * * * * *
I will not wed with aught but true-born love,
I will not prostitute a woman thus;
For what is marriage where there is not love
But Prostitution, legalized by law?

Of course, "legalized by law" is tautological, but the "poet's license" may be allowed for the sake of the sentiment. Similar expressions of woman's self-sovereignty are made by the prince's sister, Princess Amethyst, who says:

Woman is but, in some eyes, a machine
Designed to keep alive the race of men;
The creature whom our father designates
As just the broodmare of the human race!
But we know better; we, her children, know
That woman should be Mother of Mankind,
And not the slave and prostitute of man.
A free-born equal, not the property
Of the male sex; its loving mate alone.
* * * * * *
There is no marriage born of God or Man,
Sacred and legal, where there is no love,
For where there is no love, lust only reigns,
And love's sad victim is a prostitute.

As a matter of fact the prince is in love with Haco's daughter, but does not know that she is the girl who was brought up as the supposed daughter of a highland thane. To him she is Velveen, a mountain maid whom he met when he was rambling among the mountains in the disguise of a herdsman. Velveen, who does not know that the man she loves is the prince, seems to be thoroughly in accord with his views of marriage. She says:

The heart alone decides what it will love.
No human law can alter nature's choice.
The only sacred tie is mutual love,
And marriage without that can but abase.
Wedlock where love is not, is slavery,
Binding together hearts which are apart
And forcing a submission which disgusts.

Haco's daughter, not knowing that her lover is the prince, sends word to the king that she will not marry his son. The prince, not knowing that his mountain maid is Haco's daughter, the Princess Eilabelle, is delighted, and he says:

So I am free, thanks to fair Eilabelle,
Who will not prostitute herself to me
By mating for the sake of mawdy show
One whom she loves not. Honorable girl!
Would there were many like you. But how few
Would act as you have acted. Decently.
And saved your self-respect as well as mine.
Ah! yet. How few, for maidens most are slaves
Born to be sold in Fashion's crowded mart.
Where their own parents barter them for gold
And shamelessly offer as sacrifice
Upon its altar their own progeny.
Ignoble deed. Humiliating act,
Both the result of base, lop-sided laws,
Perverted customs of society
Which make the woman a dependent slave.
Oh! Holy Church. Your Bible seals her doom
And bids her grovel abjectly to you.

Lady Florence in the preface says she wrote the drama under the shadow of Amajuba mountain in 1881, when she was war correspondent for a London newspaper. This being true, it will be seen that Zugassent's discovery, which was exploited by Mr. Miller in his book, "The Strike of a Sex," is antedated by Salvatore's discovery, which is a feature of the drama of Eilabelle. Salvatore is a learned hermit. He has made a discovery of which Eilabelle speaks thus:

Yet though I doom myself to agony,
Mental and moral, for another's sake,
No child of mine shall suffer by such act.
No offspring of a Motherhood enforced
Shall see the light to suffer for such sin.
I hold the secret, found by Salvatore,
Which gives to woman her inherent right:
The right to her own person. She alone
Should solve the question of maternity
And choose herself the time of motherhood.
She, only she, can know when this should be
Or should not be. The enforced child of lust
Bears in its veins the curse of such misdeeds
And strews the world with wrecked humanity.

Lady Florence Dixie is the daughter of the Marquis of Queensbury. She is a strong advocate of advanced socialism. Two other books of hers, "Isola; or the Disinherited," and "Songs of a Child and Other Poems," have given quite a reputation for daring criticism of the evils of society. The drama of Eilabelle contains more than 200 pages. Its price is $1.50. It can be ordered through the publisher of this paper.

JONATHAN MAYO CRANE.

IF IT BE REAL.

St. Martin's Lane, 26 Cranbourn St., London, W. C., March 20, 1905.

I see you are again in the thick of it. I think it a very great pity your persecutors do not spend their time looking after their own personal morality, which is probably quite as much in need of it as anybody else's.

Free discussion will only be granted very slowly; most people think they are in favor of it, but in point of actual fact very few people understand or desire it. But I hope, in view of your years at least the persecution will be baulked of its prey.

Very sincerely yours, William Platt.

Free Discussion is the keynote.

I wonder if among the many voices of protest you could find room for this fly-leaf, which is from my very heart:

Temperamentally I have a great deal of sympathy for "Puritan Morality" if only it be real. The stern doctrine that right is right, and wrong, wrong, and that moral questions brook no half measures would in itself command my admiration if I knew it to be genuine. But of all the abjectly contemptible things in a none too ideal world, I know of nothing more unspeakably low and loathsome than the spectacle of a grossly corrupt and immoral governing class trying to hide its own blatant glaring iniquities by pretending to be shocked at the discussion of sexual questions, while it is well known that the actual participation in sexual excesses is a notable and unrebuked habit of the rich and powerful classes everywhere.

It is the fearful hypocrisy of the whole affair that is its most offensive trait; this is quite independent of any particular line of discussion in Sexual Ethics. There is no subject so absolutely honeycombed with lies and hypocrisy as the sex question.

Among the books to be read by every thinker on this subject stands Shakespeare's "Measure for Measure."

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE PRESS WRITERS' ASSOCIATION.

Here is what one of your number has to say of LUCIFER's work. Aurin F. Hill is one of the original dozen or so who founded and has kept alive the paper called the "Press Writer," and probably has done as much hard work to make the association the power it now is as has any other man—with one or two exceptions perhaps.

Mr. Hill heads his article "Sex Slavery," and sends us this cordial and hopeful greeting:

"Editor of LUCIFER—I am glad of the signs that sex slavery is to pass rapidly away—rapidly when we consider the long time that it has been in existence. Under free motherhood and all births legal, most of the horrible abortions because of marriage laws made by men, may cease. Children born and educated by parents that dislike the company of each other cause most of the violent crimes.

"I am glad some men and women are strong enough in body and mind to violate laws made by men. They are the pioneers, the Washingtons, the Lafayettes, the Franklins of our time.

"Prostitution is caused by laws of men. Abolish all marriage laws by men and women, and much crime will be abolished and we shall be much nearer the condition called heaven on earth.

"AURIN F. HILL.
"13 Isabella st., Boston, Mass."

We have now a few dozen Press Writers on our subscription list, not as dead-heads, but as paying members; of these Mr. Hill is one, but why should we not have a few hundreds instead of a few dozens? or rather, why should we not have the entire membership of the Press Writers' Association as paying subscribers to LUCIFER?

Is there any paper that has been more constant and faithful in its advocacy of the work of this association than has LUCIFER?

We have aimed to send at least four copies a year to each of the Press Writers—who are not subscribers to LUCIFER—since the beginning of the association as such; this in consideration of the fact that the Press Writers get no pay for their public work, and now for this reason alone the offer is made to send LUCIFER one year of twenty-six numbers for fifty cents, or just half the usual price, to any Press Writer who will ask for it at this reduction.

Shall we hear from you, good friends, members of the American Press Writers' Association? M. H.

TO THE SUBSCRIBERS OF FREE SOCIETY.

The following letter from the editor of the weekly journal, "Free Society," explains itself:

New York, April 5, 1905.

Dear Comrade Harman: I hope you will excuse me for not replying to your kind and generous proposition in regard to filling the subscriptions of Free Society. I intended to publish a monthly magazine, in which case it would not have been necessary to burden anyone with the subscription of Free Society. But since Mr. Coryell has declined to be the editor of the monthly I have also given up the idea of publishing a periodical for the present, and so I now take the liberty to take advantage of your kind offer, and send you the list of unexpired subscribers of Free Society, and hope that LUCIFER will benefit by it.

"People who have written me they would prefer to receive 'The Demonstrator' are not in the li... I mail to you to-day, but I wish you would make a note in LUCIFER stating that those who prefer to receive 'The Demonstrator' must let you know by letter, including a two-cent postage stamp, or if they are already receiving both LUCIFER and 'The Demonstrator' will receive the amount due them in literature by writing to me (228 E. 14th street, New York). But the order should be followed by postal stamps covering the postage, as I have no means to defray the expenses of postage.

"Should you also desire to receive the names of subscribers whose subscriptions had expired before Free Society suspended publication I shall be glad to send you the names.

Thanking you for your willingness in helping me out, I am, fraternally yours, A. ISAAK."

It is also needless to say to these new friends that the cost of publishing and mailing LUCIFER will now be very materially increased, and that any financial aid that these friends can favor us with will be gratefully accepted. Nothing is asked or expected as a gift, but subscriptions to LUCIFER ahead of time, and orders for LUCIFER's book and pamphlet literature, if accompanied by cash or postage stamps, will help to defray the added expense of the fortnightly issue of LUCIFER.

BE SURE to let us know soon whether you want LUCIFER sent to you or not, or whether you want the "Demonstrator" instead.

SOCIAL FREEDOM.

Two or three months ago a lecture on this subject was delivered before the Social Science Club of Chicago by one of its members, Hulda Potter Loomis. The lecture was well received by a full house, so well received, in fact, that at once a movement was started and a little money paid to have it printed. Not only because it was desired by others, but because I regarded the lecture as one of the best to which I had listened for years, I decided to print it in LUCIFER, and with this view asked Mrs. Loomis to revise her essay for publication.

Believing as I do, and as quite a number of persons here in Chicago believe, that this lecture or essay would make a most efficient missionary document, I am disposed to ask how many of LUCIFER's readers would like to possess one or more copies in pamphlet form, on good paper and with a beautiful half-tone picture of the lecturer. The type is still standing, and if within the next fifteen days I can have orders for say five hundred copies, with the picture aforesaid, at twenty cents per single copy, or $1.50 per dozen, this pamphlet will be promptly printed and sent to those desiring it.

As an additional inducement, although I really think the prices named quite low enough, I offer with each copy of the pamphlet to send a leaflet containing the Wentworth article on the "Significance of Divorce," printed a few months ago in LUCIFER, and one of the most effective articles yet written for general circulation on that subject.

In my humble opinion the plan of sending out leaflets and small pamphlets as light cavalry, so to speak, is one of the very best methods of stirring up an interest in the subject of reform along radical lines.

WE HAVE concluded to extend the time another two weeks before definitely deciding the question of publishing the essay, "Social Freedom," in pamphlet form. Orders are coming in, but not so rapidly as could be desired. M. H.

A red or blue cross means, your subscription has expired, and you are respectfully requested to renew, or at least to let us know whether you wish the paper continued to your address.

LUCIFER: ITS MEANING AND PURPOSE.

LUCIFER—The planet Venus; so called from its brightness.—Webster's Dictionary.

LUCIFEROUS—Giving light; affording light or the means of discovery.—Same.

LUCIFIC—Producing light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing, and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

CONGRESS SHALL MAKE NO LAW RESPECTING AN ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, OR PROHIBITING THE FREE EXERCISE THEREOF; OR ABRIDGING THE FREEDOM OF SPEECH, OR OF THE PRESS; OR THE RIGHT OF THE PEOPLE PEACEABLY TO ASSEMBLE, AND TO PETITION THE GOVERNMENT FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES.—First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

TALKS WITH CORRESPONDENTS.

IS POLITICAL ACTION THE REMEDY?

Brother Rotshek of St. Louis had the last word in last LUCIFER. That word was:

"As for the danger of having trouble with the postal authorities I cannot sympathize with you. Those people occupy the position with your sanction through your political inactivity; so you mustn't complain; be good!"

When Bishop Crammer and other leaders of the Protestant church were prosecuted, imprisoned and executed by the Roman Catholic government of England, no doubt many people talked as Brother Rotshek now does. At least we can easily imagine that Crammer and his friends opposed the union of church and state; did not wish the church to lean on the "secular arm"; in other words, did not advocate political action as a cure for religious bigotry. But by and by the Protestants got political control, and they used their power in precisely the same way in which it had been used and abused by the Catholics.

When the Republican party was forming I too advocated political action as a remedy for political and social evils, and for twenty years or more I worked for the success of that party, believing, as Friend Rotshek does, that political organization is necessary in order to secure equal rights for all with special privileges for none.

When the Republican party became, body and soul, the party of privilege, I left it and helped, in a small way, to organize the Populist party, but it did not require twenty years to convince me that power in the hands of populists was no guarantee that it would be used for the good of all and for the aggrandizement of none.

These are not the only political organizations with which I have been affiliated within the past half century—uniformly with the same result, and now when urged to join the Socialists in their effort to capture the political government I naturally ask:

"Where is the guarantee that power will not be abused by Socialists as it ever has been by all other parties that have captured and run the political machine?"

If the history of mankind teaches anything it teaches this:

The possession of political power inevitably leads to the abuse of that power, hence the maxim, "the only men who can be safely trusted with political power are those who will not accept such power."

Brother Rotshek is in error when he says that the postal censors occupy their position with my consent. I do not consent; I protest. The best way, as I see it, to show my opposition to the abuse of political power is to abstain from helping to put such power in the hands of any man—or any woman, and to work, unceasingly work, for the spread of ideals that will make political action wholly unnecessary.

There are said to be eighteen pairs of muscles in the human body that are no longer used, simply because no longer needed. They have become smaller and smaller by disuse until now only vestiges of such muscles remain, and this, it seems to me, is the rational as well as natural method of abolishing the evils of government—government of man by man—simply stop using it!

"Elimination by substitution"—not by substituting another government, but something radically different—by substituting equitable co-operation, the true co-operative commonwealth, based upon individual self-ownership, especially upon the self-ownership of WOMAN, who must and will be the creator and builder of a new and better race; a race that will read of the doings of the political governments of to-day with feelings of loathing and horror, such as some of us now feel when reading of the burnings and other tortures inflicted by our barbaric ancestors—in the name of "religion and morality!"

PRENATAL IMPRESSION.

In last issue Brother R. B. Kerr said of Abraham Lincoln: "He was most prominent from 1860 to 1865, and if there are a number of people who resemble him for the above reason [prenatal impression], these people should now be from thirty-nine to forty-four years of age. I confess I have never seen an American who resembled Abraham Lincoln in person, and I have not met many who were like him in mind and character. I hope, however, that Dr. Foote and his friends will not overlook the opportunity to prove that there are a number of Americans who resemble Lincoln, that such persons are more numerous than formerly, and that most of them are now between the ages of thirty-nine and forty-four."

These words are part of the argument used to show that prenatal impression is not the powerful factor in shaping bodily form and mental characteristics that some people believe it to be.

Not as a dogmatist; not as one who knows and is quite sure that he knows, but rather as an honest inquirer or student in nature's great school, I venture to ask:

Are we quite sure that there are not a great many people "now between the ages of thirty-nine and forty-four" that "resemble Lincoln"?

Perhaps not many that greatly resemble him in physical form and feature, for the "rail-splitter president," as his friends were fond of calling him, was not an attractive man, physically speaking, and hence not very likely to be idealized in form and feature by expectant mothers. But as to his mental characteristics, what of them? Were they not chiefly these:

Honesty of purpose, candor, persistence—unflagging persistence—concentration upon and devotion to an ideal?

And what was that ideal?

Was it not the perpetuity of the union of states?

Did he not say he would "save the union with or without slavery?" thereby showing that his highest ideal, his first or leading purpose in life was not human freedom (including, of course, equal justice to all), but simply the preservation of the political machine called the "American Union"?

Let me say just here that with the ulterior motives, the motives that lay behind this desire for the perpetuation of the union of states, I have nothing to do. At this time I have only to consider his avowed purpose and the effect of the purpose and policy upon the people then living, and upon those born since.

These motives may have been of the purest and highest. He may have believed that the preservation of this political machine, idealized and glorified as the "American Union," would be the best means of ultimately securing freedom and justice to all; to the black man as well as to the white, to woman as well as to man. I am quite willing to give Abraham Lincoln the benefit of the doubt when pursuing a policy that magnified the power of centralized or national government and minified the power of the several states, and which policy, if logically carried out, would minify if not completely destroy the autonomy of states, the self-rule of smaller communities, and of individual persons also.

Wedded to this idea—National Unity—Lincoln ignored and outraged the basic principle of the Declaration of American Independence, which is voluntaryism in government—imprisoned and banished political opponents; suppressed and denied freedom of speech and of press; confiscated the property of "disloyalists," of "rebel sympathizers," as well as of those engaged in open war, "drafted" into his armies those who had no sympathy with the war, laid waste, with fire and sword, large areas of country, causing starvation and ruin to thousands of innocent people, lest their houses, barns, mills and stores should be used to give comfort and aid to the enemies of the Federal Union—in short, the good-hearted and simple-mannered Abraham Lincoln, for four years, made himself an autocratic ruler, a military despot, and turned this so-called Republic into a military despotism—all to practicalize an ideal, the logical result, the natural, the inevitable result of which ideal is monarchy—imperialism in government, no matter by what name it may be called.

I well know that such impeachment has a very unwelcome sound to many readers, but as an old line Republican, as a dyed-in-the-wool "abolitionist," I think I can afford to speak the truth as I see it. It is not always wise to "speak the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth," but sometimes I believe it well to "hew to line, let the chips fly where they will."

It is an ungracious task, a thankless deed, to thus write of our "martyr president," the nation's idol, Abraham Lincoln, and yet the fact itself that he is the nation's idol makes it all the more necessary that the plain, ungarnished truth be told. We are a nation of hero-worshipers, and herein lies our chief danger, as a people. We do not discriminate. It is trite to say that no man ever lived who had no faults, no limitations, hence to "swallow our idols whole"—so to speak—and to assimilate ourselves to them without discrimination, is to stultify our reason and put an end to progress.

"We women are born worshipers," says Harriet Beecher Stowe—even more so than we men, and women, by nature's division of labor, are the creators the builders of new human beings. At least they are the keepers, the custodians, the teachers of new human beings during the most impressible period of our lives, the embryonic or prenatal, and also the period of lactation or nursing. How important then that our mothers should discriminate between the true and the false, between the gold and the clay, in the models after which they build, or, if you please, in the examples which they consciously or unconsciously hold before the minds of their tender offspring, their pupils and wards.

How much or how little the mental characteristics of Abraham Lincoln and his ideals have had to do through prenatal impression, with forming the character of the men who are now in power in this country, it is clearly impossible to say, but, judging from the accumulated facts bearing upon the question of prenatal influence, the tremendously preponderating probabilities are that Lincoln, his example, his ideals and his objects in life have had much to do in this way in shaping the present fortunes and future destinies of the people of the United States of America.

M. HARMAN.

TO LUCIFER'S SUBSCRIBERS.

The prosecutions against LUCIFER by authority of the Postal Department of the Washington government make it very important that we be able to make a good showing as to number of bona fide paying subscribers. In reporting the number of subscribers, when called for, we are allowed to count only such as have paid ahead or who have requested the paper continued to their address after time of subscription has expired. We, therefore, very earnestly request,

First, all whose time has expired or is about to expire, to let us know without delay, whether they wish LUCIFER continued to their names or not.

Second, all whose time is paid ahead to send us the names of as many new subscribers as possible, and when sending names of new subscribers it is important that a distinction be made between those who pay their own money and those who do not. While we are very glad to get the names and cash for new subscribers, whether by their own motion or sent by friends as trial subscribers (hoping they will renew for themselves when time is up), it is only those who pay their own money—or what is the same thing, authorize a friend to pay for them—that can be counted in making our report to the Postal Department at Washington.

Shall we hear from you, good friends, all?

WHAT OUR CONTEMPORARIES ARE SAYING.

Prominent among the editorial paragraphs of "Liberty" for May is the following:

"Some weeks ago Moses Harman, editor of LUCIFER, was arrested on the technical charge of depositing non-mailable matter in the United States mails. He was released on bail, and up to the present time, his case has not reached a trial. As far as can be learned, the specific things that were alleged to be unmailable are one of a series of articles by Dora Forster on 'Sex Radicalism' and another article of similar nature written by one of LUCIFER'S other contributors. The former series has since been published in pamphlet form, and it goes without saying that there is not a single line in it which an unperverted mind would find objectionable as language, although the ideas expressed therein are such as very many honest and sincere people would take exception to. The pamphlet—whether one agrees with its thesis or not—is well written; the subject is well presented, and the literary quality of the articles is above the average of that contributed by LUCIFER'S correspondents. Mrs. Forster reasons from the standpoint of one who believes in perfect freedom in sexual matters, and in this her work is sane and sound. She presents an instructive array of facts, and her conclusions are logical and well drawn for the most part, although they would naturally lead Comstock into deep water. This gentleman can have no other excuse for his action in this case than that he fails to understand what the matter he finds objectionable is all about. To him it is filth, because anything that he doesn't understand is taboo. What is needed is the education of Anthony Comstock; but that is not likely to occur as long as there is such a fat salary attaching to the office of secretary of the Society for the Prevention of Vice, and as long as he does not have to account strictly for the salacious pictures which he seizes."

As most of LUCIFER'S readers probably know, "Liberty" is the leading Anarchistic journal (printed in English) in America, and perhaps the leading journal of "Philosophic Anarchism" in the world. Its founder and editor is Benjamin R. Tucker, who is reported to be sojourning in Paris, France, at the present time, engaged in literary work, but as there is no signature to the quoted paragraph the presumption is that it was written by the editor himself. Though the language used is scarcely equal to "Liberty's" wont, in point of vigor and incisiveness, when protesting against the work of the American Inquisition, I wish here to thank the editor for the friendly notice of the latest arrest of LUCIFER'S editor for alleged violations of postal laws and for what he says of the causes that led thereto, and would freely and earnestly recommend to all our readers who may wish to know the meaning of Anarchy or Anarchism, to send 10 cents for a copy of "Liberty," New York City, Box 1212, or better still, $1 for twenty-four issues of that pioneer journal of Anarchistic thought.

In LUCIFER, number 1036, was quoted a strongly worded protest from the editor of the "Truth Seeker," New York, against the treatment LUCIFER and its editor are receiving at the hands of the censors, and now I have the pleasure of quoting a similar protest from an English journal of the same name, "The Truth Seeker," published and edited at Bradford, England, by J. W. Gott. In his quarterly issue for April, May and June of the current year he devotes the first page to a picture of LUCIFER'S editor, followed by these words:

"Moses Harman, editor of LUCIFER, lives in Chicago, Ill., U. S. A. He is a stalwart of the stalwarts, a connecting link with the old warriors of the pen who flourished in ante-bellum days. For sixty years he has fought for liberty and progress. He is now nearly 80 years of age, and is still at the old stand fighting the battle of the sexes and for liberty of the press.

"Several times has he gone to jail, because he dared to speak the truth regardless of the old Eastern proverb, 'Speak the truth and you will be turned out of seven cities'—and sometimes get into jail, the philosopher might have added. Only the other day he was again arrested—for the same offense—publishing advanced opinions concerning sex relationships. His arrest has caused consternation among the advanced thinkers of the United States. Since that papier-mache hero and picayune President, Theodore Roosevelt, came into power the forces of reaction have been very busy, trying to crush and destroy the leaders of the 'New Thought'; whether of the brand metaphysical, sociological, sexual, or political. Especially active are the emissaries of the law against those who discuss the sex problem. This is the reason why the foremost advocate in America of the freedom of the sexes is again under arrest. We trust the Reform forces of the United States will coalesce their power and influence, and do their utmost to protect this old man, defiant in his gallant fight with fanatics and fools."

The closing paragraph, not quoted here, of this highly eulogistic editorial, is a quotation from the New York "Truth Seeker's" article already alluded to. At the bottom of the page, in a style quite conspicuous, Brother Gott advertises the fact that "The Truthseeker Co., 2 Union street, Bradford, are sole English agents for books and pamphlets published by Moses Harman. LUCIFER, post free, 5s per annum. 'Sex Radicalism,' 2s, post free. Complete list of publications, with sample copy of LUCIFER, 6 penny stamps."

In last issue of LUCIFER I entered a mild protest against the current exaggeration of my age, and now again it is perhaps right and proper that I disclaim the honor of having been a fighter for "liberty and progress for sixty years." Sixty years ago I was a member of the Methodist church, in the fifteenth year of my present incarnation. However, from my parents I inherited a love of freedom and very early in life took up the cause of the enslaved African, although then living in a "slave" State, and was ostracised as an "abolitionist" and narrowly escaped mob violence before the breaking out of the war of 1860-65.

All the same, my thanks are due to Brother Gott for his highly appreciative notice, and for his splendid helpfulness in introducing LUCIFER and its literature to his fellow Englishmen and English women. While there are several well-conducted and popular English journals devoted to "Secularism," and to the various phases of "Freethought," so-called, as against religious intolerance, there is, since the death of the "Adult," no British journal devoted mainly to sex freedom and to culture along sex lines, or to the right adjustment of sex relations, including and emphasizing the self-ownership of woman and the right of the child to be born well. Hence there would seem to be an excellent opening for the introduction of LUCIFER and its literature among our British cousins at the present time, and it is to be hoped that Brother Gott will be eminently successful as agent for LUCIFER, and in return LUCIFER will gladly reciprocate by acting as agent for the Bradford "Truth Seeker."

For several months past we have carried the advertisement of our English contemporary and will be glad to forward subscriptions to the "Truth Seeker" at the very low price of 35 cents per annum—published monthly. Owing mainly to lack of time on the editor's part for propaganda work, there have been but two issues published thus far in the present year, but the statement is now made that the monthly issue will probably be resumed in the near future. M. H.

LUCIFER'S HELPERS.

In this list are credited all who send money on the Free Speech Defense Fund; all who send money to pay for trial subscriptions to LUCIFER as propaganda work; all who buy books for the same work, and all who send money or stamps to be used in sending out sample copies, or for the general publication fund.

L. Kanselbaum, $4.45; L. D. Ratliff, $4; E. Holm, $2.29; A. friend, 25c; Thirza Rathbun, 10c; Henry Hanson, $2; A friend, $1; Virginia Hyde Vogl, 75c; R. W. W., $3; M. M. Harrington, 25c; Ria B. Bruce, $2; W. W. M., $1; C. S. Haney, $1; James Myers, 50c; R. N. Douglas, $2; George E. Bowen, 85c; J. B. Phinney, $5.75; Frank L. Poland, $2; Dr. W. W., $10.

Again thanking all for their kindly thoughtful remembrance of LUCIFER and its needs, we once more ask for names of those to whom samples may be sent with a reasonable hope that the paper will be read and appreciated.

MEETINGS AND LECTURES.

The Social Science League holds public meetings every Sunday evening at eight, in Room 913, Masonic Temple, Chicago. Lectures and discussions free.

The Chicago Society of Anthropology meets every Sunday at 2:30 p. m., 17th floor Masonic Temple. Public invited.

Love is a comedy in seven acts. You see her, you love her, you swear it, you prove it, you quarrel with her, you hate her and you leave her. Sometimes you marry her, then it is a tragedy.—Max O'Rell.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Full name and address of writers in this department can generally be obtained on application to the editor.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

W. P. Ward, Erick, Okla.—"Enclosed find $1 for the six copies of 'Sex Radicalism.' Had hoped to be able to contribute something to the Free Speech Fund, but that I must defer for the present. I want to do something, for it is my liberty as well as yours that is assailed."

L. R. Fink, Malad City, Idaho.—"For the enclosed $3.50, please send 'Karezza,' $1; 'Love's Coming of Age,' $1; 'Marriage in Free Society,' 25c; 'Prodigal Daughter,' 25c; 'Vice, Its Friends and Its Foes,' 15c; 'Creative Life,' 25c; 'Woman in Her Relation to Church, or Canon Law,' 10c; 'Curse of Maternity,' 25c; 'Our Worship of Primitive Social Guesses,' 15c; two copies of 'Law of Population,' 50c."

Miss M. A. Graff, Philadelphia, Pa.—"Please send four copies of that noble book, 'Sex Radicalism.'" (One dollar inclosed.)

Wm. A. Flight, New York.—"There is only one trouble with LUCIFER—there is not enough of it! I think if we could contribute more to its support it could be improved as to size, and I think, also, if we were to send up more short articles, giving our private views of men, women and things, it would add to the interest of the paper. If we are thinkers we do not want other people to think for us all the time. I say let us all be leaders rather than followers. I would like to hear from J. Allen Evans, of Cripple Creek, Colo., also from Frank Weller, of Mitchell, S. D. Also would like to know if there are any liberal-minded men and women in Seattle, Wash., as I expect to go there soon. Also would like to hear from anyone having a sensible, practicable scheme by which a few hundred dollars might be used to good advantage. Address Wm. A. Flight, LUCIFER Office."

W. C. Nation, Levin, Manawatu, New Zealand.—"Please send me 'Love's Coming of Age,' 'Evolution of Modesty' and 'What the Young Need to Know.' I enclose a five-shilling money order. Thank you for LUCIFER. It is through its perusal I came across the names of the above books. The radical thoughts of to-day are the home truths of to-morrow. If you have any straight-out pamphlets, send me a few; I will remit in return. I am posting LUCIFER to friends around."

Paul Robin, 21 Rue de la Duce, Paris, France.—"We received your kind words, but not yet the booklet. Was it not stopped by your censors? Our friend Dr. Rutgers, of S. Gravenhage, Holland, wrote me that if you wanted to get subscriptions he would subscribe—did not say how much. We will do the same. You can write postal cards when you like—French people can't read them. When you send letters, please stamp 5 cents to prevent our having to pay double tax to our own tyrants—not much better than yours. Most heartily from the French friends to you and our American brothers."

J. B. Barnhill, Zenia, Ill.—"Drop LUCIFER entirely as a fortnightly and get it out monthly, as a magazine, about the size of the 'Adult'; suitable for binding. As a fortnightly it is simply throwing away hard-earned money. Think how much more dignified, how much more impressive, how much more effective, more respectable—from a library standpoint—LUCIFER would be as a monthly magazine at 25 cents a copy."

J. B. Phinney, Springfield, Mo.: "Enclosed find draft for six dollars for which send me Dr. E. B. Foote's 'Home Cyclopedia,' $2; 'Karezza,' Dr. Stockham, $1; 'Love's Coming of Age,' Carpenter, $1; 'Jeannette,' 25c. Another copy or two each of 'Autonomy' and 'Autonomestic Marriage' and a few copies of 'New Hedonism.' Also send LUCIFER three months to W. J. C., and one year to Mrs. P. D. S. This draft for six dollars, I might add, is in the nature of a donation to LUCIFER'S emergency fund to help out of this present trouble. I send for these books more for propaganda purposes than because I need them myself, and if you can make any better use of the money than to send me these books, that is your privilege and your duty. If more is needed let me know. I am by no means surfeited with this world's goods, but I propose to raise my children intelligently, and will not quibble much over one month's wages when justice and principle are at stake."

Flavius J. Van Voorhis, Indianapolis, Ind.: "The prosecution against you is an outrage, and I gladly do the small favor you ask. Enclosed find check for one dollar. Continue LUCIFER to me and send one copy for some time to H. W. I have "Sex Radicalism." This is the book I understand that is regarded as obscene. It may contain some things with which I would not agree, but to call it obscene is pure unadulterated nonsense. In the main it is true without question."

A. G. Lengberg, Grove City, Fla.: "Find enclosed money order for $5, for which send me books as follows: 'Perfect Humanhood,' Agnes Benham, $1; 'Wholesome Woman,' Dr. J. H. Greer, $2; six copies 'Sex Radicalism,' Dora Foster, $1; 'Woman's Source of Power,' Lois Waisbrooker, 25c. Balance apply on my subscription to LUCIFER. Also enclosed find 50c stamps, for which send LUCIFER three months to Miss E. J——, 25c, and for the other 25c send samples to the five additional names. Hoping you will get out of the troubles you are in—I may be able to send you some aid if you need it—with love and good wishes."

G. W. Soule, Meridian, Miss: "Am sorry to hear of your further trouble through the Comstock gang. I enclose $5. You may mail me 'Love's Way to Perfect Humanhood,' $1; 'A Free Man's Creed,' 25c; 'The Ascent of Life,' 25c; 'Motherhood in Freedom,' 25c; 'Life, Health and Longevity,' 25c. The remainder put to my credit on LUCIFER'S sustaining fund. May draw on it later for more books."

H. M., New York: "Enclosed find $1.50, part of which is to pay subscription for the coming year; for the rest send me two copies of 'Sex Radicalism.' . . . Am very sorry to note that you have to suffer again from the tyrannical crusade that the American censorship has started against you and against your splendid paper. . . . What we as radicals must do is to unite and put an end to this high-handedness on the part of the capitalistic authorities, who are constantly seeking to deprive us of the 'liberties' we have, but do not enjoy! . . . Am willing to contribute towards that end. Hoping that the friends of LUCIFER and the editor will win this battle, in which we should all be interested—the battle for freedom of expression."

William Pretz, 801 Pine St., Trenton, N. J.: "I hope you won't divide your energies to such extent as to branch out to hygiene, physical culture, and to food and cooking, as one correspondent suggests. Such would be foreign to the established aim and scope of LUCIFER, but rather concentrate still more on sex reform, as Agnes Benham and Arthur Wastall suggest. I am with them altogether. It would be a grand purpose if it could be carried out, to devote one page of LUCIFER to those who are isolated from pleasant companionship, for those who feel lonely, and for those who would like to correspond along liberal and experimental lines—a sort of rallying place for the lonely ones, as Mrs. Benham says. Hope you will think it over. Please send samples to enclosed names."

Arthur Wastall, 3 Amalinda Road, East London, Cape Colony, South Africa: "Herewith $5 as promised; regret much I can't afford more just at present. In March number of 'Fortnightly Review' there is an article which will interest you and your readers, on 'The Marriage Contract in Its Relation to Social Progress,' by Vera Collins."

W. S. Hammaker, Pratt, W. Va.: "My thoughts often turn to you in a kindly greeting, especially as you have borne the burden and heat of the day, traveling over some very rough roads, as would be natural with a man of your aspirations. You have made and are making a good fight, and should have the sympathy and aid of all lovers of liberty in its truest sense.

"And now as your career is approaching life's evening, and as my head is nearly half white with age, it behooves us, with many others, to work while it is called day, for the night cometh when we must lay the armor down—work and do whatsoever our hands find to do, trying with all our might to do it well.

"When attending our congress at St. Louis, October 15-19, 1904, and while in the chair as president, I had the privilege of looking into the faces of students; men of close observation; some venerable heads of many winters, reminding me of the philosophers of ancient Greece—Socrates, Solon and others, who bravely worked for human emancipation in their day. I had the honor also of meeting some of our noble sisters at the World's Fair city and shall never forget them, nor their good works for the success of our congress at St. Louis, nor their personal kindness.

"I hope to have time soon to write up something for your brave and splendid publication. Send the Light Bearer to this address, with the book, 'Prodigal Daughter, or the Price of Virtue,' by Rachel Campbell."

Henry Olerich, Omaha, Nebraska: "Shall be much pleased to take one or two of the pamphlets of Mrs. Loomis' lecture. Her thought is sound and her language is faultless."

[Henry Olerich is the author of that well-known and widely commended work, "Cityless and Countryless World," and of other books on co-operative living; being a successful author and publisher of reform books, a word of commendation from him carries unusual weight.]

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS.

BOOKS AT HALF PRICE.

To encourage our friends who are buying books for free distribution or for circulating libraries, we have decided to offer the following books at half price for the next three months. Part of these books are of our own publication; others have been either donated to us to help our work along or they have been purchased by us at rates that will justify the reduction named.

The prices named are the common retail prices. We offer them postpaid at one-half these rates.

WOMAN AND HER RELATION TO THE CHURCH OR CANON LAW FOR WOMEN. Harriet M. Closz. A succinct statement of the position to which women were doomed by the Church Fathers and authorities. Every woman should possess a copy. 10c.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A Primer of Sexual Rationalism. Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages. 10c.

MARRIAGE IN FREE SOCIETY. Edward Carpenter. One of the best short works on the subject. Daintily printed. A charming little gift book. "Love is doubtless the last and most difficult lesson that humanity has to learn; in a sense it underlies all the others. Perhaps the time has come for the modern nations when, ceasing to be children, they may even try to learn it." 25c.

THE ORIGIN OF THE FAMILY, PRIVATE PROPERTY AND THE STATE. Frederick Engels. Chapter titles: Prehistoric Stages; The Family; The Iroquois Gens; The Grecian Gens; Origin of the Attic State; Gens and State in Rome; The Gens Among Celts and Germans; The Rise of the State Among Germans. 217 pages; bound in cloth. 60c. Postage, 5c.

TOKOLOGY. A book for every woman. By Alice B. Stockham, M. D. Illustrated. Tokology teaches possible painless pregnancy and parturition, giving full, plain directions for the care of a woman before and after confinement. The ailments of pregnancy can be prevented as well as the pains and dangers of childbirth avoided, and women need not go down to death giving birth to children. English, German or Swedish. $2.25.

HILDA'S HOME; A Story of Woman's Emancipation. Rosa Graul. With Macaulay, Rosa Graul would say, "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman will be less loving and lovable, or that man will be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish. 426 pages. Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

THE NEW HEDONISM. Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old asceticism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.'" The new Hedonism says: "Be happy and you will be virtuous." In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediæval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproducing function." Paper covers; 39 large pages; twelve copies, 50c; single copy, 5c.

VICE: ITS FRIENDS AND ITS FOES. Edwin C. Walker. Contents: Brotherhood of Man; The Recognition of Facts; Folly of "For Men Only"; Definition of Vice; Horrors of Prostitution; Abnormal Sexuality; Errors of Fathers, Mothers and Teachers; Persecution Does Not Reform; Prostitution and the Crusaders; The "Spoiling of the Heathen"; What Are the Effects of Raids and Crusades? The Economic Side of the Problem; Party Politics in Vice Crusading; In What Does Prostitution Consist? Some Causes of Prostitution; Two Kinds of Prostitution Compared; The Opponents of Divorce; "Purifying" the Tenements; Action for Advanced Women. With appendix: The Wanderings of a Spirit; Our Fair Civilization, the Folly and Cruelty of It All. 15c.

OUR WORSHIP OF PRIMITIVE SOCIAL GUESSES. E. C. Walker. Contents: Love and Law; The Moloch of the Monogamic Idea; The Continuity of Race-Life, and Tyranny; Food and Sex Fallacies, a Criticism; When Men and Women Are and When They Are Not Varietists; The New Woman; What Is She? What Will She Be? The State Hiding Behind Its Own Mistakes; Bishop Potter's Opinion of Divorce; Love; Its Attraction and Expression; Is She an Honest Girl? Lloyd, Platt and the Pitiful Facts; Social Radicals and Parentage; Anthropology and Monogamy Love and Trust Versus Fear; Reflections upon Reading William Platt's "Women, Love, and Life." 15c.

LOVE'S COMING OF AGE. Edward Carpenter. This is a book with which few will wholly agree, but which nearly every one can read with profit and enjoyment. The subject is the relation of the sexes in the past, present and future, and it is treated with absolute frankness and fearlessness by a writer who unites a broad outlook, a strong grasp of his subject and a charming literary style. The following table of contents will indicate the line of thought followed by the author: The Sex Passion; Man, the Ungrown; Woman, the Serf; Woman in Freedom; Marriage a Retrospect; Marriage, a Forecast; The Free Society; Some Remarks on the Early Star and Sex Worships. Notes on the Primitive Group Marriage; Jealousy; The Family; Preventive Checks to Population. The book is printed on extra book paper and handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

KAREZZA. Ethics of Marriage. Alice B. Stockham, M. D., author of Tokology. Karezza gives a high ideal to parental functions and pleads for justice to the unborn child. Karezza is really a supplement to Tokology and elucidates a theory of marital relations, which leads to individual growth and a closer bond of union, the practice of which at all times gives complete control of the fecundating power. Karezza controverts the prevailing ideas of baseness and degradation associated with the sexual nature, makes a plea for a better birthright for the child, for a controlled and designed maternity and aims to lead individuals to a higher development of themselves, through a knowledge of their creative powers. Karezza is the product of knowledge and experience, and is presented to the world with a deep abiding faith, that its teachings will lead individuals to purer lives, to right understanding and appreciation of the sex functions, to intelligent control of propagation and finally through right adjustment in most sacred relations, to the ideal marriage. Levant cloth, prepaid, $1.

SOME "SOUND VIEWS" ON SEX.

A Remarkable Symposium on this important subject is one of the interesting features of that fearless Puget Sound magazine, SOUNDVIEW,

Exponent of the Society of Evergreens, composed of men not afraid-of-an-idea (and women).

Among the contributors to this series of sex articles are Drs. Grear, Conger Hanish, Berrier, Rullison; J. Wm. Lloyd, William L. Garver, Nancy McKay Gordon, Lois Waisbrooker, Elmer Ellsworth Carey, Dora Forster, Harry Gaze, James F. Morton, Jr., Mae Lawson, Herself—Ahem! And the Boss and Embossed Evergreen may have a few things to say—and many others of equal ability and familiarity with the subject.

Most of these men and women are writers of national reputation and authors of some of the most helpful books in the English language. Some of them need no introduction to Lucifer readers, who cannot afford to miss a single issue containing this series, which opened in the January number with a powerful article by Dr. Leroy Berrier.

But this is not all. The articles of Judge Frank T. Reid, the distinguished single-tax advocate and associate editor, are attracting the attention of thinkers all over the country.

And—oh, pshaw, we can't tell you the half! Just dig up a dollar bill and send for a year's subscription to the only magazine in the world Pencilled, Printed, Proof-read, Published, Pasted and Posted amid the wildwood (a copy of "Wildwood Philosophy," a cloth-bound book, given FREE as long as they last). If you don't say it is the Prettiest, Spiciest specimen of magazinehood you ever saw, we'll refund your money.

Here is what the well-known writer and lecturer, James F. Morton, Jr., thinks of SOUNDVIEW: "Puget Sound at last has a monthly adequately representative of progressive thought. It is frank and fearless, refined and vigorous, witty and eloquent."

THE RIGHT TO BE BORN WELL.

Ten years ago, in the Boston Arena, Stinson Jarvis, author of the book, "The Ascent of Life," used this language:

"The ascent of life is the ascent of ideals. That this is true in regard to human beings, the whole history of man bears witness. The records prove that qualities idealized will inevitably become permanent in offspring." Elsewhere in the same article Mr. Jarvis says:

"The study of evolution, although vaguely bringing us to believe in the gradual ascent of all life, is, at the present day, practically at a standstill. In every direction science faces barriers and impassable chasms. We have not yet discovered how evolution involves." . . .

And again:

"If it can be proved that certain conditions of the parental mind, either at the time of conception or during the period of gestation, influence and alter the shape and disposition of the offspring, then we find ourselves in the presence of a fact which, when followed to its necessary issues, will be found to remove some barriers at which science has been halted. Darwin did not suggest a reason why a species in nature should in any way ascend in the scale of development. Haeckel and others have shown excellent proof of retrogression; but none have given a reason for progress. . . . But if, on the other hand, we can prove the above mentioned prenatal alterations upon offspring arising from parental mental conditions, then it is more than a presumption that the same alterative processes have been at work in all living creatres from the beginning."

Then, after giving a number of striking instances, well authenticated facts, to prove the truth of his theory, Mr. Jarvis adds:

"These facts, which in former years were sometimes dismissed unnoticed as 'old women's stories,' take a very different aspect when certified to by the most clever and careful men in three continents. . . . There is no end to the multiplication of proof, and when the potency and universal range of this power are realized, the development or ascent of animal forms becomes not only reasonably possible, but also to be expected."

Dr. Sydney Barrington Elliott, in the introduction to his book, "Edeology," a work published by the Arena Company in 1893, uses this language when speaking of the difficulties in the way of a rational presentation of the subject of human reproduction:

"It is a sad reflection upon our civilization that people should be left to live, propagate and bring up children in entire darkness of this, the most important of all subjects; while every trade, profession and occupation, and all other branches of physiology are taught, and have light thrown on them for the benefit of all." Proceeding, he adds:

"The subject is an extremely difficult one with which to deal, for it is hedged around by the prejudice which is born of ignorance, and few dare to surmount the barrier. Many allow a sort of mock modesty to step in and keep them from investigating this most important of all subjects. Could these, however, be persuaded to examine the subject with unbiased minds, and lay aside prejudice—for, as that illustrious writer, Lord Lytton, has well said, 'Vice has no friend like the prejudice that claims to be virtue'—they could not help deriving much benefit therefrom."

Summing the matter up, Dr. Elliott puts it thus:

"Expectant parents should know how to have well-born children or none at all; and, furthermore, these and all others, if they wish to live healthy, natural lives, must have at least some knowledge of the generative system."

Here are a few of the instances cited in the work, Edeology, to prove the tremendous power of prenatal influence in shaping bodily forms and also in forming mental traits.

"Mrs. A—— was a melancholy instance of strength of mind perverted to selfish ends. Ambitious of power and influence, she was unscrupulous in the means by which they were obtained. Owing to her plausibility and pertinacity, she once was elected to an office of trust in a benevolent society of which she was a member. This was a situation of great temptation to one whose selfish sentiments predominated, as the event proved; for at the expiration of a year she was dismissed under the imputation of having appropriated a portion of the funds of the society to her own use. During the year in which she held this office, Mrs. A—— gave birth to a daughter, whose first characteristic manifestations were a marked tendency to theft."

"The following well-known cases, which appeared in one family, will be found in detail in the New York Medical Record, 1891, Vol. XI, p. 42, and are reported by Dr. R. Osgood Mason, of New York, through Dr. M. K. Bowers, of Harrisburg, Pa. The parents of the children were pronounced brunettes; the grandparents all have dark complexions and dark hair, and the family, as far back as its history can be traced, is entirely free from freaks or abnormalities of any kind. The parents were well-educated and unusually intelligent people. The grandfather on the mother's side at present holds a prominent position in one of the offices of the state government. To these parents was born, as might naturally be expected, a dark complexioned child. Early in the second pregnancy of the mother, she was surprised and made nervous by the sudden and unexpected appearance of a large, beautiful Albino rat, sent to her from friends in Philadelphia, to which she afterward became much attached. Before her child was born, she predicted that it would be an albino.

"She was right; when it was born, it was seen to be a perfect albino, and a beautiful child. The mother became unusually fond of it, and wished that she might have another albino. When she next became pregnant, she again predicted that she would have a child similar to the last, and she did all in her power to make it so, keeping the face of her first albino child constantly before her. When the child was born, it was seen to be as perfect an albino as the first, but a girl—the first being a boy. It might be well to add here that the rat died before the first child was born.

"She again became pregnant, but this time hoped she would have a dark-complexioned child. She was surrounded, though, by the same influences, and the same models were before her. She feared disappointment, and she experienced it. The third child was as perfect an albino as the first. Upon the occurrence of her next pregnancy she was thoroughly aroused, and was extremely anxious to have a dark-complexioned child. She at once sent her albino children away to her mother's house, to remain during her pregnancy.

"Her one constant song and desire was for the dark-haired baby. She talked of it constantly—she even talked of it in her sleep. She felt that she would not be disappointed, and she was not. A perfect dark-haired child was born.

"Dr. Bowers further states that the whole family are remarkably healthy, and the albinos are much better specimens of that type than any found in museums or circus shows. The hair is snow-white and remarkably fine and soft, the eyebrows and lashes are the same. The eyes and complexion are of perfect albino type."

"A mother at an early stage in pregnancy had her attention drawn to a beautiful figure of a child in wax, exhibited in a shop window in one of our cities. It had a lovely face, indicative of an amiable character, and it greatly pleased the lady's fancy. She frequently visited the spot in order to feast her eyes upon its pleasing features, and brought the energies of her soul to bear in an endeavor to transfer them to the unfolding germ within. When her child (a daughter) was born, its features were an almost exact copy of those of the beautiful figure, markedly different from the features of any other of the family. There are five other children, none of whom are remarkable for beauty."

"Some time since we met with a youth who had finely-moulded limbs and a symmetrical form throughout. His mother has a large, lean, attenuated frame that does not offer so much as a single suggestion of the beautiful. The boy is doubtless indebted for his fine form to the presence of a beautiful French lithograph in his mother's sleeping apartment, and which presented for her contemplation the faultless form of a naked child."

"The impression may be prolonged or instantaneous although prolonged impressions and those constantly repeated are productive of correspondingly greater results.

"That the mother has an influence over the mental characteristics of the child is undoubtedly true. The reason that instances are not more glaringly frequent is obvious. The bodily defect is apparent at the birth of the child; the mental defects, peculiarity, or whatever it may be, is obvious only at a later period, and by that time the various causes of mental distress, of mental work or of the mental states, whatever they have been during the gestation of that child, have probably been forgotten; so that while it may be said there are few, none at all, perhaps, who are not more or less affected by pre-natal influence, there are necessarily few whose peculiarities, tendencies and idiosyncrasies can be accounted for."

CONCERNING NEMO.

Concerning Nemo, I believe he is not our only Nemo, so I wish to remark on the position he takes both in name and deed.

There are two great historical movements active at the present time—the economic movement and the sex reform movement. In both these movements, for justice to workers and justice to women, Nemo has found a place. This goes to show that he is less custom-bound, and more humane, and probably less ignorant and more rational than ninety-six percent of his fellow-citizens, non-reformers. Yet, unmindful of his high calling, adopting the name Nemo, a representative of nobodies, he lightly repudiates all responsibility. He professes an anxiety for the moral education of children, but he is careless of the childhood of the sex reform movement—which, if he does not know, I can tell him, is far more important than the childhood of any individual or number of individuals living, while, fortunately, the same thing is needed for both—"light, more light."

He thinks he discovers serious error in the suggestions of a fellow reformer. Instead of at once pointing it out, and warning others against it, giving reasons for his opinion, which was his clear duty, he only sees an opportunity to bring contempt upon anarchists cheaply, and quotes from one reform paper a supposed mistake of a supposed anarchist to convince Socialists of another reform paper that anarchists are scoundrels. As a Socialist, it is not my special duty to defend anarchists, though I admit that they are not always very happy in stating their own philosophy, but I am sure that many of our Socialist comrades would be the better for being reminded oy our friends, the anarchists, that a high individualism is the true aim of Socialism.

Nemo seems to be the only Luciferite who mistook my word concerning the education of children and young persons. I will try to deal briefly with some of his misrepresentations.

In his earlier and more carelessly worded letter, Nemo said that my papers "advocated the early development of the sex natures of children by natural and unnatural methods." In his second letter, he says I asserted that "certain bad habits did not harm children."

I touched on the subject of nervous excitability in children in my second paper of the series, which was not the paper which brought persecution upon Moses Harman. The question was not of developing sex nature in children, but how to treat some forms of sexual excitability when they do arise. I cannot take space to quote my remarks in full, but the gist of them was that childish excitement of sex nerves is a symptom rather than a cause of nervousness, to be counteracted by plenty of healthy companionship, and that the child should be treated as a responsible being, and given knowledge how to meet its own difficulties, like the adult, and aim at self-control and moderation, just as the adult does. Nemo suggests no method of dealing with such cases, but his tests of them are very faulty, and are a good example of the partial observation and worthless inductions which pass for knowledge even in our health manuals. We lack statistics as to whether more pale children or more rosy ones have this nervous excitability; certainly more pale ones come under medical observation; those who have come under my observation have all been rosy.

But it now appears that his accusation of advocating unnatural methods with children refers to my tenth paper, though that expressly discusses the life, not of children, but of adults at puberty and later. I suggested that confidential friendship and sexual friendship with those older and wiser than themselves would greatly help solve the difficulties of young people. And I most distinctly affirm that it is natural and usual for young girls to be attracted by mature men, and for boys to be attracted by mature women, and that this tendency has been frequently noticed by observers who are more accurate than Nemo.

Whether love visits young girls by way of surgeons I will not now discuss. It was not in the name of sexual love, but in that of humanity, that I suggested that a girl should have due preparation (not "one preparation," as misprinted) for sexual union. We have not yet reached a time when a bridegroom can be trusted not to be careless and cruel through ignorance, and in any case a girl should be taught enough to decide for herself. The only prospective bride I know who was instructed as to this, preferred the services of a woman surgeon rather than "leave it to nature," in euphemistic phrase.

My view of men is so different from that of Nemo that I can scarcely compare his and mine; but as to his men, who are of less good quality than women, and who make "sport" of girls, and who want to be fathers, I hope the wants of such men are seldom satisfied, and I am sure they will not be in a happier time when women are not kept in ignorance. Both fatherhood and motherhood will be reverenced in the future, more than is possible under our false and hypocritical morality.

I suppose Nemo means variety by "promiscuity," though I think the latter word should be reserved to mean chance unions. When he says, "most liberal men abhor promiscuity for girls," he seems to imply that they do not abhor it for men; yet he does not say how variety can be allowed to men without being allowed to women. He accuses radicals of ignoring human nature in men; does he not ignore human nature in young girls?

I regret the delay in replying to Nemo, which was caused by LUCIFER accidentally failing to reach me as usual.

DORA FORSTER.

There is a class of persons to whom by all spiritual affinity I am bought and sold; for them I will go to prison, if need be; but your miscellaneous popular charities; the education at college of fools; the building of meeting-houses to the vain end to which many now stand; alms to sots; and the thousandfold relief societies—though I confess with shame I sometimes succomb and give the dollar, it is a wicked dollar which by-and-by I shall have the manhood to withhold.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

A red or blue cross means, your subscription has expired, and you are respectfully requested to renew, or at least to let us know whether you wish the paper continued to your address.

VERY STRANGE.

Yes, it is, that the letter I wrote in connection with that arrest should not have reached its destination—that with several others, and yet not so strange when we look into the power of the unseen, if the conditions are right for its denizens to act upon the seen. If Czolgosz could be obsessed to kill a McKinley (and I have evidence that he was), then mediumistic postal clerks who are in sympathy with church spirits can be influenced to interfere with the letters of those who are working for a better order of things, knowing that such better order must overturn the present system—a system which, both socially and economically, literally devours the people.

But I want here to requote the paragraph taken from the New York "World," and written by Ella Wheeler Wilcox, as quoted in LUCIFER, date April 27th, by Hulda L. Potter Loomis:

"I have known suicide to be attempted by one weary of virtue; one who felt that in her case virtue was not its own reward, since it left her facing the shadows of middle life with no lamp of human love to light the way. There are some women to whom the lack of male companionship is as great a tragedy as the loss of virtue to others. The despair of the unpossessed can be as wearing as the remorse of the erring. We hear little of the one and much of the other. Sorrowing virtue is more ashamed of its woes than unhappy sin, because the world has tears for the latter and only ridicule for the former."

Of course, Ella uses the words "virtue," "erring," "sin," in their accepted meaning, which is false. Sin is a violation of nature's law, and the "virtuous woman who suffers from lack of male companionship errs more than does the one who is counted a sinner because of having broken man-made statutes. It was because I said in print and sent through the mail the words:

"There is no sin in a mutual, loving relation," unsanctioned by legality, of course, I was fined $100. I said is then. I say it now, and shall continue to so assert. Once I was listening to a man and woman who were condemning the injustice of crushing a girl who had violated legality, and letting the man go free. Presently the man turned to me for my opinion.

"Suppose I should say that neither had made a mistake, but that the public was in the wrong," was my reply, and they were terribly shocked. It is time we ceased measuring human rights by public opinion. Some years ago I heard a gentleman say he believed there were as many young people who sickened and died for the want of sex companionship as there were who died from excess in that line. I fully believe it. I am well satisfied that my bones would have been dust ere now had I forced myself to walk Mother Grundy's chalk-line. No, I have broken up no families nor made any other woman wretched, so far as I know, for another's sorrow caused by me would have worn upon me as much as utter lack of companionship.

I have long felt that I must say this, and the time has come to do so. Now, howl, ye slaves of church and state! Surely, there is nothing so cruel, so infernal, as is the idea that we must sacrifice health and even life to the supposed commands of some supposed God and to statutes founded upon such supposed commands.

"What fools we mortals be," particularly those who sit on the boiler of evolution, thinking to hold things back by their puny strength. Yes, fined $100 for telling the truth, and the telling of that truth was multiplied many times because of that arrest and fine. Had I been left in peace, its first publication would not have been repeated, but as it was—well, more than a hundred copies of a half sheet containing the "offensive" article, together with enough other radical matter to fill two four-column newspaper pages, were sold on the Spiritualist camp ground at Los Angeles that year for 10 cents a copy, and that they were read by many times that number goes without saying.

Your arrest, comrade, and all others of the kind, but hasten the downfall of an immoral social system. Yes, Mrs. Loomis the downfall of an immoral social system. Yes, Mrs. Loomis well says: "What 'whited sepulcher' our temple of virtue is, and what hypocrites we are to bow before its altar!" I thank her for her strong words and wish they could be read by every one. And that bring me to the subject of propaganda. I wish all recognized thinkers on the sex question who have the means could realize the importance of reaching the thousands who are thinking, who are not yet strong enough to speak. Many thousands in the churches, as well as out, men and women who sense the vibrations of thought and interiorly respond.

The editor of LUCIFER should, at this particular time, have thousands of dollars put into his hand for propaganda work, and for sufficient help so that at his age he would never have to sit up till "after midnight" to get through with his work.

There are many among the ministry who know that their desires are "sin," or that revelation and nature are at war, and that nature is right. They know that what are called the "crimes of preachers" in the sex line are the result of the ignorance of nature's law, which has become organized in the social system—know this, or are confused in attempting to walk in the old way while the very atmosphere is becoming so impregnated with the light of the new that they are in the agony of mental travail. Let all radicals send the names and addresses of ministers, teachers and their lines, as far as is possible, to LUCIFER'S editor, and also to myself, Home, Wash., via Lakebay, and every dollar received will be used in that line.

Soon after the issue of "Woman's Source of Power," I began to solicit aid in sending them to ministers, teachers, etc. I have received enough aid to send out 130, and I want to make the number 500 before the year is up. Send on your dollars, and the names, friends, and help us to hasten the downfall of the prison walls of ignorance and prejudice which shut from the people the light of the rising sun of freedom. Poor, aged and feeble as I am, so far as the physical is concerned, I rejoice to know that I am not failing mentally, and there is nothing for which I desire to live except to help on the work.

There is one side to this question, that, could Bible believers understand, they would eagerly accept, to-wit: That many prophecies which they have supposed could be fulfilled only "in God's own time," must be realized, if at all, through the purification of sex relations, and that true purity can never be reached except through the full right of woman to her own person. Fully free, no woman would yield to an unwelcome embrace, and the very atmosphere, vitalized by pure sex elements, would make it possible "to drink any deadly thing" without injury, for sex is the fountain of all life, consequently of all power, and the human race would, in fact, become the rulers of all beneath them, and what has been counted a miracle would then be seen to be governed by law.

LOIS WAISBROOKER.

TO LUCIFER'S SUBSCRIBERS.

The prosecutions against LUCIFER by authority of the Postal Department of the Washington government make it very important that we be able to make a good showing as to number of bona fide paying subscribers. In reporting the number of subscribers, when called for, we are allowed to count only such as have paid ahead or who have requested the paper continued to their address after time of subscription has expired. We, therefore, very earnestly request,

First, all whose time has expired or is about to expire, to let us know without delay, whether they wish LUCIFER continued to their names or not.

Second, all whose time is paid ahead to send us the names of as many new subscribers as possible, and when sending names of new subscribers it is important that a distinction be made between those who pay their own money and those who do not. While we are very glad to get the names and cash for new subscribers, whether by their own motion or sent by friends as trial subscribers (hoping they will renew for themselves when time is up), it is only those who pay their own money—or what is the same thing, authorize a friend to pay for them—that can be counted in making our report to the Postal Department at Washington.

Shall we hear from you, good friends, all?

The world accepts a man at the estimate he places upon himself. Many men are strong at times, but strong men make enemies—they have detractors—calumny calls and hate hisses. Then doubt comes creeping in, possibly the enemies are right—ah, who knows! And instantly the doubt is communicated to the public—the man's face tells his fears to all he meets. And their estimate of the man is the lowest standard he sets upon himself.

That is why we need Some One to believe in us—if we do well, we want our work commended, our faith corroborated.

The individual who thinks well of you, who keeps his mind on your good qualities, and does not look for flaws, is your friend. Who is my brother? I'll tell you: he is one who recognizes the good in me.—Fra Elbertus.

LUCIFER: ITS MEANING AND PURPOSE.

LUCIFER—The planet Venus; so called from its brightness.—Webster's Dictionary.

LUCIFEROUS—Giving light; affording light or the means of discovery.—Same.

LUCIFIC—Producing light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing, and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

CONGRESS SHALL MAKE NO LAW RESPECTING AN ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, OR PROHIBITING THE FREE EXERCISE THEREOF; OR ABRIDGING THE FREEDOM OF SPEECH, OR OF THE PRESS; OR THE RIGHT OF THE PEOPLE PEACEABLY TO ASSEMBLE, AND TO PETITION THE GOVERNMENT FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES.—First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

INDICTED AND HELD FOR TRIAL.

As was to be expected, the Federal grand jury indicted me for the alleged crime of mailing "obscene" literature. Summoned to appear at the United States court-room, Chicago, May 22, and there to plead "guilty or not guilty," I answered:

"Yes and No. I mailed the documents complained of, but am not guilty of mailing obscene literature." The judge said:

"If you want a jury trial you must plead not guilty."

"Very well, then, I plead not guilty."

Then I was told to appear at the same place June 1, ten days hence, presumably for trial.

As yet no legal counsel has been definitely arranged for. Clarence S. Darrow has been asked to conduct the defense, but so much in demand are the legal services of this now famous gentleman that he hesitates to undertake any more work of this kind. If left to myself alone, no lawyer would be retained, but since it is urged by many friends in Chicago and elsewhere that conviction would mean not only imprisonment for myself but a disastrous defeat of the cause of freedom and justice, together with failure to reach the public conscience through the arena of the courts in a great center of thought, I have consented to employ counsel, provided we can get a lawyer in full sympathy with our cause and one whose prestige would give reasonable assurance of victory over the assassins of liberty and the arch enemies of the higher and better education.

This is written on the eve of going to press and must therefore be closed abruptly for this time. M. HARMAN.

SOCIAL FREEDOM.

We are glad to announce that the affirmative responses are now sufficient to justify the publication of Hulda Potter Loomis' "Social Freedom" as a booklet. Inasmuch as the pressman and binder will want prompt payment our friends are asked to send the price, 20 cents per copy, or $1.50 per dozen, as soon as convenient.

THE RIGHT TO BE BORN WELL.

From time to time, for about one year past, articles have been printed in Lucifer with this title. The type of these articles has been kept standing, hoping to put the several chapters into a pamphlet about the size, shape and price of Dora Forster's "Sex Radicalism." One more chapter only, as I think, is now needed to make a booklet of fifty pages, or thereabout. If those who have subscribed and not paid for one or more copies of this booklet, will now send the amount of their subscriptions the chapters will be put into the hands of the pressman and binder.

Those who have paid in advance for the booklet will please excuse the long delay. Press of other business and lack of physical and mental energy, are the causes.

LOVE'S PROTEST.

Taking a hint from the many calls for Lucifer containing the article "Love's Protest," by Lady Florence Dixie, we have printed several thousand leaflets of that article and of "Radical Drama," by Jonathan Mayo Crane—the review of "Ellabelle." This leaflet will be sent to any address for 10 cents per dozen or 50 cents per hundred, in postage stamps. Some of our friends have adopted the plan of dropping Lucifer leaflets on the seats of street cars, in R. R. stations or enclosing them in letters, etc., after the methods found effective by propagandists of all schools. That these methods of sowing Lucifer seed has already produced fruit we have good reason to believe.

HOW TO WIN THE FIGHT FOR FREE SPEECH.

Replying to questions and suggestions under this head in a recent LUCIFER, Frank L. Poland, who for several years has shown his faith by his generous support of papers devoted to freedom and justice, writes us, in part, as follows:

"I believe that all the plans proposed would be good if we had enough money. But it seems to me that to send LUCIFER to every teacher would waste a good many copies on orthodox teachers who would promptly burn them. I know that when we use the best discretion possible we waste copies, more or less.

"My idea is to send LUCIFER three months to as many people as we can afford to, and to pick those people who would be most likely to be favorably impressed with it. Why not pick people who are themselves being oppressed by the law for their ideas along other lines? Why not send to every osteopath doctor in Illinois, first, and then in the entire country, if we could?

"If we could convert a few good successful osteopaths, they could help considerably in raising a fund, for they generally make good wages. They are themselves being persecuted; besides, about half of them are women, and they could and would do good missionary work among both sexes—that is, in getting people started toward sex radicalism. Besides, osteopathy is a very rapidly growing and organized power, so that if we could color it with the sentiment of freedom along radical lines while it is yet a child, when it gets its growth we may expect to be protected by its brawny arm.

"Osteopaths are people who, in one particular, at least, have departed from their early teaching—the healing art. Does not this fact give ground for presuming that they will depart from their early teaching in other particulars?

"I think LUCIFER ought to be sent to most all the editors, especially to those who are teaching unpopular doctrines in religion or politics.

"I know a woman who has been a subscriber to the 'Truth Seeker' for many years, an atheist and materialist, but who seems to have no feeling of opposition toward Anthony Comstock and his work of suppression, simply because papers devoted solely to freedom of thought—not including freedom in love—have become so popular and so strong that Comstock does not meddle with them. I think there are many like this woman.

"Would it not be a good plan to print a little tract briefly showing what Anthony Comstock has done and is doing, giving his own words, as when he said he would suppress free-thought and free-love literature? Then send this tract to all Free-thinkers in the United States and Canada, and ask them to contribute what they can to a fund to be used in defense of freedom of speech.

"Let this tract cost not more than one cent, but let Comstock's infamous threat be printed in large capitals, differently colored from the rest of the print, and with an index finger at margin. Let the tract contain also the words of Thomas Jefferson's inaugural address on this subject; also the first article of the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"Moreover, it seems to me that it would be a good plan to get up an immense petition to congress, asking that these unconstitutional laws be repealed, setting forth in the clearest manner possible the reasons for such repeal, and then send a committee of our ablest and most eloquent speakers to Washington to present the petition to the national legislature.

"In getting signatures to this petition, as well as in the wording thereof, great caution would be necessary. My idea would be to get a Baptist preacher to present the petition to Baptists. This preacher—especially if heretical or progressive in his theology—could and would say that the Baptists as a denomination of Christians have always been in favor of free speech, and could call upon his hearers to be true to the principles and traditions of their sect in the present case. Get a progressive Methodist to present the petition to Methodists, and so of the other Christian sects.

"I don't mean that we should follow this plan all the time and everywhere, but simply work it for all it is worth. Moreover, in popular elections, why not use our ballots to defeat those candidates who will not pledge themselves to work for the repeal of the postal inquisition.

"I think we ought to include in the petition a demand for the right of private companies to freely compete with the government in carrying the mail, and if our political masters refuse these demands, let us call a convention of all liberty-lovers in the United States and Canada, for the purpose of organizing a political movement to defeat all candidates who oppose the objects of our petition.

"Moreover, in this work, why not call upon friends of free speech throughout the world for help, since a victory for us in the United States would help the cause of mental and political freedom everywhere.

"I know an orthodox Methodist preacher who wants the mail carried by a private company."

How do these views strike the readers of LUCIFER? M. H.

THE ETHICS OF LOVE IN FREEDOM.

"A CHILD OF LOVE," BY MARGARET GRANT.

"When we have a real desire for knowledge we shall learn how to love and how to go on loving through life."—Dora Forster.

For many weeks I have been hoping for leisure and strength to review carefully the book entitled "A Child of Love," briefly noticed in these columns several months ago, but which was never read by me with sufficient care to justify a review until quite recently. Having at length given the book a faithful, honest, careful perusal from the title page to the close, I feel justified in saying—as follows:

First, as a work of art, the story-teller's art, I feel myself quite incompetent to sit in judgment upon "A Child of Love." It takes a genius to understand a genius, saith the proverb, and likewise it takes an artist to rightly understand, appreciate and criticise a work of art. I am not an artist in any line, least of all, perhaps, in that of story-telling—the dramatic art. A good story must be true to nature, true to life, and must, therefore, make life and nature pass before the mind's eye as a dramatic performance on the stage.

Leaving, then, to others the task of saying whether Margaret Grant is a true artist, I pass to the less arduous one of ethical critic, that is, I wish to say how the book impresses me as a safe and helpful guide in solving the problem of "how to love and how to go on loving through life," as Dora Forster puts it.

Believing, as I do, with one of old that "Love is life's end—an end yet never ending; love's life's reward, rewarded in rewarding," I naturally expected much from Margaret's book, which I had been assured was written by a "natural child," as the actual experience of a girl or woman who came into life without permission of the "Supervisors if immigration"—the priests of theology and the magistrates of civil law, and who, consequently, was compelled to fight her way at every step against the combined forces of church-state moralists and of Grundyite "respectability."

Yes, I had expected much in the way of ideals, and, as all know, when much is expected we are very liable to meet disappointment, but for once this old rule does not hold good. Margaret Grant's book did not fall below expectation.

One of the most interesting features of the story, now that the "Island Empire of the Orient" has sprung into such prominence within the past year, is the account of Margaret's sojourn of two years among the Japanese, minutely describing the manners, customs and leading characteristics of that truly wonderful people. These descriptive views of life in Japan, we are assured, are not the work of the author's creative imagination, but the result of actual and intimate observation and experience.

Returning to America, after her two years of perilous adventure in Japan, Margaret finds herself penniless and friendless, a "hobo," so to speak, in the streets of New York. In her efforts to secure honorable employment in the great wicked city her experiences are scarcely less thrilling than those she had met with in the far East. As a temporary expedient she becomes a member of a commune consisting of three young men, each a genius in his way, with herself as fourth. As a natural result of this association all three of the young men become Margaret's devoted lovers. Then comes the crucial test of our heroine's principles—self-ownership of woman—love in freedom. She is strongly attracted to each, but to each in a different way. She greatly admires "Tim," the artist, and wants to help him to complete a painting that it was hoped would win fame for the artist and wealth for the commune. Tim needed a "model," but there was no money to hire one. Margaret's life among the Japanese had taught her there is nothing improper or immodest in nudity of the human form. She offers to "pose" for Tim. To this proposition "Jack," who most nearly fills Margaret's ideal, stoutly protests. The following conversation between these pivotal lovers shows how the matter was decided:

"Do you mean that if Tim were willing to disregard my opposition, you would pose for him?" Jack asked, regarding me steadily.

"Yes, Jack," I answered, "I would. You have every right to turn from me because of my opinions or my conduct, but I do not now and never shall admit your right to control me."

"And your love for me is not such that you would yield a point at my most earnest wish?"

"Jack," I said, anxiously, "if your love were of such a nature that it would permit you to ask me to sacrifice not only the happiness of your friend, but a deeply cherished principle of my life, I should have to say it was not the sort of love to sacrifice anything for."

"Nevertheless," he said, rising to his feet, "in this case, if I say you shall not pose, you will not?"

"If you say I shall not, I will," I answered, proudly, though the tears stood in my eyes and my voice trembled. "I will, if I can persuade Tim to let me."

Jack stood there before me for a time that seemed interminable, his eyes searching mine as if he would look down to the very depths of my soul; and I trembled under the stress of a fear beyond anything I had ever known before, or have known since. And the fear was not so much that I might lose him as that he might reveal himself smaller than the great soul I had believed him.

But I need not have feared. He made me happy afterward by telling me that his later questioning had been only for the purpose of bringing out what he was pleased to call "the greatness of my nature."

He opened his arms, and took me to his breast in such a way that there was no need for him to say anything; though I was glad enough to hear him say softly:

"What a brave, big-hearted, noble girl you are! I want you to pose, my PEGGY."

The remainder of the story tells how it is possible, even under our conventional customs and invasive laws, for woman to live true to her ideal of Love in Freedom, and of mental and economic independence.

"A Child of Love" is a large, well printed and bound book, large for the price, $1. It is published by Bernard McFadden, New York, and is for sale at this office.

To those who have ordered and not received the "Truth Seeker"—Bradford, England, will say we again have a good supply of the two quarterly issues, dated respectively, January, February and March, and April, May and June, which issues will be sent to any address postpaid for five cents each in stamps.

As travels this earth, her eye on a sun, through heavenly spaces;
Radiant in azure, or, storm-clad, swallowed in tempest,
Altering not, faltering not; traveling equal, sun-lit, or cloud-girt,
So thou, son of earth, who hast time, goal and force, go still onward. —Translated by Thomas Carlyle from Voss.

THE POSTAL INQUISITION ATTACKS DR. STOCKHAM.

The following paragraphs, taken from the Chicago "American," Sunday, May 21, are self-explanatory:

Dr. Alice B. Stockham, seventy years old, clubwoman, lecturer and head of the Stockham Publishing Company, 70 Dearborn street, is under indictment by the federal grand jury on the charge of sending prohibited matter through the mails. The firm makes a specialty of publications on marriage. Mrs. Stockham formerly lived in Evanston, and a street in that suburb is named after her.

Accompanied by her manager, Edward B. Beckwith, who was also indicted, and by Attorney Clarence S. Darrow, the white-haired clubwoman appeared before Deputy Clerk C. A. Buell and furnished a cash bond for $1,000. Her hearing will be before Judge Bethea to-morrow morning.

POSTAL INSPECTOR ACTS.

The complaint in the case was sworn to by Postoffice Inspector McAfee, who named her monograph called "The Wedding Night" as one that came under the ban.

"I have had legal advice at every step," said Dr. Stockham, "and am not alarmed at the charges which the Rev. Dr. McAfee has filed.

"My books deal with the sex problem, I am frank to say, but neither their matter nor their style has ever brought a word of censure heretofore. Count Tolstoi, whom I met in Russia in 1883, approved of them, and has subsequently had them translated into Russian for circulation in his own country.

"This monograph has never gone through the mails as literature. Whenever I have sent it out it has always been as a typewritten personal letter containing medical advice. It has been just as pure, just as legitimate, as any of the thousands of letters which other women doctors have had to write to their women patients.

WARNED OF PROCEEDINGS.

"Dr. McAfee came to me in April and said that he was going to start these proceedings and I told him to go ahead if he felt it his duty. I have been a publisher for twenty years and have deliberately devoted myself to this from the conviction that it must be done. Thousands of women, and men, too, have assured me that my books were among the things that counted for righteousness.

"In education we have handicraft, bookcraft and statecraft. Why not enlarge life's curricula to include marriagecraft and babycraft? Wise men and women have said 'amen' to me."

It is understood that Dr. Stockham and Mr. Beckwith will be arraigned to-day—May 22—will plead "not guilty" and will be given time to prepare for defense. It is probable that the inspector of mails will wish, before the Stockham-Beckwith case is settled, that he had chosen some victim less known, and less popular, as the object of his inquisitorial attentions.

THE MAY ARENA.

Prominent among the articles that will be regarded as characteristic of this prince of monthly magazines are "Japan as Viewed by a Native Socialist," by Kuchi Kaneka; the "Freeman's Ballot," by Rudolph Blankenburg; the "Referendum in Switzerland," by Prof. Charles Burgeaud; "The Kansas State Refinery," by Philip Eastman.

Among editorials, one of the most noteworthy is a comment upon "Prof. Giddings' Defense of Divorce." Prof. Franklin H. Giddings is the present occupant of the chair of sociology in Columbia university, hence his opinions will have great weight with those who depend much upon authority for their standards of morality. As illustrative of these opinions, Editor Flower selects the following among other significant paragraphs:

"The marriage relation is now the only social relation remaining in which a mistake once made is regarded by large numbers of serious-minded persons as irremediable." . . .

"The most unwarranted assumption that the opponents of divorce are making, and always have made, is that the alternative of divorce is an actual life-long monogamy. Any man at all familiar with social conditions ought to know that this assumption will not bear examination. In the evolution of marriage, all possible relations of the sexes, including polyandry and polygamy, have been tried, and we are in the habit of congratulating ourselves that the Christian world has arrived at monogamy. What it has actually arrived at is a nominal monogamy, which too often, in reality, is a clandestine polygamy. . . . The opponents of divorce are opposing progress. Human nature being what it is at present, they will not make the world monogamous by refusing redress of domestic grievances. They will merely keep it a while longer in the stage of clandestine polygamy." . . .

"It is true that divorces are more numerous in the United States in proportion to population than they are in other countries. But it will not do to assume that the American people are, therefore, more immoral in sexual matters than are the people of other lands. The exact contrary may turn out to be the truth, and my own opinion is that such is, indeed, the fact. I believe that a really serious investigation of the subject would show that one of the chief causes of the high rate of divorce in the United States is to be found in the high standard of decency, intelligence, and high-spirited character maintained by American women. To be explicit, I mean that American women will not put up with immoral or brutal conduct on the part of their husbands that the women of other lands, willingly or unwillingly, endure, and that, I fear, the Christian church in other lands has more than once, in its horror of divorce, winked at and condoned." . . .

Upon these utterances of Prof. Giddings, Editor Flower comments in part as follows:

"The shallow emotionalists never seem to reflect that there are things far worse than divorce—things that are incomparably more evil in their influence on the life of the rising generation and the society of to-morrow; and it is to escape such evils that the great majority of those who seek divorce ask for it only after conditions have become unbearable without a sacrifice of self-respect and degradation of spirit. One of these things is enforced parenthood when it means cursing the future by bringing into the world children of drunken fathers or those so diseased that they are destined to transmit the seeds of terrible maladies to the unborn. Another is the evil condition which compels a woman to live with a man after his cruelty has made life a hideous nightmare, or the enforced maternity after love is turned to loathing, and the rearing of children in homes of hate. These things are incomparably worse than divorce—worse for the present generation, and indescribably worse for the generation of to-morrow."

This article was prepared for number 1,039, and seems a little untimely coming so near the end of the month, but the Arena is never out of date, and especially is this true of its editorials. Few, if any, writers of this generation have a better record than has B. O. Flower.—M. H.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Full name and address of writers in this department can generally be obtained on application to the editor.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

Mrs. Joel Turney, Iowa.—"Enclosed find $2. Send me Karezza, $1; Hilda's Home, 50c, paper cover; from the balance deduct what I owe on subscription; what is left, take as a present. Don't send LUCIFER till ordered, as I shall be gone for a time. Wishing you success in your coming trial."

Dr. E. S. Tebbetts, Rockford, Ill.—"Your friend, C. D. Colby, says you are up against our eminently safe, sane and conservative postoffice department; so be pleased to know that I pay for this subscription with my own money. I know nothing about your periodical, but I wish to rap the postoffice a trifle every chance possible."

George Strelitz, Milwaukee, Wis.—"I beg you to send me a copy of that 'radical drama,' by the author of the stinging blow dealt to Roosevelt's silly talk about 'race suicide.' Lady Florence Dixie must be a sensible and clear-headed woman. It does one good, Mr. Harman, to hear from London such opinions as hers, because from reading the London dispatches in our American Sunday papers one gets the impression that the people of England consist of Philistines or criminals, largely. Is it not significant, as showing the standard of 'civilized' human beings, that the press has sunk into servitude to mobs with money, or mobs without money, while papers that are independent, and therefore invaluable, are being persecuted? . . . Hoping your trouble will result in nothing serious."

Ida J. M. Savage, Cleveland, O.—"Place me on the list for a regular. Persecutions—that's the word—and while I think this will never amount to anything more than a mere threat, it's well to be on the defensive. Will forward you money soon. Every mite helps. The wave of freedom is growing. It has many phases. LUCIFER leads."

J. W. Gott, 2 Union Street, Bradford, England.—"Will take two copies of each of your issues for 1905, up to the present. Send the balance in copies of 'Sex Radicalism,' paper covers, for —all different—of LUCIFER as you can make up, unbound preferred. These are for my own library. Of course, you will charge the wholesale price. I will remit at once on receipt of your invoice. I hope you have got the legal difficulties settled. Am sure you will have the sympathy of all real Free-thinkers. Whatever unfair treatment you have to bear will only add to the strength of the movement and give you renewed vigor to continue the fight."

V. Rejach, 220 E. 28th St., New York City—"I am very well pleased to receive your valuable paper as a substitute for 'Free Society,' and hope that the majority of the old readers of 'F. S.' will be paying readers of LUCIFER—as there is really great need of enlightenment in regard to New Malthusianism that is making such progress in advanced circles of Europe. Hope to be able to forward my subscription soon."

Peter Johnson, Murray, Utah—"Enclosed find 50 cents, for which send me the leaflet by Comrade Wentworth, 'Significance of Divorce.'"

[For fifty cents we send one hundred copies of "Significance of Divorce," or fifty copies of the Wentworth leaflet and fifty of "Love's Protest," the reply of Lady Florence Dixie to President Roosevelt, the supply of the first named leaflet running somewhat low.—M. H.]

E. E. Keeler, M. D., 468 S. Saline St., Syracuse, N. Y.—"Dear Friend: In some way I missed 'Sex Radicalism,' and enclose 25 cents in stamps for same. As president of the International Health League, I have taken pleasure in telling our members that it is 'the duty of every child to be well born, and that no child is well born who is not wanted.' That may be treason, but thus far Saint Anthony has kept his hands off. My turn may come next, however. Any 'thinking' physician knows that your views are correct. The others want work and encourage quantity without regard to quality. When the people learn of the laws of reproduction, a new era will dawn. Yours for health and truth."

C. V. Cook, 1179 Howard St., San Francisco, Cal.—"Friend of Freedom: Enclosed find $2, for which please credit my subscription $1, and for the other send LUCIFER to B. R—, 26 Hayes street, for one year. . . . Keep the old name, the new frequency of issue and the usual mode of thought. Let every subscriber try to furnish a new one for the fold each year; by so doing he will have helped LUCIFER, but better still, he will have helped improve the world. Hurrah for Hulda Potter Loomis! Her articles were excellent. Dora Forster's 'Sex Radicalism' is unexcelled by anything appearing in LUCIFER of late. Yours for liberty and progress."

A Friend: "A correspondent in Buenos Ayres, Argentine Republic writes: 'Finest country on earth. Oranges grow wild; no cultivation needed; one could not starve if he tried. Natives very kind and hospitable. The medium class or country people are considerably on the free love order; will not sell their bodies, love being the only incentive for sex indulgence. Babies are born outside of marriage because they are wanted. So common are these occurrences that nothing is said or thought of it as unusual or improper.'"

Frank L. Poland, Kirksville, Mo.—"I enclose two dollars and ask you to send LUCIFER six months to Prof. N. H. O., and send as long as you can afford, for the money, to the following twelve names. I ask you to send also to each of these names a copy of 'Significance of Divorce,' by Franklin Wentworth, believing it would do much good. . . . Hoping to be able to aid your defense fund, after a time, I am yours sincerely."

Later: "For the enclosed $2, please send a copy of 'Borning Better Babies' to each of the enclosed eight names. Also send sample copies of next issue to each of the twelves names as follow, and send to my address ten copies for missionery work."

Mabel McCoy Irwin, 14 W. 104th St., May 3, 1905.—"My Dear Mr. Harman: I am mailing you to-day for inspection and review, if you so please, my book on Whitman, the Poet-Liberator of Woman, with the hope that it will meet with your approval, and that you may be the means of helping me to dispose of the small edition, through what you may say of its merits. As you will see, it is finely gotten up, each copy numbered and signed by the author, and judging from the advance orders, the indication is that it will meet with ready sale if properly called to the attention of thinking people. I feel sure that in it I have done a work for Whitman in relation to things of sex, and of woman, that has not before been attempted, or, at least, accomplished, and I believe, as Maynard, of Small, Maynard & Co., wrote me, that 'it is capable of doing immense good.'

"I am aware of your difficulties with the postal authorities, and as secretary of the New York Free Speech League—recently appointed—I may be able to help somewhat in this case. Of course, I understand it is not necessary to stand for the things written in your paper or elsewhere that bring about these clashes with the authorities; but, believing as I do that that which is error is self-destructive, I want everyone to have the right to openly advocate that for which, in his or her estimation, makes for the betterment of humanity.

"Perhaps you will remember that I called upon you and your daughter, Lillian, some four years ago while visiting your city, and you may also remember the little pamphlet, 'The Right of the Child to be Well Born,' which I wrote some years ago, published by Caldwell. At any rate, I want you to find the time to read my Whitman book, and see what you can do to help its sale. With kindest regards to Lillian and yourself, I remain, in sincerity, yours."

[A review of the book referred to in this letter will probably appear in No. 1041. Press of other work has prevented its appearance in this issue.—M. H.]

Alice B. Stockham, M. D., 1388 Washington boulevard, Chicago.—"Please order for me 'Eilabelle,' by Florence Dixie, and charge to account of Stockham Publishing Co. . . . LUCIFER is always full of fire."

Maude Roberts, Michigan—"I am very much interested in LUCIFER and all other publications taking active part in the promulgation of sociological thought. I am where I do not come in touch with the people who would be helpful, and realizing the power of environment, I would like to get in different surroundings. Being obliged to earn a living, I could not come and be in Chicago, for instance, without having some employment. I would be willing to begin on a small allowance for the sake of being in touch with the line of work most interesting to me. Through your business friends or your own office, could you furnish a job? Could you suggest any situation?

"I have a lameness, caused from rheumatism, which makes it impossible for me to do all kinds of work, but I have worked in an office; I can do any kind of writing or bookkeeping. After adjusting the means of support, I might be of some value in a literary way. Any help or suggestion would be of greatest value to one who desires to extricate herself from an unhealthful and non-progressive environment. Yours for assistance."

[Maude Roberts has written an article for LUCIFER that shows very considerable literary ability. Her penmanship is superior, her spelling nearly perfect, and from all indications she would be a valuable assistant in many offices in this city, or any other city. Any letters directed to her in care of this office will be duly forwarded.—M. H.]

Agnes Benham, Adelaide, South Australia—"Enclosed find money order for four shillings sixpence, one year's subscription to LUCIFER for Mr. Schnabel, an old subscriber. I add another dollar for an additional six copies of 'Sex Radicalism.' . . . I enclosed a bill for 19 shillings in last letter for the copies of 'Perfect Humanhood' that I sent to your order, but you needn't send the money; keep it for the cause. I wish I could send more. Perhaps I may be able to do so bye-and-bye. . . .

"Do you 'rejoice,' and are you 'exceeding glad' that you are likely to be 'found worthy to suffer' once more at the hands of ignorant and brutish persecutors? It may be so. You must, indeed, be upborne continually by the intensest spirit of single-hearted devotion, but your friends, and the friends of freedom everywhere, can feel nothing but blazing indignation at the way in which you are invidiously marked out for persecution. Why should you be the target? If these things must be, let others take their share.

In case you are incarcerated, what of your correspondence? Does it go to Lillian? [Yes, unless otherwise directed.] Please continue the advertisement of 'Perfect Humanhood' in LUCIFER. Make it permanent and let me know cost of same."

WANTED: By a mentally free man, to correspond with a good woman who is not satisfied with her present environments. Address Co-operator, Box. 922, Cripple Creek, Colo.

WOMAN AND HER RELATION TO THE CHURCH OR CANON LAW FOR WOMEN. Harriet M. Closs. A succinct statement of the position to which women were doomed by the Church Fathers and authorities. Every woman should possess a copy. 10c.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A Primer of Sexual Rationalism. Edwin C. Walker. "Let us cease to be ashamed of what makes us men, of what makes us women, of what gives us the kisses of lovers and the encircling arms of babes." Paper covers; 42 large pages. 10c.

THE ORIGIN OF THE FAMILY, PRIVATE PROPERTY AND THE STATE. Frederick Engels. Chapter titles: Prehistoric Stages; The Family; The Iroquois Gens; The Grecian Gens; Origin of the Attic State; Gens and State in Rome; The Gens Among Celts and Germans; The Rise of the State Among Germans. 217 pages; bound in cloth. 40c. Postage, 5c.

MARRIAGE IN FREE SOCIETY. Edward Carpenter. One of the best short works on the subject. Daintily printed. A charming little gift book. "Love is doubtless the last and most difficult lesson that humanity has to learn; in a sense it underlies all the others. Perhaps the time has come for the modern nations when, ceasing to be children, they may even try to learn it." 25c.

TOKOLOGY. A book for every woman. By Alice B. Stockham, M. D. Illustrated. Tokology teaches possible painless pregnancy and parturition, giving full, plain directions for the care of a woman before and after confinement. The ailments of pregnancy can be prevented as well as the pains and dangers of childbirth avoided, and women need not go down to death giving birth to children. English, German or Swedish. $2.25.

HILDA'S HOME; A Story of Woman's Emancipation. Rosa Graul. With Macaulay, Rosa Graul would say, "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman will be less loving and lovable, or that man will be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish. 426 pages. Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

THE NEW HEDONISM. Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old asceticism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new Hedonism says: 'Be happy and you will be virtuous.' In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediæval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproducing function." Paper covers; 36 large pages; twelve copies, 50c; single copy, 5c.

VICE: ITS FRIENDS AND ITS FOES. Edwin C. Walker. Contents: Brotherhood of Man; The Recognition of Facts; Folly of "For Men Only"; Definition of Vice; Horrors of Prostitution; Abnormal Sexuality; Errors of Fathers, Mothers and Teachers; Persecution Does Not Reform; Prostitution and the Crusaders; The "Spoiling of the Heathen"; What Are the Effects of Raids and Crusades? The Economic Side of the Problem; Party Politics in Vice Crusading; In What Does Prostitution Consist? Some Causes of Prostitution; Two Kinds of Prostitution Compared; The Opponents of Divorce; "Purifying" the Tenements; Action for Advanced Women. With appendix: The Wanderings of a Spirit; Our Fair Civilization, the Folly and Cruelty of It All. 15c.

OUR WORSHIP OF PRIMITIVE SOCIAL QUEERSHIP. E. C. Walker. Contents: Love and Law; The Moloch of the Monogamic Ideal; The Continuity of Race-Life, and Tyranny; Food and Sex Fallacies, a Criticism; When Men and Women Are and When They Are Not Varietists; The New Woman; What Is She? What Will She Be? The State Hiding Behind Its Own Mistakes; Bishop Potter's Opinion of Divorce; Love; Its Attraction and Expression; Is She an Honest Girl? Lloyd, Platt and the Pitiful Facts; Social Radicals and Parentage; Anthropology and Monogamy Love and Trust Versus Fear; Reflections upon Reading William Platt's "Women, Love, and Life." 15c.

LOVE'S COMING OF AGE. Edward Carpenter. This is a book with which few will wholly agree, but which nearly every one can read with profit and enjoyment. The subject is the relation of the sexes in the past, present and future, and it is treated with absolute frankness and fearlessness by a writer who unites a broad outlook, a strong grasp of his subject and a charming literary style. The following table of contents will indicate the line of thought followed by the author: The Sex Passion; Man, the Ungrown; Woman, the Serf; Woman in Freedom; Marriage, a Retrospect; Marriage, a Forecast; The Free Society; Some Remarks on the Early Star and Sex Worships. Notes on the Primitive Group Marriage; Jealousy; The Family; Preventive Checks to Population. The book is printed on extra book paper and handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

KAREZZA. Ethics of Marriage. Alice B. Stockham, M. D., author of Tokology. Karezza gives a high ideal to parental functions and pleads for justice to the unborn child. Karezza is really a supplement to Tokology and elucidates a theory of marital relations, which leads to individual growth and a closer bond of union, the practice of which at all times gives complete control of the fecundating power. Karezza controverts the prevailing ideas of baseness and degradation associated with the sexual nature, makes a plea for a better birthright for the child, for a controlled and designed maternity and aims to lead individuals to a higher development of themselves, through a knowledge of their creative powers. Karezza is the product of knowledge and experience, and is presented to the world with a deep abiding faith, that its teachings will lead individuals to purer lives, to right understanding and appreciation of the sex functions, to intelligent control of propagation and finally through right adjustment to most sacred relations, to the ideal marriage. Levant cloth, prepaid, $1.

SOME "SOUND VIEWS" ON SEX.

A Remarkable Symposium on this important subject is one of the interesting features of that fearless Puget Sound magazine, SOUNDVIEW.

Exponent of the Society of Evergreens, composed of men not afraid-of-an-idea (and women).

Among the contributors to this series of sex articles are Drs. Grear, Conger Hanish, Berrier, Rullison; J. Wm. Lloyd, William L. Garver, Nancy McKay Gordon, Lois Waisbrooker, Elmer Ellsworth Carey, Dora Forster, Harry Gaze, James F. Morton, Jr., Mae Lawson, Herself—Ahem! And the Boss and Embossed Evergreen may have a few things to say—and many others of equal ability and familiarity with the subject.

Most of these men and women are writers of national reputation and authors of some of the most helpful books in the English language. Some of them need no introduction to LUCIFER readers, who cannot afford to miss a single issue containing this series, which opened in the January number with a powerful article by Dr. Leroy Berrier.

But this is not all. The articles of Judge Frank T. Reid, the distinguished single-tax advocate and associate editor, are attracting the attention of thinkers all over the country.

And—oh, pshaw, we can't tell you the half! Just dig up a dollar bill and send for a year's subscription to the only magazine in the world Pencilled, Printed, Proof-read, Published, Pasted and Posted amid the wildwood (a copy of "Wildwood Philosophy," a cloth-bound book, given FREE as long as they last). If you don't say it is the Prettiest, Spliciest specimen of magazinehood you ever saw, we'll refund your money.

Here is what the well-known writer and lecturer, James F. Morton, Jr., thinks of SOUNDVIEW: "Puget Sound at last has a monthly adequately representative of progressive thought. It is frank and fearless, refined and vigorous, witty and eloquent."

THE RIGHT TO BE BORN WELL.

In the Chicago "Evening American" of June 1, under the head, "How a Child May Be Well Born, Even Though the Law Denies It a Name," Ella Wheeler Wilcox has this to say:

"The generally accepted idea of a legitimate child is one born in wedlock. According to the usage of words, it does suffice to legitimize a child when a marriage ceremony has taken place between the father and mother.

"But in the higher court of Nature something more is required. That something is love between the parents, especially love in the mother's heart for the father of her child.

"That is the only excuse for conception.

"The mother who carries through the long prenatal months a child of a man she does not love, and whose caresses are hateful to her, sins against the Holy Ghost, and bears an illegitimate child, no matter if all the clergymen and priests and all the lawmakers of the land have pronounced them husband and wife.

"Abnormal, diseased, idiotic, insane and half-developed children are frequently found born in wedlock; they are rarely found born out of wedlock.

LOVELESS WEDLOCK.

"This is explainable through the fact that women frequently marry for other causes than love. Ambition, indolence and avarice lead more brides to the altar in modern society than love. They are not actuated by the wifely or the maternal impulses.

"They are not even stirred by nature's sex impulse—that impulse which brings so few imperfect animals, insects, birds and plants into existence.

"They simply endure wifehood and motherhood as the price they pay for the pride and privilege of occupying the social and financial position coveted.

"The children of such women are legally legitimate—morally illegitimate.

"The child of the woman who forgot self protection and self-respect in her mad love for some man and abandoned herself to him is legally illegitimate, but in nature's court is legitimized by the divine seal of love.

"Nevertheless, until the human race reaches a higher state of development, the law cannot place its children so born on the same footing with those born in wedlock without jeopardizing the interests of society.

JUSTICE BALANCED.

"Unless society could know that no woman would fall from her high estate of chastity, save through an overwhelming love, it would be disastrous to the good and loving wives and willing mothers to place no legal barrier between the children born in and out of wedlock.

"Such a precedent would invite lawlessness and encourage license.

"The child born out of wedlock must suffer the ban of the law, but it is often repaid by a dower of qualities which render it physically, mentally and morally a superior type of humanity.

"The child of married parents, however loveless the union, must be allowed the sanction of society and the courts, but it suffers through a long life with an incomplete and unfortunate inheritance, because its conception violated God's primal law.

"And so, after all, the balance of eternal justice is maintained in this as in many other matters which on the surface seem unfair and unjust to the casual observer."

While thoroughly in accord with most that Ella Wheeler Wilcox says on the subject of love and parentage, I would like to ask how "the balance of eternal justice is maintained" when the child of love suffers under the ban of social ostracism and the child of indifference or of hate, born in wedlock, suffers because of physical, mental and moral inferiority.

I would like, also, to ask what is meant by "society" in the paragraph wherein Ella says that to put the children of legal marriage on the same footing with those born out of wedlock, but "with the divine seal of love," would "jeopardize the interests of society."

If she means that it would jeopardize the interests of the ruling classes, those who live by robbing others, then she is quite right. Freedom in love—freedom of motherhood regardless of the legal license to love and to give birth to welcome children, would soon result in a race so well born that the governing classes would find themselves out of a job, and would have to go to work and earn their living at some really useful occupation.

But just wherein the non-ruling masses, the ruled and robbed masses, would be injured by absolute freedom—intelligently guided freedom—in the love relation, it would certainly be very difficult for Ella Wheeler Wilcox, or any one else, to show.

Likewise, I think it would be very difficult to show wherein "good and loving wives and willing mothers" would be injured if "the legal barrier between children born in and out of wedlock" were broken down.

Here is what a noted Swedish author, Ellen Key, has to say on the subject of "illegitimate" children:

Berlin, April 25.—Ellen Key, a Swedish authoress, has just closed a remarkable month's campaign in Berlin and other leading German cities in advocacy of her "Newer Ethics," or matrimonial reform. She has been talked about, written about, and gossiped about more than any other woman in years. Her photographs have sprung up magically in the magazines, illustrated papers, and shop windows, and postcard likenesses of her are hawked about the streets as if she were a royal personage.

Miss Key is 55 years old. Her "Newer Ethics," as far as they concern the married state, are founded upon two main ideas. She advocates, first of all, easier divorce for men and women who, after vowing to love, cherish, and obey, find that they drew a blank in the matrimonial lottery. She would make it not only possible, but absolutely legal, for married couples to divorce themselves by mere mutual agreement or by desire of either husband or wife.

She considers it criminal for human law to compel people to live together as man and wife who do not in their hearts cherish the fullest affection and trust for each other. "Facilitate divorce" is her remedy for much of the world's marital unhappiness.

It was the second basic ideal of her theories that proved a genuine sensation in Berlin and throughout Germany, where the proportion of illegitimate births is so high. Miss Key says no child should be called "illegitimate." She says that if a man and woman care for their child it is a legitimate child and should not be compelled to go through life with a stigma. She pleaded eloquently that in the eyes of God "the children of love," the offspring of unmarried men and women, are not illegitimate and that the world has no right to call them such.

And here is what an exchange says about marital relations in Peru, and the result of freedom in love in the city of Yquitos:

"Yquitos, Peru, is the city where women marry on time only. They do so in other towns, but here it is the universal practice. Among the 15,000 people in Yquitos is only one regularly married couple, the German vice-consul and his wife. Yet folks live in peace in happiness, year in, year out, the city's newspapers contain not a line of scandal, lawyers are busy with property disputes only, and the police blotters record few crimes or offenses of violence. There are no shootings, poison mysteries, stabbing affrays, no parents crying for runaway daughters, no young men with love escapades to their credit or discredit.

"Sunny-faced children are everywhere about the houses, streets and public squares. They attend school regularly and enjoy the benefits of religious instruction. Of their mother and father they speak with love and respect, and, though never punished, the youngsters seem to compare favorably with the youth of our great American cities."—Louisville Courier Journal.

LETTER FROM DR. E. B. FOOTE, SR.

129 Lexington Avenue, New York, May 17, 1905.

My Dear Mr. Harman: I have read with interest your leading article in LUCIFER of May 11th, and especially your reply to Mr. R. B. Kerr. Indeed, it is hardly necessary for me, a firm believer in the effects of prenatal influence, to add a word. I will, however call Mr. Kerr's attention to the fact that all gravid women are liable to have their minds impressed with more than one prominent character who greatly interests them, thus producing in the unborn child a composite character, rather than one which bears a striking resemblance physically and mentally to some one prominent and greatly overworshiped individual. I would call the attention of those of your readers who may have my book entitled "Dr. Foote's Home Cyclopedia of Medical, Social, and Sexual Science" to page 1173, where this matter is explained, and if one would correctly understand my position on this subject, the whole chapter, commencing on page 1164 and ending with page 1177, should be impartially examined, and then I would commend to further attention your excellent reply to Mr. Kerr.

E. B. FOOTE.

WHAT'S THE MATTER WITH ROOSEVELT?

Editor LUCIFER: In LUCIFER 1039 appears a shrieking article from Lady Florence Dixie denouncing President Roosevelt for his attitude on the sex question, in terms not only voluble and incisive, but, from my point of view, essentially unjust. It is not my intention to enter into a defense of the President. He seems to be abundantly able to take care of himself; but this article is so closely in line with what has appeared in most reform papers that I am disposed to call the attention of these reformers who attack President Roosevelt to their own inconsistency. I have carefully read all of his utterances on the sex question that have come to my notice and I fail to see where he deserves the storm of criticism which has been poured upon his head by Lady Florence Dixie and the whole yelping pack of reform (?) writers who have been stirred into activity by some of his utterances.

Let us be fair and decent in the matter. I challenge Lady Dixie or any other reformer to show where President Roosevelt has advocated the enforced enslavement of women or the yielding of her person to the unbridled lust of any husband or to the production of unwelcome offspring or to the maintenance of conditions which will produce paupers or criminals or diseased offspring. What he has advocated is that both men and women should desire children and plenty of them, and that these children should be of the very highest quality.

President Roosevelt is the only man who has occupied the office of chief executive who has dared to project the sex question into public discussion and into the deliberations of Congress. His action has been inspired by the most intense desire for the welfare of the nation over which he has been called to preside. He has spoken boldly, courageously and forcibly upon the great question of sex reform and by so doing has created an interest in the subject for which LUCIFER has fought its many battles, fifty times more powerful than could have been created by any other man. I am surprised and disgusted at the attitude taken in response by nearly all sexual reformers, including Lady Dixie. The article published in LUCIFER 1039 is a tissue of misrepresentations of President Roosevelt's position, interlarded with trite statements of principles to which most reformers subscribe to give color to the misrepresentations. The animus of the article is clearly shown in the closing paragraph when she commands President Roosevelt to stop talking to the women. Probably Lady Dixie is an advocate of free speech—for Lady Dixie and people who speak and write to her liking.

What matters it that President Roosevelt advocates the ideal of marriage that is practiced according to holy writ? If it suits him, he has a right to eulogize it. The fact remains that he has done sex reform an incalculable service by vigorously leading a discussion of it. What matters it that he is the autocratic head of a plutocratic government? So much the better. It shows the leaven is working and that sex reform is making even the people high in orthodox places think.

When a man does a great public service, it behooves all persons to listen to him with respect and to discuss his positions with fairness and without passion or misrepresentation. While I may differ with the President on matters of politics and religion, I am willing to give him his due when he does right. When he advocates a fruitful family, a home ideal of love and devotion; when he calls divorce a hideous evil, as it undoubtedly is, although it may have its source in a worse evil; when he demands of the nation the production of numerous children of high quality, he is right.

There are some sex reformers who seem to think that the highest ideal of happiness is a combination of a divorce, a contracept, a childless home, and that home in a flat, with frequent changes of partners. I am willing they should have the privilege to do as they please and I will probably follow my own ideal, which accords substantially with that of the President.

"What's the matter with Roosevelt?" He's all right, according to his own ideals and education. He is doing the best he can for sex reform. Let's all turn in and do the same, and stop blatherskiting.

WILLIAM WINDSOR.

IN ANSWER TO "JUNE BRIDE."

To Editor Woman's Department: "June Bride" states that she enjoys dancing. Previous to her marriage her husband attended dances with her. Now he will not, because he can't bear to have her dancing with other men. Both are to be slightly pitied. "June Bride's" husband, I fear, is tinctured with the old idea that his bride is his property; that his sole possession of her is a right to be considered before her happiness.

The condition of women for hundreds of years has been that she should in all things submit to the authority of her "lord and master." The woman was owned, body and soul, and ministered solely to the physical wants of man. History and tradition have always tried to establish woman's inferiority. She did not even begin with an independent existence, being created man's "help meet" from one of his ribs. Brought up for the man, she must live for the man. She is taken by the man, supported by the man, put under great obligations to the man, made the ward of the man, punished by the man and forsaken by the man. Men have made the rights; men have made the duties; men have made the laws, and women have been taught to accept them as a matter of course.

The old idea was that woman is a household plant, a vegetating stay-at-home, with no thought or interests outside the home. Demosthenes said: "The woman is an instrument for the procreation of legitimate children and the management of the household." Thucydides wrote: "Those wives deserve the highest praise of whom neither good nor bad is spoken, outside of the home." Diogenes called woman "a necessary evil."

No intelligent person agrees with these ideas of the ancient philosophers, and the fact is obvious that women are becoming economically more independent of men, entering the field of industry to an extent never dreamed of before. Women are, as a result, broader minded and less inclined to be submissive. Women have become producers. The great industrial development in which she participates to a certain extent has given her ideas of freedom, independent thought and action which in a less enlightened age she would never have dared to even think of. Women are learning to depend on themselves and the divorce figures go to show this.

I suggest that "June Bride" tell her husband of these things. If they would be happy, they must eliminate that feeling of ownership, and, while enjoying the social dance and conversing with others, there will grow up between them a greater love and trust.

"SEXUAL LOVE: WHAT IT IS AND WHAT IT ISN'T."

From Truth Seeker Co., Bradford, England, comes "Sexual Love—What It Is and What It Isn't," by Allen Laidlaw. Chapter headings are these:

I, Fallacies; II, Somatic Dreams; III, Perversions; IV, Sensual Necessaries; V, The Idealization of Lust; VI, The Sacredness of Love; VII, Female Emancipation; VIII, Real Altruism; IX, Equality of the Sexes in Love; X, Purity.

"Let us henceforth consider it a bitter shame to persecute any woman because she has a lover or a child. Let every woman's pride be not in betraying, but in protecting her own sex. . . . At the root of all sexual reform lies the essential no degradation for the female soul."

THE POET LIBERATOR OF WOMEN.

"Whitman, the Poet Liberator of Women," is the title of a dainty little book written by Mabel McCoy Irwin. The volume is handsomely bound in cloth, with an original cover design, and the typography is unusually good. The frontispiece is an artistic drawing of Whitman's face from the well-known Lear portrait.

The book is well written, and in chaste but frank language tells of Whitman's recognition of woman as a factor of immeasurable importance in the world's progress. Quotations from his poems are freely given and their significance pointed out. Only 500 copies of the book were printed, and the author, whose address is 34 West 104th street, New York City, still has a few copies for sale. Following is the brief closing chapter of the interesting little book:

"And ages hence—when woman's sex bondage is as a dream forgotten, when she stands regnant by divine right—the self-elected mother of a new race—she shall remember with deepest gratitude the name of him who called to her while she was yet asleep, who sang for her while she was yet in chains, and whose songs did more to set her free than all the songs that were ever sung—the name of Walt Whitman."

The price of this exceptionally fine book is not given, but presumably $1.25 would bring it.

THE "NEW" MOTHER-IN-LAW.

The following letter, written by a radical woman to a man who is in love with her daughter, and not intended for publication, will probably be of interest to many readers of this paper:

"David, Dear Dave: I have been thinking for some time of writing to you, if for no other reason than to become acquainted with my future son-in-law. Some way this Indiana indolence (note that euphonious alliteration) has a deleterious effect on one's mental machinery, especially the letter writing department, no matter how much in love he or she may be or how important the demand.

"Esther does not often show me your letters, although I dearly love to read love letters, even when written to other girls, and I know you write most charming ones. But the last one she did show me and I am deeply touched by your suffering.

"David, you are a lover after my own heart!—the old-fashioned, steadfast, intense lover who is constant to one through years of time, and separation, and distance. Even other loves dampen not its fervor. The lover who will plead and coax and urge and pursue almost in spite of, or regardless of, response, is the real lover—the lover all women love. We have not outgrown the animal or savage instinct that impels the male to pursue, the female to evade by flight, or feigned (or real) resistance, and both enjoy it. I am not sure it is best that we should outgrow it, or that we have any reason to be proud of the men and women who boast of having evolved out of that instinct.

"The modern (free) lover who approves of 'female initiative,' who can always find comfort in 'the lips that are near,' who boasts of never allowing himself to suffer on account of love, is a cold-blooded beast, after all, and not an unalloyed improvement over the old.

"I always hoped that Esther would not love or marry a man who believes in the narrow, selfish ownership of a woman. I am also thankful she has escaped men of that type. How I wish I had—or had ever had—such a lover as you are! Would that heaven had made such a man for me! But then I would have spoiled it all by meeting him half way or further, and you would not give a fig for such a sweetheart, would you?

"You know how the boy chases a butterfly till it lies still, till one wing is broken; it can fly a little and he chases it until it lies still on the ground, then leaves it alone. Why if I had the good fortune to have such a sweetheart as you, I would fly to his arms whenever he said come. Financial difficulties would be nothing to me, nor family ties, nor clothes, nor any little mundane considerations. I would sit up nights—every night—and write the warmest, most passionate, rapturous letters. I would grieve over our separation—dream delightful dreams of our meeting. I would think only of his love, his caresses, the touch of his hands, the sweet embraces that mean a taste of heaven—that would be heaven! Those lips, those eyes!

"Well, just imagine Esther saying all that, and be happy! She means it all, but she is the modest, startled fawn, as it were, that must be pursued or you can't catch her.

"Now, seriously, my dear boy, you know I am very glad you are so much in love with my little girl. You know that I think (or know, rather), that you are the very best man living and just the right man in the right place. But I wish you could or would be contented to let Esther stay with us a little longer. You know she boarded in town for about four months and we saw almost nothing of her. We have been in town two months and it seems such a little taste of the all-together home life that we all enjoy so much. I expect to be away from home for about four weeks after the middle of June and I can't bear to let her go until after I come back. She likes to be with us, for she has been away from us all so much of her life that she has never had a chance to get tired of us or of her home. If she would stay here until September, I would then be willing for her to go.

"Of course, it is natural for a lover to be intolerant of any other claim than his own. You can't see why she should waste any affection on her father and mother and the best brother in the world. But just try for a little while to realize that there are others. There are we—her pa and ma and brother—who all love her as much as you do, and the aggregate of heartache will be greater if she leaves us now than if you wait and suffer a little longer.

"I would say more on this line, but I know what an avalanche of argument is likely to be let loose if you can get a foothold and once get started. (That is a mixed metaphor, isn't it? But you know what I mean).

"Esther doesn't know anything about this letter. Maybe she wouldn't let me send, if she did. She's pretty strict with me in most things. You may show her my letter, if you want to. Good-bye, my son. Be a good boy.

Lovingly,
"M. W. D."

I give the above letter without comment, but would be interested to know what other readers of LUCIFER think of it.

MILLBANK CHURCHILL.

WOMAN AND ECONOMICS.

Glancing at an old copy of LUCIFER (No. 1030), I find a short article by Flora McPhelps which in the main is excellent.

One proposition, however, strikes me as rather misleading. She says: "The only way for woman to maintain this right is by refraining from motherhood. For, barring this, woman is as free and independent as man." Now, if this is true in San Mateo, California, I want to go there to live! For in no place, from New York (my early home) to Washington, have I found a place where women were as free and independent as men. Woman's freedom, socially, is restricted by the ostracism of society. Indiscretions which are winked at or totally ignored in man are deemed sufficient cause for coldness and cruelty toward woman.

Then take the economic condition, which is most important of all, and see the disadvantages under which woman labors. Compare the wages paid in any kind of work. Women teachers receive from one-half to two-thirds the pay for the same work that is not so well done by man. Women clerks receive from $10 to $35 a month, while men in the same department receeive from $35 to $80 for the same work!

Then, too, who ever heard of a man receiving an insulting proposal from a proprietor to whom he applied for work? Yet this is a common occurrence among women. I have personal knowledge of many such cases. One case in point: A young lady applied for office work with a real estate dealer. He engaged her, but would offer only 50 cents a day until he could see what she could do. In less than half a day he began to take liberties with her. She objected, but he persisted. She managed to stave him off for two days, when he told her he would not have a girl in his office who would not let him fondle her! She left! But suppose she had had no home or friends to care for her; where would be her independence?

Another case: A girl applied for a clerkship in a dry goods store. The proprietor, a young married man, said, "Why, dear me! If I had you in the store, I'd get you behind a pile of blankets and love you to death! I'd eat you up!"

Now where was her chance for independence? You may say, "Let her apply elsewhere," but I tell you the "elsewhere" is all full. It is a common thing for a lady clerk to be called upon to grant such indulgence to her employer or one of the head clerks, or lose her job.

I know this to be a fact. How, then, can women be "free" or "independent"?

A change in our industrial system must precede any great advance on the part of woman toward personal liberty.

LUCIFER: ITS MEANING AND PURPOSE.

LUCIFER—The planet Venus; so called from its brightness.—Webster's Dictionary.

LUCIFEROUS—Giving light; affording light or the means of discovery.—Same.

LUCIFIC—Producing light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing, and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

CONGRESS SHALL MAKE NO LAW RESPECTING AN ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, OR PROHIBITING THE FREE EXERCISE THEREOF; OR ABRIDGING THE FREEDOM OF SPEECH, OR OF THE PRESS; OR THE RIGHT OF THE PEOPLE PEACEABLY TO ASSEMBLE, AND TO PETITION THE GOVERNMENT FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES.—First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The Chicago Society of Anthropology will take an outing at Downer's Grove, Cook county, June 18, 1905. It is proposed to meet at the Union depot, this city, at 10:45 a. m., and take the train together for Captain Parker's place in the suburb named. For further particulars address the Secretary, Dr. J. F. Lewis, 723 Carroll avenue.

ANOTHER CONTINUANCE.

Monday, June 5, '05.

After some time spent in waiting at the court room my friends and I were told that another short postponement had been decided upon—till Tuesday, June 13. This will give my attorneys a little more time for preparation. M. H.

DR. STOCKHAM'S CASE.

When I left the court room to read proof and get this edition of LUCIFER to press, Dr. Stockham's case had just been called and a jury impannelled. It is hoped that before our forms are closed we shall be able to report a triumphant victory for freedom, truth and justice, in the case of American inquisition against Dr. Alice B. Stockham and her business manager, Mr. Beckwith.

Later: The word comes that the jury found Dr. Stockham and Mr. Beckwith "guilty as charged in the indictment." Sentence not yet delivered. Whether appeal will be taken does not yet appear. These defendants and their friends, the world over, are well able to make it a "fight to a finish," and it is sincerely to be hoped they will do so. M. H.

A DOUBLE NUMBER.

It is now in contemplation to get out a 16-page edition of LUCIFER for June 22. This is to be done in part to relieve the terrible pressure for space. We have now in type nearly enough matter to fill two ordinary issues of the paper, with a long list of good articles filed for publication, but not yet put into type.

But the chief object of the proposed double number is to find room for a somewhat extended history of the doings of the Postal Inquisition, especially that part of said history that more intimately concerns LUCIFER. We have now in type about four columns of matter giving an account of the closing scene in the trial of LUCIFER's editor before Judge Foster in April 290,—fifteen years ago, including the Topeka "Journal's" report of the judge's talk to the prisoner, and a report of the prisoner's ten-minute talk to the judge—the "reminiscence" of which scene David Overmyer calls so vividly interesting.

If the matter can be got into proper shape it is proposed to call the next issue the Postal Inquisition number. The time seems quite suitable for such a number, now that the fight for free press is on in what seems a more determined manner and in more definite shape than it has been for some years past.

Four years ago we published an Anniversary double number celebrating the 21st birth month of our Son of the Morning. This was largely filled with history of the various battles which LUCIFER has passed through, with the Postal Inquisition as aggressor.

If possible for them to do so it is hoped that the same persons who helped to get up the matter for that anniversary number will help now in getting up a Postal Inquisition number, and if there are others who would like to lend a helping hand in this line the invitation is hereby extended to them also, only premising that it is to be hoped no one will feel hurt if their contributions should be declined for lack of room.

Once more only, on this head. Inasmuch as funds are needed to pay court expenses, as well as to defray the extra expense of the double number, it is proposed that the Postal Inquisition number be sold at ten cents each and that orders be sent in as soon as possible, stating how many copies each subscriber will take at that price, so that we may know how many extra copies to print, and bind, for they will have to be stitched together with wire. M. HARMAN.

THE FREE SPEECH LEAGUE.

Editor LUCIFER: Secretary Mrs. Irwin, having only recently come into the league, is mistaken as to its name. It is not "The New York Free Speech League"—simply "The Free Speech League." So far, at least, as America is concerned, it has no geographical limitations. It is a national, perhaps more correctly, an international, organization, welcoming co-operation in its work from all parts of the continent, as it does from all men and women, regardless of their differences on other issues, who stand for freedom of investigation and expression.

Now is an opportune moment—now, when the enemies of free utterance are so perniciously active—to say that the league needs hundreds, thousands, tens of thousands, of new members. The membership fee is only one dollar a year, and no case can be taken up and fought out before the bar of public opinion or in the courts unless we have the aggregate of many more annual dues than we have now.

Reader, will you not send your name and address and your dollar to the Treasurer of the Free Speech League, Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., 120 Lexington avenue, New York City?

I enclose copies of the League's "Declaration," its Constitution, and Objects, together with letters from well-known men, for which I hope the editor may find room soon.

EDWIN C. WALKER,
Chairman Executive Committee.

LUCIFER'S HELPERS.

In this list are credited all who send money on the Free Speech Defense Fund; all who send money to pay for trial subscriptions to LUCIFER as propaganda work; all who buy books for the same work, and all who send money or stamps to be used in sending out sample copies, or for the general publication fund.

L. Kausebaum, $1; P. L. Poland, $2; Fred Schulder, 25c; A. G. Lengberg, $1; Susan Reichertz, $1; Agnes Benham, $5; James F. Clark, $5; J. Al. Wilson, 25c; Henry Peckman, 25c; R. N. Douglas, $2; Mrs. M. A. Logue, $1; Cassius V. Cook, $1; Mrs. Joel Turner, $1; Thirza Rathbun, $1; John S. Barber, $5; T. J. Tanner, $1; Carl Nold, 25c; Frank D. Blue, 25c; Mrs. B. M., $10; W. W. Miller, 80c; A. Wastall, $5; O. B. S., $5; R. H. Walker, $1.50; J. B. Phinney, $2.50; O. H. Stone, $5; B. F. Odell, $1; Anna B. Fish, $1; B. W. W., $11; Bodh Raj Shah, $1; C. S. Haney, $1.

Once more sincerely thanking all our co-operators in this line of work, since last credit, we ask all who have not yet ordered books or papers to be used in educational work, to the amount of their cash contributions, to do so as soon as convenient. In this way the good results of their contributions will be cumulative.

SINEWS OF WAR AND THE CENSORSHIP.

The urgent need of an emergency fund will scarcely be questioned at this crisis. I am amazed that no attempt has been previously made in this direction. It is unfair to further add to our valiant champion's many burdens by neglecting his proper financial equipment. The needs of the present occasion may be already met; but if we let such an opportunity slip of applying any surplus to the foundation of a permanent fund, we shall surely rue it in the future.

I suggest, therefore, that the Free Speech League be asked to take over from us a fund, to be especially applied on LUCIFER's behalf, and to be spent at the request and discretion of its editor. Should some such an arrangement be arrived at, it would release the editor from work he has little time for, advertise the league, by the publication from time to time of the acount in LUCIFER, and have, I think, a salutary effect upon our oppressors in showing them our backing in all quarters of the globe. Apart from this the league would gain by subscriptions from LUCIFER readers, many of whom are, perhaps, in my own position, of knowing but quite recently of its existence.

In the event of such an agreement being arrived at, I, for one, will gladly duplicate, in the case of the Free Speech League, my donation of five dollars yearly to the emergency fund.

As to the heavy-handed action of the postal censors, and the editor's attitude toward same, as expressed in No. 1035, I think it both correct and dignified. Whitman reminds us that "the elementary laws never apologize." Wherefore should he then equivocate, prevaricate, excuse or retract?

No! And every one of us to whom truth and liberty mean aught will re-echo: And he shall be heard!

Our issue is really that of science against theologic ignorance and intolerance; for, in spite of all Comrade Lloyd says in his review of Dora Forster's booklet, l'ennemi c'est le clericalisme! It will be found, too, I think, that our laws, although originating in the Justinian code and consequently coming from the source claimed by Lloyd, have, nevertheless, been much modified and interpolated to express the desire of the priestcraft, who were for some time the only people of any instruction whatever—for church and state have long since gone hand in hand. The would-be thought-suppressors who are playing us such baby tricks are imbued, depend upon it, with ideas of the current theology.

And this being so, I would fain be allowed to quote from Professor Tyndall's famous Belfast address a passage which I deem appropriate:

"The impregnable position of science may be described in a few words. We claim, and we shall wrest from theology, the entire domain of cosmological theory. All schemes and systems which thus infringe upon the domain of science must, in so far as they do this, submit to its control and relinquish all thought of controlling it. Acting otherwise proved always disastrous in the past, and it is simply fatuous to-day. Every system which would escape the fate of an organism too rigid to adjust itself to its environment must be plastic to the extent that the growth of knowledge demands. When this truth has been thoroughly taken in, rigidity will be relaxed, exclusiveness diminished, things now deemed essential will be dropped, and elements now rejected will be assimilated. The lifting of the life is the essential point, and as long as dogmatism, fanaticism and intolerance are kept out, various modes of leverage may be employed to raise life to a higher level."

Is what connection does America stand now to the "land of the free" I should like to know? Much the same in many respects, perhaps as do the domains of the tottering Czar.

Are you in the United States of America going back to the methods of 1616? If so, a leaf might be cribbed from the books of the Holy Congregation of the Index and a decree issued at Chicago on these lines:

"And whereas it hath also come to the knowledge of the said postal censorship that the false Dora Forster doctrine of freedom in the sexual relations, entirely opposed to Mother Grundy, which is taught by Moses Harman, is now published abroad and received by many: In order that this opinion may not further spread, to the damage of damphoolishness, it is ordered that this, and all other books teaching the like doctrine, be suspended, and by this decree they are all respectively suspended, forbidden and condemned."

To insure their taking equally strong measures in this case, it should be pointed out to the dear censors that the doctrines of Pythagoras and Copernicus (the mobility of the earth, and immobility of the sun) were not one whit less pernicious than those of the two before cited individuals.

ARTHUR WASTALL.
East London, South Africa, April 25, 1905.

PRELIMINARY SKIRMISHING.

As stated in last LUCIFER I was arraigned three weeks ago before the U. S. District Court in Chicago, and when told to plead "guilty or not guilty" I pleaded not guilty of sending "obscene" literature through the mails. Answering the court's order I appeared with my attorney, Mr. Darrow, June 2nd, when a further continuance was granted, but only to June 5th. On account of previous business engagements Mr. Darrow urged that more time be allowed for preparation; his request was denied.

Returning to his law office Mr. Darrow on consultation advised the employment of other counsel to take the main management of the case, saying he would freely assist with his advice, also with his money, if necessary. In answer to the question as to who he preferred as helper in the case he named Steadman and Soelke, well known attorneys of this city. Seymour Steadman stands high as a leader in reform politics—as a Socialist—sometimes called a Social Democrat, holding very similar views to those held by Mr. Darrow. It is needless to say that both these men, as well as Mr. Soelke, are in full accord with the opponents of the postal censorship.

At Mr. Steadman's suggestion he and I went to the Federal building to see if the District Attorney would not consent to a further postponement of the trial; his reasons therefor being similar to those of Mr. Darrow. I did not hear the arguments used but the result was the same—a refusal—the intention apparently being to railroad the accused to prison as soon as possible.

After the private conference between Mr. Steadman and the District Attorney was ended I was invited to enter the presence of this very important public official; was introduced to him and to his assistants, one or two of whom I had met before. I was also introduced to the postal inspector, R. M. McAfee, or rather I should say he introduced himself in these words:

"I have seen you a number of times, Mr. Harman, but never had an introduction. My name is McAfee."

"R. M. McAfee?" said I

"Yes, R. M. McAfee."

Then followed what will doubtless be regarded as a regrettable exhibition of temper on my part. Momentarily overcome as it would seem, by the sense of personal injury, of inexcusable outrage—recollecting the long years of prosecution, not to say persecution I had suffered at the hands of this man McAfee, including two terms of imprisonment in the Kansas penitentiary at Lansing, followed by another and longer term in the Federal prison at Fort Leavenworth, it will not be thought strange, perhaps, that the unexpected sight of this man caused me, for one brief moment to lose command of my tongue!

Standing within three feet of "his highness"—McAfee, is a tall man with a very decidely ministerial appearance and manner (Dr. Stockham calls him "Rev. Dr."), pointing an index finger directly towards his heart I thus addressed him:

"Well, it may be my fate to go to prison next week, but while I much prefer doing my work outside prison walls, I would, in case of imprisonment, a thousand times rather be in my shoes than in the shoes of R. M. McAfee the bloodhound!" spoken with considerable emphasis on the last word.

Here a mild protest came from my friend Steadman who "hoped we would have no unpleasant altercation," or something to that effect.

In reply Mr. McAfee stoutly denied that he had ever prosecuted or persecuted me—that all the prosecutions against myself and paper had been the work of the Department of Justice.

Here I was forcibly reminded of the plea of the priests of Catholicism when the atrocities of the Roman Inquisition are mentioned. They invariably assert that the church is innocent of those atrocities, and that it was always the work of the Secular Governments, not of the religious government.

"Well," said I, "how comes it that I saw you sitting at the elbow of the prosecuting attorney in Topeka, day after day, during all the sessions of the court that tried and condemned me—whispering in his ear, apparently prompting and instructing him how to win the case against me, just as we may suppose the priests of Rome sat at the elbows of the public prosecutors when anyone was being tried for heresy."

"O, well," was the reply, "I sat with Mr. Ady in the Topeka case because he asked me to do so, just as I am requested now to sit with the District Attorney in the present or future trials."

"And is it not true," said I, "that the charges or complaints against me and my paper came from your office?"

"Very true," was the answer, "but this was simply in the line of duty. I am required to do this by the Attorney General at Washington"—or words to that purport.

"Then you admit that you are part and parcel of the governmental machine, the postal censorship that arrests, fines and imprisons people for the alleged crime of sending obscene matter through the mails." I might have added—"and are you not then correctly called a sleuth-hound of the postal inquisition, just as the religious spies and informers of the Roman Inquisition could correctly be called the sleuths of the religious prosecutions and persecutions?"

Mr. McAfee could not and did not deny that he was part and parcel of the censorship machinery of the Washington government, but still maintained that the responsibility of the prosecutions did not rest with him. Like the reasoning of most theologians it seems to me the logic of Mr. McAfee is faulty—as when he asked me if I would not consider my personal rights invaded if some one should persist in sending a "peck of manure" into my room—this in answer to my plea that I had invaded the person or rights of no one when sending sample copies of my paper, even though I did not know the samples would be welcome. My reply to the accusation that I am an invader when I send samples to Christians, or to conventional moralists, is three-fold:

First—The presence of LUCIFER in a conventional home does not befoul the atmosphere of that home—as a "peck of manure" would do. If LUCIFER is good for nothing else it might be useful in such home as kindling-wood.

Second—If a mistake is made in sending the paper to those who think its moral influence bad, the person who is not willing to read all sides has an easy redress—by simply dropping a card to the editor to say that no more copies are desired.

Third—To those who say they cannot prevent their children from reading the paper—at the postoffice or elsewhere, I would say that if parents or guardians fail to instruct their children in wholesome sex-ethics, such parents or guardians are unfit for responsibility, such as parenthood imposes. They can expect nothing better than than their children will make shipwreck, morally, soon or later—and this regardless of the question whether LUCIFER is suitable reading for children.

I may add that the rational ground to take is that knowledge is the only savior, and that it is the child's right to know all that can be known of itself—its sex nature as well as all other parts of its organism; that in such knowledge lies the only safety.

In the course of conversation Mr. McAfee said:

"I saw your old friend Overmyer the other day. He recalled your trial before Judge Foster in Topeka. Said he intends soon to get out a book of reminiscences, and among all his recollections he says there is nothing that surpasses the scene he witnessed between Foster and yourself, when the Judge passed the sentence of five years in prison and fine of $300." Then turning to the district attorney McAfee continued, in words like this:

"Harman had been roasting the judge in his paper for some weeks before the trial. He would place a copy of the judicial oath at the head of his column, then he would roast Foster on one side awhile, then turn him over and roast him on the other side awhile, till at last the judge got mad, and when it came to delivering the sentence he seemed to think it right and proper that he should do a little roasting—and the roasting he gave his prisoner was such as I have never heard before nor since."

The district attorney, whose name I do not now recall, was civil, affable, and seemed to take a human interest in my welfare. Did not say much but seemed satisfied that McAfee should do the talking. The only question of his that I now recall was in regard to my lameness.

"Yes," I replied, "I am lame. I am also partially deaf and cannot see as well as I should like to do, but ask no favors of this court because of these infirmities, nor because of my youthfulness—seventy-five years young. I ask no favors from any man. I ask only justice.

On leaving the district attorney's office I bade the company good-by in words something like these:

"I wish it distinctly understood that I have no quarrel with anyone, no matter how much I may have been injured, nor how much I may disagree. Always I try to purge my mind and heart of every thought that savors of hate or revenge. I recognize that everything is right—right and true to the causes that produce it, and under the conditions cannot possibly be otherwise. The last analysis of human actions, in my opinion, shows that we all do as we must, and that therefore praise and blame are unscientific—unphilosophical."

Thus ended one of the skirmishes that seem to be leading up to a pitched battle, a battle that may prove as serious and as far-reaching in effects as was the pitched battle that ended in my imprisonment in the Lansing penitentiary fifteen years ago.

M. HARMAN.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Full name and address of writers in this department can generally be obtained on application to the editor.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

Helen Gardner, San Angelo, Texas.—"I enjoy reading LUCIFER and sincerely hope you may come out ahead of the 'meddlesome Matties' that seem to be after every one that does not cover himself or herself with the cloak of religion. You will win in this your latest battle."

A Friend and Helper: "Be sure to use the Defense Society and fund to assure the lawyers employed ample pay. Somehow I feel it is to be a victory for you and the cause, no matter which way it tips. You have been in prison and are familiar with such a life, and know it will not kill you, and that it is no disgrace, under such circumstances. Still, I hope you will escape prison, or very much trouble."

Bodh Raj Shah, Shanghai, Punjab, India.—"Am very sorry to learn that you are again in trouble. I abhor the conduct of the so-called free government of America, and offer you my sincerest sympathy, and hope that in the long run the victory and the glory will be yours. But perhaps when that time comes you will not be alive on the face of the globe. . . . The balance to my credit, about one dollar, which you were to send me in books, you may place with your emergency fund."

O. H. Stone, Baring, Wash.—"I see in last LUCIFER that you may possibly have to stand trial to-morrow. I therefore send $5.00, to help defray cost of same. I think your friends are right in advising you to retain counsel, as it is never safe to trust or appeal to the honor of people who have interests opposed to yours.

"Hoping that the good cause will come out with flying colors."

Mrs. Edmund W. Gerry, Ventura, Cal.—"Sirs: The 'Wednesday Afternoon Club' of Ventura is at present interested in all 'New Thought' movements, and we are contemplating subscribing for some up-to-date magazines. We should be pleased to receive literature in the line of Sex Reform, also sample copies of your magazine for consideration."

[Will send LUCIFER at half rates to the Ventura club and to similar organizations; pamphlets one-third off.—M. H.]

August F. Wegener, New York City.—"The board of directors of Comrade Co-Operative Co. has decided to discontinue the work of publishing the Comrade with the April issue, on account of insufficient support. Unexpired subscriptions will be filled by the International Socialist Review. Charles H. Kerr & Co. will exchange share certificates of their company for certificates of the Comrade Co-Operative Co., upon payment of $5.00. The Comrade Co-Operative Co. will sell its stock of literature at reduced rates during the next few weeks. Send for price list to 11 Cooper Square, New York. Please publish this notice in the next issue of your valued paper."

W. W., Helena, Montana.—"I have read of your recent arrest with feelings of great sympathy and no little disgust. But I know your attitude so well that I am not worried about it as much as I would be if you were more of a tenderfoot. . . . Am waiting with patriotic interest to see you win more laurels. At present I know that what you need is money, not pity, or even much of sympathy. You need the weapon to fight with, and if you have it you are able to do the rest, and furnish a performance that will give us all entertainment.

"Mindful of the many, many good things I have learned from you and the great pleasure I have derived from LUCIFER these many years you have been sending it to me free of charge, I enclose you a money order for ten dollars, which you can use as you see fit. Send me a copy of the pamphlet that caused the trouble, as I see you advertise them. I want to know all about it and wish I could address the jury in your behalf. I could say some things that I know others will not say, for I have known you and your motives for many years and I know the need of your work. This money order was sent to me by a woman who has been greatly benefited by liberal ideas imparted by me to her and largely gained by me from you. So I really think it is yours, and I send it with the blessing of friendship stamped and endorsed upon it. . . . .

"With great love to yourself and Lillian and best wishes for the outcome of your splendid fight for humanity and womanhood, I am always your sincere friend."

Arthur Wastall, 3 Amalinda Road, East London, South Africa.—"Am little surprised at turn of affairs. Sorry can't write just now, but you know how much I sympathize with you in the matter of postal persecution. Such tyrannical action will eventually act as the boomerang does, and come back upon the perpetrators. . . . Of course, you are very right in not making any change at this juncture, or it would be attributed to weakness. We will stand by you! Our cause is just and must prevail. . . . Keep cheery! You are acting nobly and your name and memory will be revered wherever the true and brave exist. Have received all you have sent and am making good use of same. There will be South African subscribers ere long."

Dr. J. H. Tilden, editor Stuffed Club, Denver, Colo., May 20, 1905.—"The book, 'Sex Radicalism,' which you sent me for review, has been received. I thank you for the same, and shall give notice of it in the July Club, as it has come in too late for this month. My dear Mr. Harman, it gives me pleasure to tell you that I am in perfect sympathy with you and your work. I wish it was according to the laws of nature that you should live to reap some of the fruits of your sowing; but we have very few Mathuselahs these days, and I am quite sure a man with such advanced ideas as you have on the subject of sex would have to live something like a thousand years to reap any reward. You will have your pains for your pay, which is the usual reward for the redeemer of mankind. I hope I shall have the pleasure of meeting you sometime. With best wishes for your success and prosperity, I am sincerely your friend."

J. B. Phinney, Springfield, Mo.—"I enclose postoffice money-order for $3.00, for the following: 'The Right to Be Born Well,' one-half dozen copies, $1.00; 'Social Freedom,' one-half dozen copies, 75 cents; 'Love Protest,' 100 copies, 50 cents; 'Significance of Divorce,' 50 copies, 25 cents; balance to defense fund.

"I am quite anxious to know how you and Dr. Stockham came out. I am sorry I did not know of the time set for your trial sooner. I got an appeal from Free Speech League in your behalf and responded with what little I had on hand. I only blush for the small amount; and were it not for matrimonial obligations, I would put a mortgage on my home in fifteen minutes for twenty times the amount, if necessary, to secure justice. However, if in need of more funds, let me know. What are homes and dollars to liberals if they must gag their tongues, stifle their conscience, and let their brains and pen rust out? With best wishes."

David Gilmore, Chanute, Kan.—"I am sorry to learn that you have to stand trial again. Swindling concerns can flourish in Chicago and use the United States mail to aid them in their business, but when a man is teaching something to which Mother Grundy objects, he is harassed by the minions of the law.

"Chicago has been experiencing a tidal wave of that 'notable prosperity' that the president told us about. Such prosperity!

"It seems that God has deserted the Christian and espoused the cause of the Heathen in the far East. Will victory turn the heads of the honest Japs and bring them up to the present standard of Christian civilization?

"I hope you will be able to make a successful defense against the present prosecution. It seems to me to be a persecution.

"It seems that only the weak publishers are prosecuted, while the strong are immune. Please continue to send LUCIFER to me, and the money will be sent to you later. Yours for justice."

M. E. Morris and Ida M. Miller, Lewiston, Idaho—"Being deeply interested in the question of free love, together with other twentieth century ideas, we see the growing necessity of a twentieth century alliance, an organization for the purpose of bringing together those who are versed in sociological questions, that they may come in closer relation with each other in a fraternal way. This is an age of travel and, upon arrival in a strange city or community, Free Lovers should be able to recognize each other without delay. Besides, this would afford an opportunity for correspondence which cannot be obtained otherwise.

"In order to learn the opinions of LUCIFER readers regarding the above proposition, we hereby request any and all who consider themselves eligible and favorable toward such an organization to write and tell us their feelings in the matter. If it meets with your approval, let us know it. When a sufficient number of Free Lovers signify their approval, preliminary steps will be taken toward the formation of 'The Free Lovers' Alliance.'"

J. Herbert Rowell, Chicago.—"Aurin F. Hill says in LUCIFER No. 1939: 'I am glad some men and women are strong enough in body and mind to violate the laws made by men. They are the pioneers, the Washingtons, the La Fayettes, the Franklins of our time. Prostitution is caused by laws of men. Abolish all marriage laws by men and women, and much crime will be abolished and we shall be much nearer the condition called heaven on earth.'

"Very well; I take it that he wants to get to heaven, or as near to it as he can get. So be on your way, Bro. Hill. We have said a lot, printed a lot, but no one has done anything yet to prove that there is a heaven beyond what you call prostitution. Won't you 'show me'?

"Start your heaven with, say, ten men and ten women, more or less if you like, each to have lots of liberty—absolute liberty, remember, else you will have the opposite of liberty, which is slavery, of course. When you get it—the heaven—running nicely, let me know, and I will call and look you over. If you don't 'bust' up before I get there, I will give each of you $1,000 as soon as you show me that each of you is living the free life."

B. F. Odell, Flagler, Colo.—"I find by LUCIFER and by a circular from the Free Speech League of New York that you are to stand trial on June 1 for sending obscene matter by mail. You have my sympathy and also my congratulations. You will, and do, stand as the foremost and most persistent advocate and worker for the freedom of women and for free speech. You may stand with Heywood as the foremost martyr. Women in after ages will build you a monument as her best friend. Lovers of freedom will point with pride to your unequaled stand for the freedom to express the truth as you see it, the truth as it reaches the heart of every man.

"I would gladly give my life to stand where you stand, to know that I had been of so much use in helping humanity to a higher plane, but my life counts little. It only reaches a little spot, where I have won the hate and the respect of the conservatives, while your influence is world-wide and you have won intense hate and a deeper respect wherever your influence is felt.

"Whatever the issue of the coming trial, it can but build up the cause for which you have given your talents and your life. Whatever the result, I congratulate you. It is good, at the close of a long and arduous life spent for a loved object, to give a master stroke at or near its close.

"I answer the appeal of the league by enclosing $1.00 direct to you, to use as you see best."

Flora W. Fox, in "People's Press," Chicago: "One of the latest outrages perpetrated by the agents of the Comstock law is the arrest of Moses Harman, editor of 'LUCIFER, the Light-Bearer,' for sending obscene matter through the mails, or, in other words, trying to elevate the mothers and fathers of the children to be, by teaching the righteousness of living clean, pure lives, sexwise and otherwise.

"Mr. Harman is an old, crippled man, but one of the most logical, just, kind and temperate of advanced workers for a better humanity. I hope the liberal thinkers will aid him with money he is so greatly in need of, for fighting for the rights of a better race.

"There is a repetition of this unjust arrest in the later one of Dr. Alice B. Stockham of 1388 Washington boulevard. The Doctor is well known through her books and over twenty years' constant labor for a better and truer sex education for the coming generation."

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS.

BOOKS AT HALF PRICE.

To encourage our friends who are buying books for free distribution or for circulating libraries, we have decided to offer the following books at half price for the next three months. Part of these books are of our own publication; others have been either donated to us to help our work along or they have been purchased by us at rates that will justify the reduction named.

The prices named are the common retail prices. We offer them postpaid at one-half these rates.

"Hilda's Home: A Story of Woman's Emancipation from Sex Slavery," and also from industrial slavery. 425 pages. Paper cover, 50c.

"Human Rights," by Jas. Madison Hook, with an introduction by E. C. Walker. "Liberty is the guiding star of all lands, all races." Price 5c.

"Hints About the Teachings of Natural History," by A Proletary. But few copies left. Price 10c.

"Law of Population," by Anna Besant." 25c.

"Ruled by the Tomb"—a discussion of free thought and free love, by Orford Northcote. An Englishman's view. Price 10c.

"Next Revolution," or woman's emancipation from sex slavery: Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4. These booklets are largely made up of reports from the trials of LUCIFER'S editor in the Kansas courts, and of the attempts to suppress the paper by putting its editor and publisher in prison. Price each 10c.

"Judgment," in which an advocate of popular standards of morality is made to condemn himself to death. Price 5c.

"Do You Want Free Speech?" by Jas. F. Morton, Jr. Price 10c.

SEX RADICALISM.

BY DORA FORSTER.

The following is the table of contents:

Chapter I—Who are our Teachers?
Chapter II—What must we learn in Health Science?
Chapter III—Sex as a Social Force.
Chapter IV—What is permanent in the Puritan Ideal?
Chapter V—Puritan Sex System as it actually is.
Chapter VI—The Sex War.
Chapter VII—Sex Denial under Bondage and under Freedom.
Chapter VIII—What is Marriage?
Chapter IX—What made Emancipation possible?
Chapter X—An Ideal of Sex Life.

"Sex Contains All," says Whitman. The fact that a Booklet of fifty-six pages, Treating of Sex in a Common-sense, Rational and Unconventional way, can Throw the Heads of the Postoffice Departments of Canada and the United States into a Spasm of Fear for the Safety of the Mails would seem to Confirm Whitman's Axiomatic Saying. The same Charge is Made against "Sex Radicalism" that was Made against "Leaves of Grass" and "Cupid's Yokes," namely, OBSCENITY! The Opinion of some Hundreds of Readers of this Booklet is Voiced by One of their Number, who writes:

"Millions are Starving for this Very Kind of Obscenity!"

Price, 25 cents, in handsome leatherette binding. In superior cloth, with gold lettering, 50 cents. The usual reductions in price to those who buy to sell again, or for distribution. Address LUCIFER'S office, 500 Fulton street, Chicago.

LOVE'S WAY TO PERFECT HUMANHOOD.

By Agnes Benham.

An excellent companion for Carpenter's "Love's Coming of Age." The keynote of the book, found on page 78, reads thus: "The soul itself is pure and heavenly, and if at the moment of conception and through the prenatal time when it is building its earthly house it could meet with entirely responsive and congenial conditions, then would the earth be peopled with a race of gods." Price $1. Published by the author, Agnes Benham, Adelaide, South Australia. Orders may be sent through this office.

Chapter titles: The Prehistoric Stages; The Family; The Iroquois Gens; The Grecian Gens; Origin of the Attic State; Gens and State in Rome; The Gens Among Celts and Germans; The Rise of the State Among Germans. 217 pages; bound in cloth. 60c. Postage, 5c.

MARRIAGE IN FREE SOCIETY. Edward Carpenter. One of the best short works on the subject. Daintily printed. A charming little gift book. "Love is doubtless the last and most difficult lesson that humanity has to learn; in a sense it underlies all the others. Perhaps the time has come for the modern nations when, ceasing to be children, they may even try to learn it." 25c.

TOKOLOGY. A book for every woman. By Alice B. Stockham, M. D. Illustrated. Tokology teaches possible painless pregnancy and parturition, giving full, plain directions for the care of a woman before and after confinement. The ailments of pregnancy can be prevented as well as the pains and dangers of childbirth avoided, and women need not go down to death giving birth to children. English, German or Swedish. $2.25.

HILDA'S HOME: A Story of Woman's Emancipation. Rosa Graul. With Macular, Rosa Graul would say, "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman will be less loving and lovable, or that man will be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish. 426 pages. Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

THE NEW HEDONISM. Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old asceticism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.' The new Hedonism says: 'Be happy and you will be virtuous.' In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediæval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and ascetism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproducing function." Paper covers; 39 large pages; twelve copies, 50c; single copy, 5c.

VICE: ITS FRIENDS AND ITS FOES. Edwin C. Walker. Contents: Brotherhood of Man; The Recognition of Facts; Folly of "For Men Only"; Definition of Vice; Horrors of Prostitution; Abnormal Sexuality; Errors of Fathers, Mothers and Teachers; Persecution Does Not Reform; Prostitution and the Crusaders; The "Spoiling of the Heathen"; What Are the Effects of Raids and Crusades? The Economic Side of the Problem; Party Politics in Vice Crusading; In What Does Prostitution Consist? Some Causes of Prostitution; Two Kinds of Prostitution Compared; The Opponents of Divorce; "Purifying" the Tenements; Action for Advanced Women. With appendix: The Wanderings of a Spirit; Our Fair Civilization, the Folly and Cruelty of It All. 15c.

OUR WORSHIP OF PRIMITIVE SOCIAL GUESSES. E. C. Walker. Contents: Love and Law; The Moloch of the Monogamic Ideal; The Continuity of Race-Life, and Tyranny; Food and Sex Fallacies, a Criticism; When Men and Women Are and When They Are Not Varieties; The New Woman; What Is She? What Will She Be? The State Hiding Behind Its Own Mistakes; Bishop Potter's Outdoor of Divorce; Love: Its Attraction and Expression; Is She an Honest Girl? Lloyd, Platt and the Pitiful Facts; Social Radicals and Parentage; Anthropology and Monogamy; Love and Trust Versus Fear; Reflections upon Reading William Platt's "Women, Love, and Life." 15c.

LOVE'S COMING OF AGE. Edward Carpenter. This is a book with which few will wholly agree, but which nearly every one can read with profit and enjoyment. The subject is the relation of the sexes in the past, present and future, and it is treated with absolute frankness and fearlessness by a writer who unites a broad outlook, a strong grasp of his subject and a charming literary style. The following table of contents will indicate the line of thought followed by the author: The Sex Instinct; Man, the Ungrown; Woman, the Serf; Woman in Freedom; Marriage, a Retrospect; Marriage, a Forecast; The Free Society; Some Remarks on the Early Star and Sex Worships. Notes on the Primitive Group; Marriage; Jealousy; The Family; Preventive Checks to Population. The book is printed on extra book paper and handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

KAREZZA. Ethics of Marriage. Alice B. Stockham, M. D., author of Tokology. Karezza gives a high ideal to parental functions and pleads for justice to the unborn child. Karezza is really a supplement to Tokology and elucidates a theory of marital relations, which leads to individual growth and a closer bond of union, the practice of which at all times gives complete control of the fecundating power. Karezza controverts the prevailing ideas of baseness and degradation associated with the sexual nature, makes a plea for a better birthright for the child, for a controlled and designed maternity and aims to lead individuals to a higher development of themselves, through a knowledge of their creative powers. Karezza is the product of knowledge and experience, and is presented to the world with a deep abiding faith, that its teachings will lead individuals to purer lives, to right understanding and appreciation of the sex functions, to intelligent control of propagation and finally through right adjustment in most sacred relations, to the ideal marriage. Levant cloth, prepaid, $1.

I hold fast to this creed,
That one never should heed
The voice of the Mutable Many.

For, a foam-crested wave,
While extolling the brave,
Is the voice of the Mutable Many.

And "Set Barrabas free,
But nail Christ to the Tree,"
Was the voice of the Mutable Many.

Yet, through sunshine and gloom,
From the cot to the tomb,
Rings the voice of the Mutable Many.

In LUCIFER No. 1041, under the head, "Preliminary Skirmishing," was given some account of a recent interview between the federal district attorney, the postal inspector, R. M. McAfee, and the editor of LUCIFER, in which interview reference was made to the closing scene in the trial of this same editor in the Federal Court, Topeka, Kansas, fifteen years ago, charged with sending "obscene literature" through the United States mails. As this same editor is again a prisoner, under bonds, accused of a like offense against the federal statutes, here in Chicago, and soon to be put on trial once more, it is thought fitting and proper to reproduce in this week's LUCIFER a statement of that closing scene, and to make it the introduction to a brief history of the federal statutes under which the present and the previous prosecutions against LUCIFER and its editor have been instituted.

THE PRISONER AND THE JUDGE: A REMINISCENCE.

Under date of May 1, 1890, fifteen years ago, and a little more, the Topeka, Kan., "Daily Journal" contained the following item of news:

"Judge Foster late yesterday afternoon passed sentence upon Moses Harman for publishing in his paper, LUCIFER, at Valley Falls, and causing to be circulated in the mails obscene and indecent matter. Hon. David Overmyer attempted to secure a new trial for the defendant, but the court overruled the motion. Harman refused to stand up when ordered by the court to do so, but his attorney lost no time in getting him upon his feet. When asked whether he had anything to say before sentence was passed upon him, he said he had, and asked how much time the court would give him. Judge Foster allowed him ten minutes, which he consumed in endeavoring to show the court that he was a martyr to opinion's sake and the cause of emancipating mankind, especially women, from certain social evils. At the conclusion of his talk, Judge Foster told the prisoner that he had a few things to say. The first was that the prisoner could not plead martyrship to decency for indecency. He said the effect of the teachings of Harman was bad, whether he intended them to be good or bad, and that if intention to commit crime alone should be deemed crime, there would be little need of courts. He said that the course of the prisoner throughout the trial had been rebellious and defiant, and that it had not appealed to the leniency or mercy of the court. He had seen circus performers stick their heads into lions' mouths, but he had never seen them have the temerity to twist the beasts' tails or kick them in the ribs while performing the risky act. [Laughter.] He then sentenced Harman to serve five years in the Kansas penitentiary and to pay a fine of $300."

Explanatory of this news item, the following paragraphs, copied from LUCIFER of May 16, same year, will perhaps be not without interest those who know, or who do not know, that the same individual is again a federal prisoner, expecting soon to be tried before a similar court on a very similar charge:

"THE PRISONER'S TALK TO THE COURT."

"Judge Foster and Gentlemen:"

FOSTER: "You will address the court alone."

"Well, then, I will address the court alone. I wish to say, to begin with, that I cherish no ill will, no vengeful feelings, toward this court, nor against the prosecution, not even against the district attorney, Mr. Ady, nor Mr. McAfee, the postal inspector. I recognize that all men, the court and prosecution included, are the creatures, the victims of heredity and environment. We all move along the lines of the least resistance, and when it comes to the last analysis of actions, I simply recognize that we all do what we do and as we do simply because we must. Therefore, I see no rational ground for entertaining feelings of revenge or hate toward this court or toward the prosecutors. Under like circumstances and with like heredity I would have done just as they have done.

"But while cherishing no vengeful feelings toward anyone in this matter, I wish now and here to enter my earnest and solemn protest against being reckoned a criminal and against being punished as a criminal. I protest because the essential elements of crime are lacking in my case. The first and chief element of crime in any case is the intention—the design or desire to do an injury to some one. I testified on the witness stand that I had no such intention when publishing the indicted articles, but on the contrary my intention was a good and benevolent one. I had heard the agonized cries of my sisters—my sisters by the ties of our common humanity—saying, 'Speak for us. Make known the wrongs, the outrages, of which we are the helpless victims. In the name of and for the sake of the most sacred rights, interests and hopes of the human race, present and future, speak out! and speak in words so plain that all can understand.' In person and by letter these appeals have been made to me for many years past and I have simply obeyed the calls. I have protested against these wrongs, these outrages upon women, in the marital or conjugal relation, and have allowed others to do the same, through the columns of my paper, and have allowed them to say their say in their own way. If this is a crime, then I confess myself a criminal. But, as before said, the main element of crime is lacking in my case. My motive, my intention, was to benefit my fellow-beings, not to injure them. In the absence of overwhelming proof to the contrary, I maintain that my own solemn affirmation should be accepted as sufficient proof of the rectitude of my motives. The prosecution have brought no proof to show that my motives were bad. The witnesses for the prosecution itself have testified to my general good character, to my honesty, my industry and purity of life.

"Not only is the first and chief element necessary to the conviction of crime lacking, but the second, also, viz.: the finding of some one who has been injured by any act of mine. No poro fhas been adduced that any man, woman or child has been hurt by any act of mine. No effort has been made to produce such evidence. For these two reasons, if for no other, I maintain that the prosecution have utterly failed to make out a case against me, and in the absence of real grounds of prosecution the case becomes simply one of persecution for opinion's sake. The so-called crime of 'obscenity' is not a crime per se, not a crime in the nature of things. It is a law-made or constructive crime, like blasphemy, heresy or witchcraft. It is a matter of opinion solely. Obscenity has no existence except in the mind that perceives it as such. To my mind the Markland and Whitehead letters are not obscene, and there are hundreds if not thousands of good women and men who agree with me in this opinion. Among these is Lucinda B. Chandler of Chicago, who for many years has been president of the Moral Education Society, with headquarters at that city. A 'Remonstrance and Petition' setting forth the opinion that the effect of the publication of these indicted letters is 'good and only good,' was drawn up and signed by eleven well-known lady writers and lecturers upon reform subjects, and copies of this remonstrance and petition were signed by many hundreds of women all over the land, some of which petitions I now hold in my hand and many more have been forwarded to this court. I have also received for publications some dozens of 'open letters' to the court protesting against this prosecution, and asking that it be dismissed and the defendants allowed to go free. Some of these letters I have forwarded to the court, some have been published, and many have been neither published nor forwarded.

"Besides these letters to the court I have received scores if not hundreds of letters from women—wives and mothers—saying that in their opinion the indicted articles were not obscene; some of these mothers saying that their daughters should have the benefit of reading the indicted articles, including the lately indicted O'Neill letter, so that being forewarned against such horrible abuses of sex, they may the better avoid and defend themselves against such abuses and against such human monsters as are therein described. I protest against the law under which these prosecutions have been brought against me. I protest against it because of its unconstitutionality, and because of its liability to be used for purposes of oppression and invasion of personal right. While I do not think that the indicted articles come within the purview of this law as it now stands, I look upon it as a survival or revival of the barbarous laws of the middle or dark ages. The founders of this government intended it to be a government for the protection of personal and citizen rights only. It was not designed to be a paternal government, not designed to regulate the religion or the morals of the citizens. You, Judge Foster, doubtless remember the efforts that were made, thirty or forty years ago, to induce congress to pass laws excluding 'incendiary literature' from the United States mails. It was urged, and with much plausibility, too, that such laws were necessary to the protection of the lives and property of people living in the slave-holding states. But congress very properly refused to listen to these requests and petitions. They knew that the effect of such a law would be an abridgment of the liberty of speech and of press, which abridgment is clearly forbidden by the constitution of the United States, and they knew, too, that it was impossible to so define and limit such a law that it would not be stretched to cover a multitude of abuses and discriminations. The same arguments hold against the so-called Comstock postal law. While the aim of congress in its enactment may have been a good and benevolent one, it was impossible to so define and guard against abuse that it would not be used to deprive the citizen of his constitutional and natural rights. In fine, I protest against the laws under which I have been prosecuted because of their un-American character, and because of their inherent despotism. We, as a nation, are rapidly drifting toward Russianism in our governmental methods. In fact, Russian censorship of press and mails is better in some respects than American censorship. In Russia no newspaper, or other publication, is admitted to the mails until it has been passed upon by the public censor, so that the publisher of any edition of any paper, book or pamphlet, knows, or may know, beforehand, exactly what to expect; whereas, here, in free (?) America, it is simply impossible to know beforehand what to expect. Here, the censor gets in his work after the mailing, not before, and it then depends wholly upon what may be in the mind—the opinion—of the court before whom the case may be brought, as to whether any publication is within the meaning of the law or not, and if the court rules adversely there is no escape from punishment.

"The time—ten minutes—is about up. I close by repeating my protest against being reckoned a criminal. I have tried to live an honest life—have tried to do all the good I can in the world and as little harm as possible. The sun of my life—my active life—may now be setting. So let it be. I submit."

As addenda to this report of the prisoner's talk to the court, these paragraphs follow:

"While I do not say that the above is an exact report of the ten-minute talk to the judge, when asked by him if I had anything to say why sentence should not be pronounced upon me, yet it is very nearly correct in all important particulars. I had prepared something different in many particulars, expecting to be allowed twenty or thirty minutes' time, and when ruled to ten minutes, I made no use of my prepared notes, but went at it in a random, off-hand manner.

"My meaning, of course, in the last words to the judge, was that I submit to overpowering force, just as I would submit to an absolute monarch, like the czar of Russia, with a million of soldiers at his back. I submit because there is no alternative, not because I recant anything, not because I repent anything, not be cause I am willing to make any concessions or promises as to my future conduct.

"The management of the defense was mainly a failure, but I hope not entirely so. Hoping that all will yet be well, I bid the readers of LUCIFER an affectionate good-bye until I get a chance to write again. M. HARMAN.

"[This is written on the point of starting to the Lansing penitentiary.—M. H.]"

Some of LUCIFER'S readers of this present date, fifteen years later, may perhaps be curious to know whether I paid the three hundred dollar fine and whether I served out the five years in the Kansas penitentiary. If so, I answer, No—I did not pay the fine, nor did my friends pay the sum demanded of me by the court as pay for the blessed privilege of being harassed for three years preceding the trial, by the government officials, and for the great privilege of going to prison for five years—to save the honor and purity of the United States mail service. But while the technical fine of three hundred dollars was not paid, the costs of defense, to myself and friends, during those three years and more, culminating with the trial and sentence, were far in excess of the sum named as fine; to say nothing of loss of time in court attendance at distant cities, and not to mention mental worry and neglect of business.

Nor did I serve out the five years' sentence in the "pen." The storm of indignation that swept over the entire country, extending also to foreign lands, wherever the facts became known, against a sentence wholly unprecedented in severity in modern times for a similar alleged offense, resulted in my release, on technical grounds, after confinement of four months. Judge Caldwell of the Federal Circuit court, on motion of Hon. David Overmyer of the Topeka bar, overruled the decision of Judge Foster and sent the case back to the District court "to be dealt with according to law"—sent it back, not because of severity of sentence, not because of grave errors in the trial (of which there were many), but because of a technicality that seems laughable in its triviality and simply amazing to those who do not know that the administration of "law" in this country is mainly a matter of antiquated forms and customs, trivial, if not senseless, in their nature, in which wilderness of forms and customs, precedents and usages, such little matters as justice, truth and human rights are lost sight of, overlooked, ignored; I repeat, to those who do not know what the administration of "law" really is it would seem simply amazing that a learned and dignified judge of the United States Circuit court could find no better reason for my release than that Judge Foster had neglected the three short words, "at hard labor," when imposing upon me his prison sentence of five years.

The following paragraphs taken from LUCIFER of April 4, E. M. 290—that is, April 4, 1890, of the common calendar—constitute the "roasting" that I am charged with having administered to Judge Foster before the trial culminating in the scene described by the Topeka "Journal" and reproduced at the beginning of this article. The offending article is headed:

"WHO AND WHAT ARE ON TRIAL?"

"In less than two weeks from the date of this issue of LUCIFER an important trial is expected to come off in the United States District Court at Topeka, Kansas. Important, not because of the prominence of the individuals who stand accused of crimes or misdemeanors, but important because of the principles involved in the questions that will then and there come up for investigation and for legal interpretation and decision, and important because of the prominence and number of persons who will really, though not technically or nominally, be put on trial.

"As it is just possible if not probable that the present conductor of this free platform—LUCIFER'S platform—will not much longer be allowed the privilege of saying his say from said platform, he now respectfully asks the careful attention of the reader of these lines to a short statement of what he believes to be the issues to be tried at the approaching term of the United States Court and also, who are the persons that are then and there to be put on trial.

"I. As to principles:

"(1) The principle, the right, the demand, or claim, of and for freedom of speech and of the press, will be put on trial.

"(2) The principle of citizen right to and of civil liberty, including political and religious liberty, will be put on trial; for if speech and press be not free, then it can be easily shown that civil, political and religious liberty are hollow mockeries.

"(3) The constitution and laws of the United States will be put on trial. The constitution and laws are part of the machinery of the artificial thing we call government. Government, human government, is of itself an evil, a very expensive and dangerous evil—dangerous because of the tendency to arrogate to itself powers and functions that do not rightly belong to it. Government—written constitutions and laws—is the creature of man, and therefore inferior to man. In fact, until incarnated in the person of man, or men, as officials or executors, government is only an idea. As a force or power it is less than what we call "the idle wind"! Incarnated in man, or men, this idea becomes useful or hurtful according to its use or abuse. The only use or excuse for the existence of this thing we call government is to help, by co-operative effort, to secure each individual person or citizen in the enjoyment of his or her natural rights. Among the most important of all natural rights is the right to think and the right to express one's thoughts. This latter necessarily implies or includes the right to free speech and free press.

"If the written constitution, as an important part of the artificial arrangement we call the government of the United States, provides for and guarantees absolute freedom of speech and press, then this fact will be fully brought out at the Topeka trial.

"If, on the contrary, there is no such guarantee in the printed document called the constitution of the United States, then this fact also will be fully made manifest, and it will then be in order for the citizens of the country called the United States to begin to inquire whether this document, the venerable document they have been taught to regard as the palladium of their liberties, is really worth the blank paper it is written on.

"As to other laws, as to enactments other than the constitution itself, bearing upon the case or cases under consideration, the same remarks or rules will apply. If these laws support, guarantee and defend the citizen in the enjoyment of his natural rights then they will come out of the ordeal unscathed; but if, on the other hand, it is found that they deny or contravene those natural rights, then the verdict must be pronounced, "Weighed in the balance and found wanting!"

II. As to Persons:

"(1) The judge, Cassius G. Foster, will then and there be on trial. As presiding officer, arbiter or umpire, the responsibilities of the judge are very great. The judicial oath, a copy of which is given a conspicuous place in large type on first page of this issue, outlines, in part, at least, the responsibilities resting upon the presiding officer of the court, but it does not tell the whole story. Cassius G. Foster, for instance, was a man and a citizen before he was a judge of the U. S. District Court. When he became a judge he did not cease to be a man and a citizen. His manhood and citizenship are of much greater importance to him than his judgeship. His duties as a man and a citizen take precedence of his duties as a judge, simply because, as already stated, governments, of which judgeships are a part, are the work of man, or of men, and therefore inferior to the men who make and who can, if they choose, unmake them. As a man it is Cassius G. Foster's duty to do no wrong to any human being. As a citizen of a republic or commonwealth he is the equal of any other citizen, living or dead, consequently he owes allegiance to no other citizen or citizens, for it is absurd to say that an individual citizen owes allegiance, loyalty, to an equal, or to equals. The only allegiance or loyalty that a free and equal citizen can owe, is loyalty to his own manhood, to his highest ideal of Truth, Right and Justice. If the constitution and laws embody and represent C. G. Foster's highest ideal of truth, right and justice, then he owes allegiance to that constitution and those laws, but only because of, and so far as, they embody this highest ideal.

"That is to say, every judge, every magistrate, every presiding officer of a court, from the lowest to the highest, is and by virtue of his citizenship, a judge of the laws, the statutes, the human enactments, that he is called upon to administer—from the constitution of Alexander Hamilton, of Washington and Franklin, down, down, to the postal laws engineered through a degenerate and debauched Congress by Anthony Comstock!

"These are some of the reasons why we say that of all the persons to be put on trial at Topeka, Kansas, at the approaching session of the U. S. District Court, Cassius G. Foster takes, and should of right, take the first and most important place. How he will bear himself under the strain of this trial, is a question in which many thousands of people scattered all over this broad land, now feel a deep interest. Will he come out of it with honor to himself and with credit to the judiciary of which he is a member, or will the ordeal prove to be too great for the man? Will he show himself a jurist whose record will be found worthy to be quoted on the side of liberty and equity in future years, or will he take rank with those jurists who sacrifice principle to expediency or to judicial bias, who bow to 'precedent' instead of to Truth and Justice, and for social or political reasons are ready to sacrifice the innocent to gratify a popular clamor, which clamor has no other cause or foundation than ignorant prejudice?"

The judicial oath referred to herein was kept standing in large letters on first page of LUCIFER for several issues preceding the time of trial, but these quoted paragraphs entitled "Who and What Are on Trial?" constitute the main part of the terrible "roasting" spoken of by R. M. McAfee, as reported in LUCIFER 1941—professedly quoting the words of David Overmyer.

Whether these talks to the judge were wise or unwise I leave others to decide. At the time, and under the circumstances, I considered it the right thing to do, just as at the time and under the circumstances I considered it the right thing to say what I did to Inspector McAfee a few weeks ago in the Federal building in this city.

ORIGIN OF THE CENSORSHIP LAWS.

The following brief statement of the origin of the censorship law is from the pen of a well known lawyer of New York City, who has closely watched the working thereof ever since its first enactment:

"This law was passed March 3, 1873, by trickery and fraud in the confusion and uproar of the closing hours of the most corrupt Congress ever convened in this country. It was passed without debate between one and two o'clock on Sunday morning, March 2, and signed by the President Monday night, with no thought or deliberation on the part of anybody, amid a vast number of bills of all sorts. One of the individuals interested in pushing this vile law through this debauched Congress was Comstock himself, of whom it is not necessary here to say anything. Another was a theological hypocrite who publicly announced that he believed in deceit. Another was a person who violated the law himself and through his money or personal influence managed to escape prosecution and go scot free. And there were others of morals equally eccentric whose trickery aided in the passage of this law.

"It will be well to reprint what some of the leading papers said at that time of the scenes of confusion and debauchery amid which this bill came into existence.

"The Washington correspondent of the New York 'Herald' says in the issue of March 2:

"'The wrangle over the proposed increase of congressional salaries was rather funny to-day in the House, from the manner of the members, they were so anxious for more pay, but they feared to say so, knowing only too well that Congress just now is not so high in the esteem of the people as to be thought worthy of an increase of pay.'

"On the same day the same paper says editorially:

"'The Credit Mobilier Congress was busy up to a late hour this morning preparatory to giving up a life that goes out in the blackness of infamy to-morrow. . . . Senators . . . were occupied in voting on appropriation bills the jobbery and robbery of which cannot be discovered in the hurry of closing hours of legislation and which sometimes remain forever secret from all except the interested parties. In the House of Representatives the bustle and excitement were even greater than in the Senate, and, no doubt, amid the confusion and under the cloak of patriotism and honesty the usual eleventh-hour stealing was accomplished:

"And again on March 3:

"'What remains of the foul work of this memorable session will probably be finished to-day.'

"On March 4, the 'Herald's' correspondent says:

"'The House was in a noisy, uproarious mood to-day . . . the confusion and uproar were never surpassed.'

"The 'Sun' says editorially March 4:

"'Is there any corruption which Congress will not justify and approve, any infamy which either House will not boldly adopt as its own? And is there any limit to this process of public and official degradation? The indignation of the people alone can afford an adequate solution of this problem.'

"And again on March 5:

"'Within the last one hundred and fifty years there have been more famous legislative bodies than this, but we do not remember one more infamous. There were conscientious gentlemen in the Senate and House, but, prima facie, the case is against the whole of them, and till the close of the present century membership in that Congress will, in the estimation of the general public, throw upon the incumbent the burden of proving that he was not a dishonest man.

"'The entire term of this Congress has been characterized by a series of disreputable transactions which have no parallel in our history. . . . This is the Congress which some Macaulay of the next century will describe as more infamous than that Parliament which originated Law's celebrated Mississippi scheme, and more corrupt than those parliaments which Walpole used to purchase as he bought Merino sheep and Flanders mares to stock his estate in Sussex.'

"The 'Tribune' March 4 in an editorial says:

"'The whole Congress has been characterized by an unprecedented neglect of the public business in the early stages of the session and confusion at the close. . . . The Senate has been obstructive, partisan and unusually corrupt. Considering the relative smallness of its numbers, it has been conspicuously bad in morals.'

"The 'Times' March 3 bears this testimony:

"'No one who reads even the comparatively brief reports of the Associated Press can fail to see the haste and confusion which prevail during the closing hours of Congress. It is idle to deny that this condition of things gives rise to many opportunities for fraud and that some of these opportunities are used is only too probable. But if Congress were composed, in both branches, of perfectly immaculate men it would be impossible to avoid great injury to the public interests under the existing method of doing business. The bills which are crowded at the last are precisely those which it is most desirable should be deliberately considered, and the true scope and effect which it is least possible to penetrate by hurried examination.'

"And again March 5:

"'The Forty-Second Congress which finally adjourned at noon yesterday took part during its term in some of the most important parts of our recent history. Public attention is now fixed on the exciting and painful scenes in the midst of which it closed its career.'

"And so on throughout the whole range of the press all over the country—not the partisan papers alone that were politically opposed to the Republican party then dominant in Congress, but papers of all grades and shades of political opinion.

"The history of those times is too well known to leave a doubt as to the way in which the enactment of the Comstock Law was procured. And having thus gotten their law the filthy gang for whose use it was made violate every principle of honesty and decency and enforce their law to silence arguments which they cannot otherwise answer, to suppress thought, to threaten Science, to pry into the confidences of the mails and to limit liberty."

In my talk with McAfee and the District Attorney a few days ago I mentioned these recorded facts as to the character of the Congress that passed the censorship law, the hasty and ill-considered manner of its passage, mentioned the fact that before the time of the civil war ineffectual efforts had been made to secure federal enactments limiting the freedom of the mails; mentioned that this law was signed, with others, without reading by President Grant, a military man simply. I might have added, and a man not skilled in jurisprudence; a man whose training, if not his nature, predisposed him to arbitrary and despotic measures, etc.

In his reply McAfee said he had it from a person who saw the signing, that President Grant read the act before signing it. [Query: Was this person Anthony Comstock, the agent of the New York Society that was chiefly responsible for the postal legislation?] Adding: "If the censorship law was passed hurriedly and without due consideration, how comes it that this same law has been before several Congresses since for revision, and that instead of repealing it the national legislature has made it stronger at each revision?"

My reply to this was, in substance:

There has never been a general or popular agitation for repeal; it is to the interest of lawyers—who as a class have dominated the national Congress for many years—to have as many laws as possible on the statute book; the more laws, and the more difficult of interpretation those laws, the better for the lawyer class; hence the temptation to magnify their office and make it honorable and profitable was not easily resisted.

I might have added, "The influence of the clerical lobby members of Congress"—the fact that the so-called "Evangelical Alliance" maintains skilled and influential representatives, such as Rev. Wilbur Crafts, at the national capital year after year to see to it that no measures inimical to their interests shall receive serious congressional consideration, and that now laws shall be introduced in the national legislature still more closely cementing the bond of union between church and state; and, of course, it needs no argument to show that this postal censorship law is the legitimate successor of the older laws against blasphemy and heresy.

M. HARMAN.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE RACE.

It fell to me to open a debate recently, at a meeting of intelligent people. Whether they gathered anything from my words, I do not know; but I certainly brought away one lesson from their speeches and from their silences. I learned that our social system, which keeps us all enslaved, making our brains, muscles and emotions subservient to it, also contrives that the pretense of education which it gives to children, while it contains so much by-gone theology and useless superstition, shows nothing, even in outline, or the principles given to the world by modern thinkers. The principles worked out by Charles Darwin in biology are more important than any ever before enunciated, bearing as they do on every department of the science of human life. Yet there is scarcely a hint given by our still priest-ridden educationists of Darwin's work done half a century ago.

Thus when I, with somewhat Quixotic zeal, tried to set forth, in a ten-minute speech, the importance of human heredity, and its connection with social developments, it was clear I had quite miscalculated the "previous knowledge" (as trained teachers call it) of my hearers. In fact, I was trying not only to show forth the great lesson of the twentieth century, viz.: woman's freedom, already partially claimed in the readjustment of the marriage system insisted on by "the new woman," but I had also to suggest the lesson of the nineteenth century, viz.: what human evolution and its method implies.

Nothing would do for the audience but to return to the old battle-ground of socialism and individualism—a result which I could not wholly regret, for I am a socialist with all the warmth of my heart and all the coolness of my intellect; and it was very clear on which side were the young blood and the young brains.

But why do not the individualists see that while socialism must inevitably come this century to give us a reasonably good environment, the exponents of individualism should, above all things, occupy themselves with the subject of improved heredity, the necessary supplement to the improved environment aimed at by socialism?

The following was the little lecture I gave:

The question, "By what method can the human race be improved?" assumes three things: (1) That there is room for improvement, that we are not as healthy, as beautiful, as intelligent, and as wise as we would like to be, and as we should like our descendants to be; (2) that man can, by conscious effort, improve the race of man; and (3) that the race will not become extinct before there is time to improve it.

I think all intelligent and kindly people agree that improvement is wanted; and we shall not say with Dr. Boylé Roche that we do not see why we should do anything for posterity, since posterity has not done anything for us. And all are hopeful, with the exception, perhaps, of Mr. Benjamin Kidd, that the improvement can be effected by deliberate, conscious effort. At the danger of extinction, Malthusians may smile; yet it is certain that many of the best human strains do die out, and that the pure Anglo-Saxon breed in America is not now multiplying, and I think it is clear that a definite and recognized aspiration in a race to improve must include an aspiration to keep up its numbers to the full, if not to increase them.

Now to examine methods. A good proverb says: "He who will know what will be must consider what hath been"; and though the history of the past will not show us all the history of the future, it always throws much light upon it.

There is no doubt that man has improved in faculties, in brain power and in adaptability, though he has not on the average reached such a good moral standard as that of most other animals, in social sympathy or chivalry toward his mate.

The doctrine of evolution shows us man's path of progress. Darwin taught us what nature's method was in this path of progress. The quick-witted and the deft were allowed to flourish and produce offspring; the stupid and the clumsy died early and left no offspring or few. Every individual was, so to speak, tested this way. This was nature's individualistic method of improving the race. I use the word philosophically; even the most socialistic of us must admit that this method, carried on for long ages, succeeded well. Darwin called this method "natural selection" and its result "the survival of the fittest."

But nature had also another method which now came in well. Something was lost when the individualistic method was supplemented by another, but much more was gained. Man became a highly socialized animal, and by his social faculties the power of his hands and brain were enormously multiplied as a collective animal. And now he learned how to exchange ideas by means of that miracle, human language. When language began, man first, so to speak, went to school. And he learned both good and bad. Among the bad things he learned were how to go to war, how to enslave his fellow-creatures, and how to enslave his mate. Among the good things were poetry, music and the visual arts, as well as all the early crafts.

There is a verse from a doggerel poem of the last century, which was intended in mockery of the first evolutionists; but it expresses the facts as well as they can be briefly put, so I quote it. It says of our apelike ancestors:

> "An ape with opposable thumb and big brain,
> When the gift of the gab he had managed to gain,
> As the lord of creation established his reign,
> Which nobody can deny."

So here we have the two methods—the method of selected heredity, of rejection of unfit individuals; and the method of collectivism or education of the race.

Now, to cut a long story short, both these methods must go on. The method of selected heredity must go on at all costs; that is why the individualists say: "Let as many children be born as possible, and let the weakest go to the wall." A few humane philosophers oppose this, and say that we can substitute artificial selection for natural selection, and thus the best parents be selected for the race; but they do not explain how to carry this out.

These individualists and these humanists might have gone on disputing for ages to come, but they are interrupted by some remarkable disturbances and changes in the very facts they are discussing, and these facts we are all compelled to notice at the beginning of this twentieth century.

The disturbance has come from an unexpected quarter; it has come from man's enslaved mate.

Woman has declared herself in a very remarkable way. She has insisted on having some choice of her mate; that is, if he proves bad, she divorces him. And just as she refuses to be a slave mate, so she refuses to be a slave mother. She is refusing to bear more than one or two children. These facts are most noticeable among women of Anglo-Saxon race in America; but these are the best women, and they are going to lead the rest of the world.

Woman is going to insist on being free; and the use she will make of her freedom is that she will select the father of her children. She will not be tied up to any and every miserable specimen of mediocrity or to any drunken or diseased wretch. If she is refused freedom, she will refuse to bear children at all; and thus it is no longer merely "the woman question"—it is "the nation question." The mothers of the race must choose the fathers of the race.

This is the rational form of selection that will be substituted for natural selection. And it will bring about a greater revolution in human worth and power than the world has yet seen.

DORA FORSTER.

LOVE'S PROTEST.

Taking a hint from the many calls for Lucifer containing the article "Love's Protest," by Lady Florence Dixie, we have printed several thousand leaflets of that article and of "Radical Drama," by Jonathan Mayo Crane—the review of "Ellabelle." This leaflet will be sent to any address for 10 cents per dozen or 50 cents per hundred, in postage stamps. Some of our friends have adopted the plan of dropping Lucifer leaflets on the seats of street cars, in R. R. stations or enclosing them in letters, etc., after the methods found effective by propagandists of all schools. That these methods of sowing Lucifer seed has already produced fruit we have good reason to believe.

THE RIGHT TO BE BORN WELL.

From time to time, for about one year past, articles have been printed in Lucifer with this title. The type of these articles has been kept standing, hoping to put the several chapters into a pamphlet about the size, shape and price of Dora Forster's "Sex Radicalism." One more chapter only, as I think, is now needed to make a booklet of fifty pages, or thereabout. If those who have subscribed and not paid for one or more copies of this booklet, will now send the amount of their subscriptions the chapters will be put into the hands of the pressman and binder.

PLATO VERSUS PLATT.

Long ago, Plato, who anticipated nearly all the advanced movements of our time, proposed that children be bred on the same principles as domesticated animals. This was very shocking to persons of refined mind, and they have protested ever since whenever some modern Platonist has renewed the suggestion. The latest protestor is William Platt.

Mr. Platt admits that, "if you look for no more than a healthy animal," the prescription is admirable. That is a great concession, to start with. If scientific breeding promoted general health, and did nothing more, it would be the most valuable discovery ever made by man. Of all the sources of happiness, health is undoubtedly, by far, the greatest. But health does not only promote happiness; if we take the word in its wise sense, to include constitutional vigor, it is also an important condition of intellectual efficiency. The longevity of great men has often been noticed. Take, for instance, the most eminent Englishmen who have died during the last quarter of a century—Tennyson, Browning, Darwin, Spencer, Carlyle, Ruskin, Disraeli, Gladstone. Of these eight men, five were over eighty, two more were over seventy-five and the remaining one was seventy-three. Some of these men suffered from bodily ailments but all possessed great fundamental strength of constitution, and the power of getting through a vast amount of work. Lombroso in "The Man of Genius" gives striking proof that great men are long lived.

Mr. Platt is certainly mistaken, however, if he believes that only physical health and strength can be produced by breeding. All experience shows that mental and moral qualities are inherited as truly as bodily ones, and can therefore be developed by selection as surely as bodily ones.

Throughout the whole animal world we see that different animals are as regularly characterized by certain mental as by certain physical qualities. The courage and ferocity of the tiger are inherited as surely as his stripes, and an antelope is as certain to be timid as a tiger is to be brave. The burrowing instincts of moles, the nocturnal instincts of cats, the curious social instincts of bees and ants, are inherited with as much accuracy as the structure of their eyes and legs.

The same is true of the domesticated animals which have been artificially bred by man. No person doubts that the bloodhound, the greyhound, the setter, the pointer and the bulldog have been artificially produced by human selection. Yet these animals have mental peculiarities as clearly marked as their physical ones. In some cases, indeed, the distinguishing characteristic of a breed is a certain mental trait. Of this the pointer is an excellent example.

When we come to man, we find that the rule still holds true. The force of mental inheritance in human beings is perhaps best shown in the case of mental disease. Lombroso has told us how eleven members of the same family arrived in succession at Connecticut Asylum. In the remarkable chapter on "Inheritance," in his "Variation of Animals and Plants Under Domestication," Darwin says: "Every one knows how often insanity runs in families, and some of the cases given by Mr. Sedgwick are awful—as of a surgeon, whose brother, father and four paternal uncles were all insane, the latter dying by suicide; of a Jew, whose father, mother and six brothers and sisters were all mad; and in some other cases several members of the same family, during three or four successive generations, have committed suicide."

The evidence for the inheritance of mental talent is not quite so overwhelming; nevertheless, it is very strong, as any one will see who reads Galton's "Hereditary Genius." There are some strjking cases now in English public life. Balfour, the present prime minister, is the fourth member of the family of Cecil who has held that office since the time of Elizabeth. His cousin, Lord Hugh Cecil, bids fair to be a fifth. The coming man of the Liberal party seems to be Winston Spencer Churchill, son of Lord Randolph Churchill, and a descendant of England's greatest general. No doubt these men have exceptional opportunities, but hardly more than several thousands of others who show no ability.

It may be said that it is dangerous to breed from genius, because of its close relation to insanity, alcoholism and other forms of degeneration. Although genius has often begotten genius, it is also true that the children of great men are often very unsatisfactory. It may, perhaps, be an open question how far it is desirable to breed from genius of the highest class. This difficulty, however, does not apply to persons of considerable but not prodigious ability. Galton and others have shown that talent at least breeds very true, and genius usually springs from talented families.

To avoid frightening the timid, I may say at once that I do not propose the drastic methods of Plato. In my opinion, freedom would suffice. All that is needed is to have collective maintenance of children and payment of motherhood, and to leave every woman free to select the father of her child on each occasion. The great majority of women would be sure to select superior men, especially if public opinion held up a high standard in this matter. We would thus have an automatic method of improving human heredity without restricting the liberty of anybody.

R. B. Kerr.

FROM A VETERAN FIGHTER FOR FREEDOM.

[The following characteristic paragraphs are from a private letter written by one whose name was a "household word" during the border wars that gave rise to the phrase "Bleeding Kansas." Dr. Brown is old enough now to be put on the "retired list"—eighty-five years, if I do not forget—and if any man deserves a pension from the United States treasury this veteran worker for liberty and right deserves such pension.

So far as I know, he gets no pension, asks no pension, but is still a diligent worker with his brain and pen, though for reasons best known to himself he seldom or never signs his name to what he writes—editorially—in a very popular and eminently successful reform journal.

Though not written for publication I have permission to select from his letter such parts as show his attitude toward the postal censorship and allied subjects.—M. H.]

I have always read Lucifer with pleasure and I guess with profit. Probably I would have exercised greater caution, so as to avoid the blood-hounds, had I been in your place, but that perhaps because I passed through so much adverse criticism while I was publishing my anti-slavery views, both in Pennsylvania and Kansas. [Dr. Brown was editor of the "Herald of Freedom" in Kansas during the fight over the question whether that territory should be organized as a free or as a slave state.]

I send you my book entitled "Reminiscences of Governor R. J. Walker, with the True Story of the Rescue of Kansas from Slavery." The author takes you behind the scenes and tells you what would have been very improper to relate at the time the events occurred. And it is a quietus to the professional libeller who manufactured falsehoods at $5 a lie for the eastern press. . . . .

Probably you never knew that at the session of the territorial legislature of Kansas for, I think, 1859-60, Erastus Heath, a member of the House, offered a bill emancipating all persons bound by marriage, provided they did not in a limited time, I think it was one month, file a statement in the District Court that they were satisfied with their present relations. It was a great shock, but there were reported three hundred bills pending in that legislature divorcing parties, and Heath thought the fair thing would be to release all that were not harmoniously married in one general bill.

If all the mismated could express themselves without Mrs. Grundy's opposition, don't you think there would be a universal smash up? I believe it. And the mourners about the streets would be mighty few!

But these are not my subjects for present thought. I sincerely hope you will not be arraigned before a Christian bigot, of the Comstock persuasion. The latter attempted to get me in his coils, but I "smelt a rat" in good time, and he gained no hold on me. "Damn him and damn those who won't sit up nights to damn him," was the expression of an angered, drunken man, some fifty years ago, when speaking of a person he did not like, and I feel the same way about Anthony.

Your friend, G. W. Brown.

[Dr. Brown uses language that will seem shocking to many readers, but sometimes it is necessary that people be shocked in order that they may be roused from a dangerous stupor.—M. H.]

A red or blue cross means, your subscription has expired, and you are respectfully requested to renew, or at least to let us know whether you wish the paper continued to your address.

DID ROOSEVELT ADVOCATE HIGH QUALITY?

In Lucifer No. 1,041, William Windsor points out that President Roosevelt has done a public service in drawing attention to the sex question. I fully agree, and also believe that Roosevelt will be chiefly remembered in history because his way of handling this subject aroused indignant protest from the women of America against the man's one-sided views of women and of the maternal function. Mr. Windsor states that Roosevelt advocated that men and women should desire plenty of children and that these children should be "of the very highest quality." Can he tell us where Roosevelt advocated this ideal of high quality, not to speak of "the very highest"? And whether any method to this end was suggested? . . . I ask this, because the gravest objection that has been found against our present marriage system is that it does not produce children of the highest quality, and I believe Roosevelt ignored this.

I also want to ask Mr. Windsor whether he really knows any sex reformers who think that the highest happiness results from a childless home, in a flat, with frequent changes of partners? If their thinking "seems" this to him, I believe he has colored it with his imagination. I know many sex reformers, and none advocate childlessness or frequent change of partner, but many deplore the sterility of many of the best men and women caused by our present sex system.

I would remind Mr. Windsor that the selfish have never been apostles of a movement; nor can selfish ideals inspire the courage which faces persecution and imprisonment for a principle.

LETTER FROM NEW ZEALAND.

"Okataina," Foxton, Manawatu, New Zealand, April 14, 1905.

Dear Mr. Harman: I have your letter of January 30, for which many thanks. Many thanks also for the twenty copies of Mrs. Dora Forster's splendid pamphlet. I have got my friend the Danish missionary at Potacamund, India, to write a pamphlet about the Todas (a copy of which I enclose), which I think will be useful in the propaganda for securing the freedom of women. I think the marked paragraphs will be useful as showing that women can advantageously be allowed a degree of freedom altogether undreamed of in any civilized nation, except that the sentence I have underlined on page nine shows that, unless suitable precautions are taken, there may be a danger from the point of view of Darwinian "survival." I assure you that if you had lived in India, within a mile or two of these people, as I have, you would appreciate the contrast between the frank, happy, and self-respecting countenances of the Toda women, and the crushed, hunted appearance of the women-folk among the three hundred million monandrous Hindoos of the Plains. I understand that among the Nairs, whom I unfortunately could not visit, the women have an even greater amount of freedom (though it is—alas!—being crushed out by the pressure of the surrounding civilization) than among the Todas, and are even more happy and self-respecting.

I am just getting out a second and enlarged edition of my "Ultimate Problems," and in a few days will send you a copy and one for your daughter. The theological views expressed are very far removed from those of Orthodoxy, but also from those of most opponents of Orthodoxy.

I am glad you like "Jeannette" on a second perusal. I have not yet come across the review of it in Lucifer, but have seen an advertisement of it containing a short extract from the book, illustrating the infamy and blackguardism of the white races towards "hetairai." This ought to be coupled with the classical paragraph on the subject in Lecky's "History of European Morals."

Yours very cordially,

F. W. Frankland.

[The pamphlets came all right, and have been hoping soon to find time to give them a careful review and to print extracts from same in Lucifer, but so far other things have prevented.—M. H.]

Great is Democracy! Under its palladium even the humblest of us has a voice. We are permitted to vote. We elect our public servants. Then we permit our good masters to select a committee to watch our appointees. Then we have a voters' league to keep an eye on the committee. Then we have a society to watch the voters' league. And so ad infinitum.—Selected.

THE FREE SPEECH LEAGUE.

Editor Lucifer: Secretary Mrs. Irwin, having only recently come into the league, is mistaken as to its name. It is not "The New York Free Speech League"—simply "The Free Speech League." So far, at least, as America is concerned, it has no geographical limitations. It is a national, perhaps more correctly, an international, organization, welcoming co-operation in its work from all parts of the continent, as it does from all men and women, regardless of their differences on other issues, who stand for freedom of investigation and expression.

Now is an opportune moment—now, when the enemies of free utterance are so perniciously active—to say that the league needs hundreds, thousands, tens of thousands, of new members. The membership fee is only one dollar a year, and no case can be taken up and fought out before the bar of public opinion or in the courts unless we have the aggregate of many more annual dues than we have now.

Reader, will you not send your name and address and your dollar to the Treasurer of the Free Speech League, Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., 120 Lexington avenue, New York City?

I enclose copies of the League's "Declaration," its Constitution, and Objects, together with letters from well-known men, for which I hope the editor may find room soon.

Edwin C. Walker,
Chairman Executive Committee.

SOCIAL FREEDOM.

Asking the forbearance of subscribers for the booklet, "Social Freedom," for what seemed unavoidable delay, we wish to say that a part of the edition is now ready for mailing. By request of the author, Hulda L. Potter-Loomis, part of the edition contains nothing but the essay itself, with preface and half-tone, full-page picture of herself. Another and larger half of the edition will contain, besides the essay, picture and preface, about ten pages of addenda and advertisements of Lucifer and its literature.

To those who have read "Social Freedom" when first published in installments, no word of commendation is believed to be necessary. To all others we would say that few if any essays published by us have received warmer or more nearly universal approbation.

Price, 20 cents single copy; $1.50 per dozen; $10.00 per hundred, carriage paid.

"GOD AND MY NEIGHBOR."

"God and My Neighbor," by Robert Blatchford, author of "Merrie England," "Britain for the British," etc. Published by Charles H. Kerr & Co., 56 Fifth avenue, Chicago. Price, 50 cents in paper cover; cloth, $1. Some of the chapter headings are:

I, The Sin of Unbelief; II, What I Can and Cannot Believe; III, Is the Bible the Word of God?; IV, Evolution of the Bible; V, What Is Christianity?; VI, Can Men Sin Against God?

This book, as well as "Merrie England," has had a great run, both in England and America, among that class of people who do their own thinking.

Books Ordered.—Friends who have ordered and not received books will please write again. Some of these orders have been mislaid, overlooked or neglected because of absence and press of other work. Some have not been filled because the supply of certain books was temporarily exhausted. Now the prospect is that orders for books and pamphlets will be more promptly attended to in future, whether the editor and publisher goes to prison or not.

Subscribers who receive more than one copy of Lucifer, when not ordered, will please use the extra copy or copies to induce their friends to subscribe, it only for a trial trip of three months for 25 cents. Stamps received in payment. As the paper weighs less than one ounce a copy can sent to a friend in a common 2 cent letter, with an ordinary sized sheet of note paper.

Opinion is not truth, but only truth filtered through the environment, the disposition, or the mood of the spectator.—Wendell Phillips.

LUCIFER: ITS MEANING AND PURPOSE.

LUCIFER—The planet Venus; so called from its brightness.—Webster's Dictionary.

LUCIFEROUS—Giving light; affording light or the means of discovery.—Same.

LUCIFIC—Producing light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing, and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

CONGRESS SHALL MAKE NO LAW RESPECTING AN ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, OR PROHIBITING THE FREE EXERCISE THEREOF; OR ABRIDGING THE FREEDOM OF SPEECH, OR OF THE PRESS; OR THE RIGHT OF THE PEOPLE PEACEABLY TO ASSEMBLE, AND TO PETITION THE GOVERNMENT FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES.—First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

STENOGRAPHIC REPORT OF TRIAL.

Contrary to reasonable expectations we are obliged to go to press without the stenographic report of the examination of witnesses and the judge's charge to the jury. Reprint of this report would take the whole of an ordinary eight-page LUCIFER, so we shall have to cut down the report when we get it, else crowd out everything else. In view of the fact that we still have much matter in type that cannot appear in this issue, and that many excellent articles are waiting their turn, it looks much as though another double number will have to be issued soon.

Whether it would be wise to venture another such issue will depend mainly upon whether the receipts balance expenditures for the present double number. Several friends have ordered from five to ten copies of the "Inquisition" number, but not enough yet to cover the added expenditure.

L. H.

THE TRIAL.

Another trial in the United States court. Another pitched battle between the forces of suppression, of repression, of retrogression, on the one hand, and the forces of free expression, of untrammelled investigation, of human progression on the other, has been fought—and LOST!

Lost, temporarily and locally at least. Lost to the cause of human liberty and of human progress, of science versus superstition and ignorance.

Once more the cause of womanhood and motherhood has been defeated. Once more the demand of womanhood and motherhood for self-ownership, as represented by LUCIFER and its leading writers, has been nailed to the cross of legality, the cross of ignorant and despotic man-made law; crucified in the federal court room in the five-million-dollar temple newly erected in Chicago, and now being dedicated to the worship—of what?

Dedicated to the worship and service of Truth and Enlightenment?

Dedicated to the worship and service of Justice? of equal justice to all and special favors to none?

Dedicated to the worship and service of Liberty? liberty of speech and of press, the palladium or guardian of all other liberties?

Dedicated to the pursuit cultivation of Knowledge—of Science—the only savior of mankind? Dedicated especially to that part of Science called Anthropology?—the science of man? the science which teaches all that is known or can be known of the human organism? the science of life, of creative life? the science which teaches how to create a race of human beings so well born that they will need not to be born again?

On the contrary, is it not apparent, from the history of the case of Dr. Alice B. Stockham and of her business manager, Dr. Beckwith, as well as from the history of the trial of LUCIFER'S editor, that this costly temple—built and paid for by the labor of the ruled and robbed masses, and not at all by the labor of the ruling classes, is it not apparent that this temple is being dedicated to the worship and service of the fetich called "government"?—government of man by man? government of the many by the few? government of the masses by keeping them in ignorance of the basic facts of life, knowledge of which facts would enable them to be self-governing to the extent that they would need no rulers to keep them from invading the rights of others?

After various delays and postponements, causing loss of time to myself and friends who wished to testify in my behalf, and in behalf of the work that LUCIFER is doing, on Thursday morning of last week a jury was impanelled to try the case of "The People vs. Moses Harman"—a most palpable falsehood to begin with. The people of Illinois and of the United States know nothing of the complaints against Moses Harman; but few of them know that such a person exists, and if they did know what he is accused of, I venture to say that not one out of ten, perhaps not one out of a hundred, would ever think of trying to punish him for publishing and mailing the indicted matter, unless or until prompted to do so by the meddlesome and power-loving officials of church and state.

After the jury was sworn—a childish and meaningless ceremony connecting the administration of modern jurisprudence with the ignorant and superstitious past—I was called to the witness chair and told to stand up and take an oath to "tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth."

"I affirm," said I—as much as to say, "I can tell the truth without calling on your God, your fetich, to 'damn' me if I should tell a lie."

Hoping to get the stenographic report of my examination before we go to press, I will not attempt to repeat the questions and answers at this place, but instead will reproduce the Associated Press report sent out by its agent from the court room, but which report was materially shortened by most, if not all, the papers that inserted it at all:

"In a burst of enthusiasm while a witness in his own defense before Judge Kenesaw, M. Landis in the federal court this (Thursday) morning, Moses Harman, advocate of liberal ideas in marriage, declared that the one great fault of the public school system is that the science of (sexual) life is not taught to the children. The aged editor of the magazine, LUCIFER, was testifying in defence against indictments charging him with circulating through the mails undesirable literature on questions of sex. He is 74 years old and has served three terms in the penitentiary in Kansas on similar charges. The court room was crowded with women and men who are followers of the teachings of the editor, and much interest was shown in the words of the old man. He wears a flowing beard of iron gray and long curly hair brushed back from his high forehead. He is somewhat enfeebled by age and a crippled leg.

"The hearing was concluded at the noon adjournment and went to the jury in the afternoon. Judge Landis instructed the jury not to discuss the matter during the noon adjournment.

"In answer to questions of Assistant District Attorney Marston, Harman said: 'I have objected to legislation which places a contraband upon this sort of literature because the legislators set up their judgments against that of all the world. I have been in the public schools in certain parts of the country for thirty-five years, and I want to say that I have found the teaching defective. I have protested against it. I believe the questions of sexual physiology and science should be taught in the public schools. That is the greatest question of all because it has to do with the production of life. It should be the first and foremost scientific study in the schools.'

"Harman declared he has studied sexology the greater part of his life. 'The thought has constantly been in mind since I was a youth. I have taken it upon myself to teach that subject and have written concerning it for twenty-five years,' said the aged defendant. 'I don't consider what has been printed in my paper as obscene. There is no such thing as obscenity. How can there be such a thing in connection with the teaching of nature to man.'

"The counsel in the case completed their arguments in the afternoon, after which Harman requested permission from the court to address the jury in his own defense. The court took the request under advisement and dismissed the jury until to-day, when he will deliver his charge to them and decide upon Harman's request."

When court convened Friday morning my request to address the jury was denied. Then the judge charged the jury in a speech of perhaps thirty minutes' length. After about one hour in the jury room, the "twelve men, good and true," filed into the court room and in answer to the usual question replied that they "find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment." Immediately my counsel, Mr. Steadman, made a motion for a new trial. In reply the judge named eleven o'clock Saturday morning as the time for hearing arguments for same. Meantime, instead of going home as usual, I was taken into close custody by the United States deputy marshal until the question of bail could be decided, pending arguments for new trial. At 2 o'clock the judge decided the old bail bond sufficient, and permitted me to go until Saturday morning.

At the hearing of arguments for new trial Mr. Steadman made what appeared to me a very able plea, on the ground of errors in the charge to the jury and in the rulings of the court while I was under cross-examination. The arguments were not concluded at the hour of noon adjournment, when the court named eleven o'clock, Wednesday, June 21, as the time he would decide whether or not to grant the motion for new trial.

M. HARMAN.

OUR DOUBLE NUMBER.

No. 1042 has sixteen pages instead of the usual eight. The cost of doubling the reading matter is something of a strain upon LUCIFER'S slender resources, but in order to correctly show the animus of the forces arrayed against the freedom of the press, and to show the nature, the breadth and scope of the defense we are trying to make, it seemed necessary, temporarily at least, to increase the size of our Son of the Morning.

To help defray the added expense of this temporary enlargement, also to help defray the expenses of the court trial forced upon us by the postal inquisition, we have asked, and again ask, our friends to send us what they can conveniently spare for this purpose, and receive in return extra copies of the double number at ten cents each, for distribution—for placing upon news stands, upon the tables in public reading rooms, in hotels, in barber shops, etc., etc., wherever men and women do congregate for recreation, amusement, entertainment or instruction, and by this means help to arouse the public conscience from its indifference, its torpor, in regard to the perils that threaten human liberty and progress so long as the agents of the postal censorship are allowed to arrest, and to fine and imprison those who fall under the ban of these meddlers, these self-constituted guardians of public and private morals.

With the double number, now offered at ten cents each, we offer to send, free of charge, copies of No. 1041, containing "Preliminary Skirmishing" in the federal court, "Sinews of War and the Censorship," "The Free Speech League," and other articles suitable for calling attention to the battle now on in Chicago between the forces of Medieval Bigotry, Superstition and Ignorance, on the one hand, and the forces of Freedom, Enlightenment and Human Progress on the other.

M. HARMAN.

THE SPIRIT OF THE OPPOSITION.

Commenting on Dr. Stockham's fine the "Chicago Daily Journal—Oldest Daily Newspaper in Illinois"—has this to say:

"Judge Bethea observes [deserves?] the thanks of the community for punishing Mrs. Alice B. Stockham and her partner in the publication of erotic books.

"Though Mrs. Stockham insisted that her motives were pure, Judge Bethea did not allow that plea to extenuate her offense against decency. Whatever her motive, there was no denial that she had violated the law, and the judge very properly imposed a considerable fine.

"If any newspaper should publish Mrs. Stockham's writings it would be thrown out of the United States mails, the offending edition would be destroyed by order of the court, and the editor would undoubtedly be imprisoned in Joliet. Quite right, too, for the matter Mrs. Stockham's mind runs upon is most filthy, disgusting and pernicious.

"It is possible that this woman really thinks other women ought to be instructed by her in her own peculiar way. But that would only prove not that she is right, but that she is suffering from erotomania.

"However that may be, there is no doubt that Mrs. Stockham's books are dangerous to public morals. They should be suppressed and, if her fine is not enough to force the author to desist from circulating them, sterner methods should be employed.

"Either the prison or the asylum is the proper place for people who can't stop thinking and writing about sex."

Is it because of its great age—sixty-one years—that the "Chicago Daily Journal" is so nearly on the plane of the old heresy-hunters of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries of the Christian Era? So long as the leaders of public opinion talk in this way, is it strange that the agents of the postal inquisition find it easy to secure indictments by grand juries and verdicts by trial juries?

M. H.

FREEDOM FOR GROWTH, AND ITS DEFENSE.

We are told to beware of entrance to a quarrel, but having been drawn or forced into one, the same admonisher bids us so to conduct ourselves that our foe shall know we are there.

Towards the deniers of the opportunity for freedom of expression, our attitude is one of persistent affirmation of the right to such expression of thought as we are impelled to make, this expression being essential to growth. This is the most important principle involved in all our quarrels with the Censorship. When it attacks, we are bound to defend, regardless of our mental attitude towards the incriminated matter.

On the other hand, we are equally bound to endeavor to exercise the best strategy and tactics of which we are capable in doing the work which may lead to conflict with the would-be suppressors of divergence. We have to recognize the fact that many aspects of the sex question cannot adequately be dealt with under existing conditions. We do not know what is the better or the best course to pursue, because we have not had the opportunity to experiment and to compare the results of our experimentation. What men and women can or may do now is one thing; what men and women free from the bonds of superstition and individually independent can or may or will do is quite another thing. Therefore, I hold that much of the work attempted by Mrs. Craddock and Mrs. Stockham, as well as by their predecessors along that line of thought, was largely premature; there could be no full discussion of the issues involved; the scientific opposition could not be heard at all in public exposition, and even the proponents of the variously modified theory have been met by confiscation and imprisonment, which have, virtually, silenced them as public teachers. They taught some truth; they taught some very serious errors; they knew all the time, as we who opposed them knew all the time, that we could not be heard in any adequate fashion in exposing their errors or in reinforcing their expression of truth. Still they kept on in this direction, trying to do work that could have its place only when women and men should be fully free to experimentally investigate and publish the results of their practical researches without fear or favor. Now those of them who are alive know that their side cannot be presented when it goes beyond the merest assertion of the unproved, of the probably unprovable. Is it too much to hope that hereafter we may have more attention given to the entire emancipation of men and women, of women especially, as most in need of it, and less time wasted in speculating about what may be done when this hoped-for day of freedom comes or in trying to impress on the women who live in one world of thought and action what should be done, as it is asserted, by women who are to live in another world of thought and action?

Affirm the right of each woman to the control of her own person.

Affirm the right of either one of any couple to separate life when that person desires it, precisely as in business partnerships.

Affirm the normal nature of sex and its manifestations, the unshame and the sanity of it, from the caress just beyond friendship to the recreation of life.

These affirmations carry with them the denial of all the tyrannies, all the superstitions, all the inanities, all the perversions, of the prevailing sexual existence. In their amplification and exposition there is enough work for a score of Lucifers, for ten thousand speakers and writers. Yes, and for all who really wish to live freer and better. But if any is attacked by the Censorship or the mob for other teachings, defend that one as you would defend yourselves. So thinking, I sent this letter to the Chicago paper named:

Editor Chicago Daily Journal:

You speak of the fate that would befall any paper which should publish the writings of Mrs. Stockham. But is not this largely a matter of geography and time? What, to illustrate, would have been your fate in Russia any time during the last half century had you published there the matter on politics and religion that you have printed here with impunity? In 1784 the publisher of the first edition of Col. Ethan Allen's "Reason, the Only Oracle of Man," destroyed it because he feared the vengeance of offended heaven. A work is not necessarily treasonable or impure because the laws or the public opinion of a certain age or country condemn it, nor because the mind of its publisher age or country condemn it, nor because the mind of its writer or publisher becomes panic-stricken under the shadow of the yesterday of thought.

You admit that Mrs. Stockham may be sincere, that she may think women should be instructed as she seeks to instruct them, but this would only be proof to you that she is suffering from erotomania. Would the fact that a dress or food or drink or exercise reformer thinks the people really need instruction such as he is trying to give them, prove to your mind that he is the victim of some kind of mania and hence has no right to expression, has no place behind the shield of equal law?

It is asserted by you that Mrs. Stockham's books are "dangerous to public morals." In what respect do public morals differ from private morals? And what does the word "morals" mean, anyway, as used in this connection? Does it connote physiological rightness? If so, and if Mrs. Stockham's works tend to produce physiological wrongness, then her arguments should be answered by "the absorbent substitution of the opposite good" in precept, argument, and demonstration. The shame and danger are not that Mrs. Stockham has frankly given her opinion and endeavored to support it by reason and facts, as she uses reason and perceives things in relation, but that others are not permitted to give their opposing opinions and support them by their reason and their perception of things in relation, which we call "facts," for short. But if you use the word "morals" in its supernatural sense, its ghost sense, then it is useless for us to try to get on to a common ground for an examination of this question.

The closing paragraph of your editorial is mildly astonishing, even to one who has read a great deal on the side opposed to thorough investigation of all human problems, including the sexual. You say that "either the prison or the asylum is the proper place for people who can't stop thinking and writing about sex." The human race is on the earth and persists because of two facts, the first of which is its reproduction of its units through the association of the sexes, and the second of which is its utilization of food products. I may be more than usually obtuse, but for the life of me I cannot see why the first named of these facts is not as important to us individually and to the race as a whole as is the fact last named. If those who "can't stop thinking and writing about sex" should be in the prison or the asylum, then, by a parity of reasoning, those—a goodly number, by the way—who cannot stop thinking and writing about food also should be in the prison or the asylum. "The matter Mrs. Stockham's mind runs on" may be "most filthy, disgusting, and pernicious," as you say, but it is not, intrinsically, in the nature of things, one whit more "filthy, disgusting, and pernicious" than is the subject of food, and its cognate subjects, clothes, shelter and exercise.

This is written and mailed before the result of the Editor's trial is known here; may he be more successful than was Mrs. Stockham and my old friend Beckwith. And if beaten in the trial in the court of first action, may he carry it up just as high as is necessary to win, or as high as he can, if the end is the worst. Every victory that the Censorship wins should be permitted to it not at all; it should be compelled to wrest it from our very best, our most protracted, determined, and adroit defense.

TO LUCIFER'S SUBSCRIBERS.

The prosecutions against LUCIFER by authority of the Postal Department of the Washington government make it very important that we be able to make a good showing as to number of bona fide paying subscribers. In reporting the number of subscribers, when called for, we are allowed to count only such as have paid ahead or who have requested the paper continued to their address after time of subscription has expired. We, therefore, very earnestly request,

First, all whose time has expired or is about to expire, to let us know without delay, whether they wish LUCIFER continued to their names or not.

Second, all whose time is paid ahead to send us the names of as many new subscribers as possible, and when sending names of new subscribers it is important that a distinction be made between those who pay their own money and those who do not. While we are very glad to get the names and cash for new subscribers, whether by their own motion or sent by friends as trial subscribers (hoping they will renew for themselves when time is up), it is only those who pay their own money—or what is the same thing, authorize a friend to pay for them—that can be counted in making our report to the Postal Department at Washington.

Shall we hear from you, good friends, all?

HARMAN AND YOU.

It is a mistake to regard the present fight as directed solely against Moses Harman. That veteran champion of freedom is simply your representative and mine. If he goes to prison, every friend of progress is personally assaulted. The revived activity of the enemies of honesty and liberty is part of a gigantic conspiracy against the people of this country. Even the wretched McAfee is but a pawn in the game.

The fight is on. It is medievalism against evolution, superstition against enlightenment, ignorance against intelligence, darkness against light. No censorship can be anything but evil. Only a bad cause fears free speech. Persecution is a confession of weakness and imbecility. The desperation into which the reactionists are thrown is evidenced by such an organ as the Chicago Journal, which has the effrontery to declare that all who write about sex should be sent to the prison or the asylum. Medievalism is indeed near its last ditch, when it so plainly shows the workings of its foul mind. That any subject pertinent to human welfare should be shrouded in darkness, is a conception which only a knavish or incredibly stupid mind could allow itself to entertain.

There is some encouragment in the present situation. If truth were not making some progress, its inveterate enemies would not be so startled and desperate in their efforts to arrest its progress. If their old fetich were not tottering under the assaults of reason, they would not need to prop it up with the shattered fragments of inquisitorial instruments. The martyrdom of Moses Harman, if it must come, will not be in vain. The future is for progress, no matter what fools try to stay her car.

The pity of it is that in the meantime the bravest and most earnest must be sacrified to the sluggish indifference of the mass. A united and unswerving movement for free speech ought long ere this to have been an accomplished fact. It is monstrous that such crises as the extradition of John Turner and the practical murder of Ida Craddock should have produced no universal arousing of public sentiment. Had professed Liberals seized on those occasions to force the issue to the front, the present outrage might have been spared us. As it is, will we awake NOW? Let us save Moses Harman, if not already too late. But if the bloodhounds have claimed him as their victim, let us at least now awake to a realization of the fact that the peril to free speech in America is an issue which far dwarfs all others, and unite, not in a spasmodic outcry, but in a systematic effort to force the fight on this line at all times until the battle is won. The pretended "Liberal" who will not stand firmly for Moses Harman in this fight is an imposter who has no business in the ranks. Only a coward or a traitor would desert at such a crisis.

JAMES F. MORTON, JR.

BEFORE AND AFTER.

The ordinary man expects to obtain by marriage:
A toy.
A wife.
A submissive companion.
A useful ally.
A housekeeper.
A nurse.
A devoted mother for his children.
An angel in alpaca.

The last material is especially mentioned to show that he expects her to be economical. He wishes woman to have all the virtues, and, for private use, some of the vices.

The ordinary man selects the woman who is to be his wife when his mind is as much confused by the fumes of love as that of a drunken person is by those of wine. When the fumes evaporate, he discovers that his imagination has conferred upon her a hundred and one qualities she does not possess. There is deliberate deceit on one side, and there is self-deception on the other. Would an ordinary contract completed under these conditions be expected by any sane man or woman to be satisfactory?

The ordinary woman is trained to catch a man, not to keep a husband. As a girl she dances much, sings more, dresses simply but attractively, smiles when it is to her interest to do so, and is apparently devoted to home. That conduct implies cheerfulness, economy, and contentment. It is, however, only her antenuptial manner. Many a man could describe his experience six months after marriage in these words: "My wife is a parcel of assorted follies and failings, enclosed in a decorative wrapper and labelled 'Mixed Chocolates,' but after marriage I discovered it to be a packet of acid drops." Would an ordinary commercial transaction conducted on these lines be considered honest?—New Era, Cape Town, Africa.

DON'T FORGET, good friends all, to send us names of independent thinkers—New Thought people, Rationalists, Agnostics, Spiritualists, Materialists, Free Religionists, Theosophists—to whom we may send sample copies of Lucifer, "Son of the Morning," "Herald of the Dawn," "Harbinger of the Good Time Coming"! We have some hundreds of copies printed extra each issue for the express purpose of sending them out as samples, and, if possible, we want several hundred new names each week, or each fortnight. And if with the names a few postage stamps can be sent to help pay the cost of wrappers and of mailing, all the better, but send the names!

It is noteworthy, nevertheless, that the freest countries in the world have the most divorces. In countries where a woman can earn her own living she will not consent to live her whole life with an unfaithful or tyrannous husband. The growing economic independence of woman is just as great a cause of divorce as the decline of a belief in marriage as an irrevocable sacrament.—Chicago Tribune (editorial).

Tendency to disease and tendency to vice are of similar origin, and neither can be cured by punishment, vengeance or imprisonment; but all tendency to disease, pecularities, fears, weaknesses and vices in young or old can be cured or modified by favorable environment, suggestive therapeutics, massage and physical culture.—Medical Brief.

To those who have ordered and not received the "Truth Seeker"—Bradford, England, will say we again have a good supply of the two quarterly issues, dated respectively, January, February and March, and April, May and June, which issues will be sent to any address postpaid for five cents each in stamps.

One of the most confusing problems of the age for conscientious thinkers is that which considers mankind in its relation to sex. It is probably true that after this little word of three letters stands the colossal interrogation point of the universe.—"The New Way."

'Tis safe to lay your cares aside
And rest awhile each day;
Be sure no other man will come
And steal your load away.
—Chicago Record-Herald.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Full name and address of writers in this department can generally be obtained on application to the editor.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

J. B. Phinney, Springfield, Mo.—"The enclosed dollar is for ten copies of the 'double number.' May take ten more."

Alex. McVeigh, Miller, W. Va.—"My dear old pioneer, I send ten dollars on the cost of your defense. All I ask is your photograph with autograph. May you win!"

A. B. Fish, Newburgh, N. Y.: "Enclosed find one dollar for defense from Mr. Israels, and sixty cents for six copies of the Inquisition number of LUCIFER to be sent as follows: . . . . Hoping for a speedy victory."

J. G. Lambrigger, Niobrara, Neb.: "Here's a dollar for another year for the bravest paper and the bravest man in America. May you physically survive all your persecutors as your good work will survive their hypocrisy and persecution. Yours for Liberty."

J. K., Boston, Mass.—"Am glad to be able to send in eleven names and an order for $2.75, for eleven three months' subscriptions, hoping more will come of it for LUCIFER. You will certainly need all the bravery, all the patience and all the money you can summon at this time."

Tom White, Krebs, I. T.—"Enclosed find $2—one for renewal of subscription and one for defense fund. . . . So long as the people worship custom for their god, just so long will the workers for humanity be persecuted. But you are good enough and brave enough to stand it. Cheer up! That is all I can say."

Dr. B. L. Hermstadt, Cincinnati, O.—"Next Tuesday your trial comes off and I sincerely hope there may be enough common decency in those that will try you to be just. James Morton told me when here that you were cheerful as ever in your troubles, and it certainly did me good to hear it. I send enclosed $5. Many thanks to you for continuing my papers. Credit both of them and send both in same cover. Send me a copy each of Motherhood in Freedom, 25c; A Freeman's Creed, 25c; The Ascent of Life, 25c; Life, Health and Longevity, 25c; Sex Radicalism, 25c; Marred in the Making, 25c; Sexual Love, What It Is and What It Is Not, 25c; New Hedonism, two copies, 10c. Send bill for these and I will remit soon."

J. E. Phelps, West Sutton, Mass.—"It is a pity that our officials so often leave crime unmolested and persecute virtue instead. Regret I cannot now send something towards your defense; may do so soon. Am a subscriber of many years' standing and hope to receive LUCIFER as long as I live. The enclosed dollar is to renew for another year. Best hopes and wishes."

H. A. Libbey, Boston, Mass.: "The seventy-five copies of 'Love's Protest' received. Would like to send you a check for $200 instead of the two dollars, as enclosed, for which please send copy of 'Child of Love,' $1, and some copies of 'Significance of Divorce,' also a copy of 'Social Freedom,' by Hulda Potter Loomis when ready. The $200 I would send you would be to fight for the cause of freedom as you see it."

Geo. B. Higgs, Kiel, Germany.—"I enclose ten marks in bank notes and if I can do more later I will. It is impossible for me to say much on the subject [of the prosecutions], as I do not know all of the facts, but I do fully realize the importance of the matter and how interested must be every believer in liberty. If you are reprinting Dora Forster's papers in pamphlet form I would like a copy of it. Send me LUCIFER regularly."

Mrs. A. C. Zimmerman, Vineland, N. J.—"The enclosed $2.50 is for two bound volumes of LUCIFER—1904 and 1905. I also want five copies of the Postal Inquisition number. I sent a dollar to Dr. Foote, treasurer of the Free Speech League, for myself and one for a friend who prefers not to have her name published. Whatever becomes of this case, I believe it is telling on the sentiment, the conscience, of the people and will continue to tell."

O. L. Harvey, W. Lafayette, Ind.—"I believe in the sanctity of plighted faith, but would not allow any man or woman to dictate to me or determine for me whom I should love or marry. On all proper occasions I shall say what I think, even though I die for it. If I had been taught the uses and hygiene of the sex organs in childhood it would have saved me years of sickness and failure. Let us teach our children the truth. The truth will make them free. In your coming trial I hope you will bring all the forces of science and of constitutional rights to establish freedom of speech. Whenever I see a man imposed upon I feel like defending him, even if I think him in the wrong. I have never seen anything in LUCIFER that could be called 'obscene.' LUCIFER is incomparably cleaner in this regard than a great many novels that are thrown broadcast upon the public."

E. S. D., California.—"The larger portion of us men have abnormal sex desires, and I think it of the greatest importance in winning the battle you are engaged in for woman's emancipation that this abnormality be overcome. 'Male continence' is one of the grandest discoveries of the age, but with our present abnormal passions few of us men will, or can, practice it. But let any man live for two years on fruit, nuts and grains, properly cooked, and he will find a wonderful change in his cravings for sexual food, and he will have lost all appetite for tobacco and whisky. . . . Cut out all meat, tea, coffee, condiments and pastry, and fill our tables with fruits, green or dried, and with nuts and whole wheat bread, or rye or oatmeal cakes, and we will soon raise a race of men that will have clean bodies and clean brains to work out plans that will not only emancipate women, but greatly enlarge everybody's happiness. Yours for going to the roots of the evil."

C. J. Zeltinger, Zeltonia, Mo.—"Should have forwarded the enclosed $5 promised the 'Defense League' long ere this. I am on the sympathetic side always, but especially so in your case, and hope you may not have to serve a fourth term in prison for the cause of freedom in the love relations of human-kind. You have set us all to thinking on the most important subject which concerns our present and future welfare. I believe we stand at the threshold of the emancipation of woman; but if it comes within your time, it is my confident opinion that it must be along lines of mathematical exactness. So long as we have governments we shall have an intrinsic money system, and we all know that money is the ruling spirit of the realm, therefore we simply have to inaugurate an equitable system of assurance, thus put motherhood on a paying basis. In this wise much could be done to lift the burden of expense from the mind of prospective mothers and subsequent rearing of her offspring.

"Please send copy of 'Social Freedom,' by Hulda Potter Loomis; also Wentworth's essay on 'Significance of Divorce.' Yours for the higher and better humanity."

Ed. Secrest, Randolph, Kans.—"My Dear Old Friend Harman: I see by last week's LUCIFER that the powers that be intend to put you through, and that many of your friends fear that the fate of Dr. Stockham will be yours. So I hasten to send you the enclosed mite ($2.00) toward the defense fund. . . . Little did we think, now nearly two years ago, when we met and mingled with mutual friends under the roof tree of the lowly cottage sheltered by the stately eucalyptus trees on the beautiful avenue in lovely Santa Clara valley, California, happy and free in a 'feast of reason and a flow of soul,' that another outburst of bigoted persecution was in store for you, and that the vial of governmental wrath was to be poured out upon your venerable gray head. . . . While light is breaking in despot-cursed Russia, and a muzzled press hails with joy the dawning day, and hears the death knell of censorship, America, free America, seems to invite the hideous Hydra to our shores, and to offer to expiring Czarism a hospitable asylum under the Stars and Stripes! . . . Rest assured that with your other hundreds and thousands of friends, collaborators and sympathizers I shall watch with bated breath the outcome of the drama to be played in the federal courts by the Great Lakes. While I wish you all the courage and fortitude you need in your hour of trouble and old age, I know that you are ready to say with that of another: 'I am master of my fate, I am captain of my soul!' If more help is needed, command me!

David A. Modell, New York City.—"Circumstances wholly beyond my control having kept me in arrears shamefully long, I now send you two magical dollars, one in renewal of my own subscription to LUCIFER, the other to pay for four trial subscriptions of three months each. . . . So you are again threatened with a spell of persecution at the dirty hands of Mrs. Grundy's self-appointed representatives! Will the bloodhounds never tire of pursuing their lean game? Even dogs are possessed of the feeling of fair play, and do not constantly attack the weak and helpless. The postal authorities would not dare to meddle with the affairs of LUCIFER if it could boast of a circulation anywhere approaching those of the popular magazines. That is why the latter can say what their subscribers want to read, while LUCIFER must not say what the postal censors (non-subscribers, mark you) don't want, do not read, and cannot understand. When by chance or evil design they do look at a copy of LUCIFER their morbid imagination renders all sorts of sights possible to them which to innocent minds and pure hearts do not actually exist. They see but their own shadows. And no wonder they are alarmed! But even the dog in the fable does not chase his shadow forever, let alone barking at it. . . . And if our government censors are not equal to the task of extracting a moral from Æsop's fables, how eminently qualified they must be to sit in judgment upon a publication such as LUCIFER! . . . May you find the strength—and especially the funds—necessary to repulse this last cowardly attack of the enemy. If every permanent subscriber were able and willing to carry all the time four trial subscribers, LUCIFER would soon double its circulation and would no longer have cause to fear prosecution by the postal censors."

A Citizen of Chicago: "To the President, White House, Washington, D. C.: Sir—I have the honor to call your attention to the fact that a large and increasing number of citizens view with abhorrence the prosecution of such persons as Helen Wilmans, Moses Harman, Dr. Alice Stockham and others for alleged infractions of postal regulations. I would respectfully suggest that such prosecutions are more nearly in the nature of persecutions, as no considerable portion of the people call for, or approve of these actions of your officials in these matters. I would further suggest that there are palpable and gross violations of law every day by corporations and that such violations of law are loudly decried by a large portion of our citizens who are praying that legal action be taken. It would appear to me that there is ample work for the officers of justice, and ample scope for their surplus energy in such flagrant and urgent cases without dragging into court on a quibble or technicality Dr. Alice Stockham, who is respected and honored by thousands in all lands."

E. Bodwell, Elk, Wash.: "Enclosed is $2, which please add to defense fund. When bigotry reigns common honesty stands little show. I sincerely believe there are more law-breakers among the law-makers and law-enforcers than among any other class of people, and they surely have less respect for the rights of the people. Hope you will win and thus help to destroy the law under which you are being prosecuted."

W. F., A Pioneer: "It is a blasted shame that Stockham is convicted. Still I hope it may arouse such indignation as to eventually result in good. I am eager to subscribe to a fund necessary to meet the expenses of laying this matter fairly and squarely before the next Congress and demand a revision of our laws. What will it cost to employ such a man as Darrow or Pentecost to present the matter? Or perhaps Mrs. Stockham might be able to arouse the church ladies in her behalf and then the law will be fixed correct, sure! Yours for freedom."

S. O. Bishop, Brodhead, Wis.: "I see by LUCIFER and the card sent me from New York that there is nothing for us to do but to fight it out, though it is much like a toy gun defending against a modern gunboat. I had hoped to be in a position to help in defense, but it is impossible to-day. You can put me down for $5 to be paid later on. The bloodhounds are on our track. You are the victim and the strong hand of the law of the 'Land of the Bond and the Home of the Slave,' is on your neck. Put me down for ten copies of the double number of LUCIFER."

A. Wastall, East London, South Africa: "Am under deep obligation to you for the photo and letter. It seems to bring me more in touch with you to have your picture presence grace my writing table. . . . You say nought of the forthcoming trial. I presume therefore that you regard it with something of old Socrates' philosophic calm. By the way, I received by this mail a copy of Socrates' speeches in his own defense, and his famous discourses on the soul and immortality, with his friends Simmias, Cebes and Crito, in the cell wherein he drank the hemlock—which cell I, of course, visited when in Athens. . . . You, too, are charged with corrupting the youth of America, as he was of Greece. How little we have really progressed since his day! It occurs to me that you would not be displeased to refresh your memory with the details of how this "Superman" comported himself at this time, and therefore I send you by same post this booklet and two other marked journals which I know you will appreciate, the one for its wit and real humor (New Era), and the other for the ripe wisdom of no less an one than Leo Tolstoi ('the Crank') on the Russian crisis."

[The book, "Socrates' Defense Speeches," just received. Many thanks, Bro. Wastall, for this much prized volume, also for the words of sympathy and kind appreciation—all too flattering to me, of course, to be thus compared, even though incidentally, to the great philosopher and reformer of ancient Greece.—M. H.]

Francis B. Livesey, Sykesville, Maryland: "Being as I have had to pull through an arrest all alone, I guess you can excuse me if I don't send much but sympathy for you in your present case. Enclosed are a few stamps by way of good intentions. . . . You know I love Christianity a little; but I must say that in all your persecutions you exhibit what is called 'the meek, humble forgiving Christian spirit' beyond any man I have seen of this age. That alone is sufficient to win to your side both Christians and philosophers. . . . I have always contended that the first great duty of the times is to fight for free mails. I think private ownership the thing. Now that the mails are run at a loss yearly and so discreditably it is not a bad time to contend for this private ownership. Then watch at the same time to keep Comstockism out of them when they come. . . . Am sorry to say that the 'American Press Writers' Association' is defunct. Its new members pursued policies which I predicted would annihilate it. It also forgot all about its original intention of fighting for free press, mails and speech. Each fellow was rather fighting for his own self-aggrandizement. . . . You should come out at least as well as Dr. Stockham."

A faithful and generous friend across the "Herring Pond," in a letter marked "private," says, "I shall be most anxious to hear the result of your trial. It will be a cruel injustice indeed if you are imprisoned or fined for publishing plain spoken opinion. Why we are freer in Antediluvian Britain than in Rooseveltic America!"

WHO IS RIGHT?

I do not often disagree with the editor of LUCIFER, usually finding that his mature conclusions are sensible and convincing. But in a recent number of LUCIFER, which I have not at hand, he said something upon which I wished to remark when I read it, and I have been thinking of it at odd times ever since.

He said, in substance, that if he did not believe that the freedom of women would result in the borning of better and stronger children, he would not be in the work he has chosen and to which he has earnestly devoted himself for so many years. It was in answer to some one who urged that we had no proof that children were better for being born of free and intelligent mothers.

Now, with all due deference, I want to say that I do not believe Brother Harman's statement. I fully believe that, even though it could be proven that free mothers could produce no improvement on the children of the past, Mr. Harman would still be as devoted and sincere in his work as he is now. Is not the greater happiness and better development of women themselves sufficient reason for the great work of endeavoring to emancipate the sex? If he does not think so, we would be compelled to class him with a correspondent he had a number of years ago. This man wrote a letter to LUCIFER describing the act of a Dutch farmer who drove his wife as he did his oxen, with a good long "gad." He used it on her once when she was in a delicate condition and the result was that an idiot son was born to them and proved to be a life-long burden and expense. The lesson the writer drew from this incident was that if only the Dutchman had been taught the consequences of such treatment of prospective mothers he would have refrained from beating his wife at such a time, and been spared the trouble and care of an idiot son. I indignantly exclaimed at the time, as no doubt many other sympathetic women did, that if the Dutch farmer did not know enough to treat his wife decently for her own sake, he could not be taught to treat her kindly even for the sake of sane and healthy children.

I never have been a fanatical advocate of good, common, decent morals merely for the sake of the unborn children yet to come. I deem that there is sufficient reason for refraining from making women slaves, without considering the unborn children in the least. I never have worried about "race suicide," or race degeneration, or race quality. I believe if we see that women are allowed natural freedom, natural opportunities for development and activity, their children will be all right; but, anyway, we want women, as well as all humanity, to be free.

If our devotion to the work of emancipation depended on whether free women always gave birth to better and healthier children or not, I am afraid there would soon be no workers in the field. Because, so far, it has not been proven by actual example. The children that have been wished for, planned for, and the conditions prepared for, have not always been desirable children; often something is wrong—if nothing else, they are apt to be over-sensitive, delicate, shrinking from this hard, cold world. The children born under the average conditions of the world seem better able to cope with it than those brought forth under the most favorable conditions. A polar bear, in order to meet the conditions of his frozen home, must be born there; it would not do to breed him in a warm, genial, protected atmosphere and then turn him loose among the glaciers.

Of course, we must, first of all, have free women. But for their own sakes! They will find out sometime what conditions are most favorable to splendid children. As yet I believe we know but very little about the conceiving, bearing and rearing of the best offspring. And in our ignorant state I would hate to have our devotion to the cause of free women depend entirely upon the kind of children our very few free women have borne.

LIZZIE M. HOLMES.

THE POSTAL INQUISITION AND DR. STOCKHAM.

Judge Bethea's conviction of the veteran woman reformer, Dr. Alice B. Stockham, on a charge of circulating improper literature through the United States mails will bring surprise and dismay to thousands of pure-minded American women who have written letters of thanks to that reputable physician for the valuable information given in the several books which she has written on marriage and motherhood.

It is safe to say that not one woman in a thousand who has read those books ever entertained the suspicion that they contained any improper word, phrase or sentence. They are written in delicate and chaste language, full of motherly sympathy for the countless women whose marital misery has been due in great measure to their ignorance of women's natural functions.

Dr. Stockham's books are devoted almost exclusively to the science of eugenics. The word eugenics is of Greek origin, and literally means good birth. The object of Dr. Stockham's books is to instruct women in the mysteries of motherhood, so that they may bear children well equipped physically and mentally, with little or no ill effect on the mothers. She has won the lasting gratitude of thousands of women because of her success in removing to a great degree the scriptural curse of maternity.

President Roosevelt is no more opposed to race suicide than is Dr. Stockham, but this physician, who has made a study of maternity for a period as long as the entire life of President Roosevelt, believes race suicide can best be prevented and race improvement best be promoted by the production of better children rather than more numerous children.

INTENT OF THE LAW.

"The old-fashioned father and mother believed literature on marriage and allied subjects was not for children," Judge Bethea is reported to have said in his ruling. "The young were told not to touch such subjects, just as they were told not to steal or lie. That is how the government came to have laws regulating the transmission of certain matter through the mails."

It seems to me that this is a remarkable misconception of the intent of the law, which was framed to prohibit the circulation of literature which has a tendency to deprave the morals and corrupt the minds of the young, and not in any degree to prevent the giving of scientific instruction to the mature on the most vital and most important of all sciences to the human race, namely: The science of eugenics, the science of race improvement.

Surely no congressman who voted for the passage of the often misused Comstock law had the most remote idea that he was voting to prohibit his wife or marriageable daughter from receiving advice through the mail from a reputable physician regarding prenatal culture, or the preparation for motherhood.

But, even supposing Judge Bethea is right in his contention that the original intent of the law was to prohibit the giving of such instructions—a supposition which attributes to the legislators a spirit of prudishness that few persons will admit they possessed—the law as framed surely does not forbid the giving of such instruction. It merely forbids the transmission of "obscene or indecent" literature. It requires a great stretch of the imagination to stamp as "obscene or indecent" the chaste and important information which has been given to the women of America in Dr. Stockham's book.

ATTITUDE TAKEN BY BETHEA.

"What we have to do," says Judge Bethea, "is to uphold the law as it stands."

He is right in that assertion, but how he could convince himself that Dr. Stockham's books violated that law will be hard for the many thousands of persons who have read them to understand.

"If these persons believe they are right in teaching these subjects so that the young may learn them they should have their doctrines interwoven with the law of the land," says Judge Bethea.

A remarkable statement! The highest law of the land is generally supposed to be the Constitution of the United States, which guarantees to the people the right of freedom of press and of speech. It is not necessary to have the rights of the people "interwoven with the law"; it is sufficient that they are not forbidden by the law. The admirers of the work of Dr. Stockham have no desire to promote the circulation of literature forbidden by the law; but they contend that it is misconstruction of the law to hold that the instruction imparted in her books is in any way "obscene or indecent."

The learned judge gratuitously injects into his comment the phrase "so that the young may learn them." It is highly improbable that the young would be interested enough in Dr. Stockham's books to read them. Such an objection might be applied to the Bible or to many medical books which a child might read.

ARE UPHELD DESPITE RULING.

"I believe Mrs. Stockham had no intention of violating the law," continued Judge Bethea, in announcing the conviction of her business manager, Dr. Edward B. Beckwith, "but this man, a Harvard graduate and a physician, 35 years old, has been in this business for six years. He should have known better."

The inference is that Dr. Beckwith had the intention to violate the law, an intention which I am sure Dr. Beckwith would indignantly deny. "He should have known better." Better than what? Better than Dr. Stockham, who has given more than forty years of her life to the instruction of women in the functions of motherhood—better than she what is pure and what is impure, what is proper and what is improper for every woman to know?

Those who know Dr. Beckwith, including many clergymen and estimable women in Chicago, assert that he is a man of the highest moral character, thoroughly conscientious, who gave up the prospect of acquiring a lucrative practice as a physician in order to devote himself to what he regarded as a more important work for the benefit of humanity, the freedom of women from the ills due to their ignorance of their physiological natures.

There are at times loud calls for the repeal of the Comstock law concerning the use of the mails, but this cry would never be heard if the law was not so frequently misused for the persecution of those who seek to benefit humanity by imparting wholesome instruction. The law is too sweeping because it does not make clear what "improper" literature is, but it is strange that a federal judge in this enlightened twentieth century could be found who would place such books as Dr. Stockham's under the ban of that law.—Jonathan Mayo Crane, in "Chicago Record-Herald," Sunday, June 11, '05.

NEMO REJOINDS.

I acknowledge error in classing Dora Forster as an anarchist. She seems to use their method—setting up an ideal then making humanity fit it. My intention was not to show "how bad anarchists are," but how they wander without compass, rudder or reason. This leads to foolishness as often as evil. The original discussion cited by Dora Forster was on Peter Kropotkine's reference to astronomy, showing his total ignorance of that science. There was no hint that Kropotkine was "bad." I quote him here:

"The interplanetary and interstellar spaces are peopled and crossed in all imaginable directions by little swarms of matter, invisible (?) infinitely small when taken separately, but all-powerful in their numbers. Among these masses some, like the bolide that fell in Spain some time ago, are still rather big; others weigh but a few ounces or grains, while around them is wafted dust, almost microscopic, FILLING UP THE SPACES." (Anarchy, Its Philosophy and Ideals.) All of which is utter rot.

I thought that a pseudonym signifying "no one" would make personalities impossible. Not so. A stickler is given to discover motives. I am reminded of the small boy who was given money by a man if he would stop talking about the latter's bald head; but the boy's interest in baldness was thereby stimulated.

Let children and young girls be taught the truth. But teach the latter the economic situation and the present nature of the average man; that after her experience with the surgeon and the elderly friend (why not combine the two?) she will not be sought for by the men who want a home and children. They will perform a small part of the function of fatherhood, then leave the mother alone with the economic burden. Get your communal home before you teach methods that presupposes such a home. I will never oppose such an attempt. Even in such a home, one or more of the flashy sort of men may charm all the women; the other men may aver that if they are not to do any of the courting they will not do the work, and secede. Result, an Eden full of Eves and one or two Adams. I have no objections to this if all are suited. Under present conditions women often tire of their plodding partners, and fall in love with some seemingly more brilliant beau. Do you really think husbands will be liberal enough to build the home while the transient butterflies promote free fatherhood?

NEMO.

AS SEEN BY AN OLD-TIME FRIEND.

Dear LUCIFER: Often do I see ideas expressed that I would like to either commend or condemn, but I think there are others who can better teach or criticise than I. So I let it go, and yet we are all needed in this great struggle to free woman from sex serfdom.

I want to emphasize what Mrs. Loomis says in regard to Ella Wheeler Wilcox's position on the sex question, as shown in the quotation from the New York "World." What a grand opportunity Mrs. Wilcox has. Being above reproach, enshrined in the hearts of all intelligent, progressive people, as worthy to be heard on any subject, how she could cover herself with glory if she would throw herself into the work of woman's sexual emancipation.

Dear Sister Ella! have you not a commission for the work? If you have not, we cannot expect you to do more than you are doing, or will do.

I well remember when H. W. Beecher had the opportunity to do great good in the cause of social freedom, by declaring that all is not sin outside of conventionalism—that love can be pure outside of institutional marriage, and that the "grand passion" waits not for man-made laws to open a channel for expression.

I would like to give my thought upon another subject, touched upon by "Nemo" in the same issue, April 27, and to thank him for what he says in regard to young girls and elderly men and surgeons. To me, the idea is utterly repellant that people should try to assist nature in her most holy and sacred work—should try to help the young to sexual experiences. To my mind, love is the only sanction for the sex act, and I think this truth should be taught to the young of both sexes—and perhaps some older people might profit by the thought—and that the selection of a sex mate in accord with their needs of affection and companionship in the most important event in their whole lives; and that promiscuous sex relations—before or after they have found their own—would be a great obstacle in the way of their present or future happiness.

So I would like to emphasize the thought that the young should wait for the approval of the God within—wait till they feel certain that they make no mistake, before they enter into such relations, a mistake that would leave its baleful effects upon all their after lives.

It seems to me that to conserve the vital force for the development of the noblest, highest, sweetest and best in manhood and womanhood is far better than to dissipate it for the pleasures of a moment. It seems to me, moreover, that sex reformers do not make it plain enough that their effort is not for more license, but for the release of the sex slave, and to provide conditions for an improvement in all that goes to make for a better manhood and womanhood in the present and future life of the race.

EXTRACTS FROM "WOMAN REVEALED."

The awakened woman knows that she holds in her grasp a mighty franchise. She knows that in the creative world she wields that franchise; that she not only has the power of physical causation, but mental as well, to conceive and mold man, body, mind and soul. Her influence begins at a far more remote period in his existence. She has in her keeping the mystical chalice for inception, conception and fructification; therefore, her influence begins with inception; her potent thought for truth and honesty and equality must necessarily be stamped upon the race before physical conception takes place.

Here begins her overshadowing influence. It is here, at this vital point in woman's existence, that she discovers her greatest responsibility; it is here woman must find her noblest and only assured opportunity for enfranchisement. Her full enfranchisement depends upon her universal thought that all souls are equal; that as she conceives her children shorn of all doubt concerning this equality, so will they come into the world endowed with the belief that there is no question to be decided.

Her supernal privilege of forming her child as she most desires and her divine principle of motherhood is her franchise! Woman should realize that through these she has more power, although it may seem intangible, than if she were granted universal opportunity at the polls. Through this channel her voice may be lifted over all lands with such power and force that she will be proclaimed "Speaker of the House—the Universe!" The right to hold the gavel with which she shall call the house to order is her divine right of creativeness!

When she recognizes this power and this right, woman will remain no longer unfranchised, but will be recognized as master of the ballot—the vital issue of every business venture—the spirit back of every project—the potent factor of every social, domestic, financial and political undertaking.

THE SOCIAL GENERAL STRIKE.

"The Social General Strike" is the title of a new and important pamphlet translated from the German of Arnold Roller, and which is calculated to attract the attention of the working classes in general. It is now ready for distribution, and all comrades and social radicals may feel that they have an efficient instrument for the furthering of propaganda.

The translation of this pamphlet into English at the present time, when organized capital is straining at the throat of organized labor, and while a strike of importance is being conducted, and while interest in strikes and discussion of them is common throughout the country, is most timely, and a very large circulation of the pamphlet is looked for.

All comrades and friends of social freedom should now bestir themselves to give "The Social General Strike" the widest possible circulation and publicity, and should use it as a means of propaganda wherever labor and capital are at war, or are likely to be.

The price of the pamphlet is 5 cents a copy, or $2 (two dollars) a hundred.

Workingmen of America, read this remarkable pamphlet, and understand what a mighty weapon the strike furnishes you with in your fight for freedom, and fraternity. Spread the tidings throughout the fields and factories of this country, that the "Social General Strike" is the final evolution of strikes; the final means of proletariat emancipation.

Orders for the pamphlet should be sent to the Secretary of the Press Committee, Theo. Appel, 468 S. Halsted St., Chicago, Room 10. Cash should be sent to the Treasurer, Aug. Freyman, 209 Larrabee St., Chicago, Ill.

EXTRACTS FROM "MAJESTY OF SEX."

Both Man and Woman must be free in concept regarding the purity and holiness of sex-relationship, or it will become a consuming fire producing diseased results, restlessness and unhappiness in all conditions.

Any undue attempt or inducement to coerce either man or woman breaks in upon the harmony of interaction, throwing everything out of equilibrium, be it household or business affairs. In itself sex-interchange is pure, but of all passions most likely to be abused. This renders perfect purity of concept absolutely necessary; and if this cannot be attained to, it is better to debar one's self entirely and lead a life of celibacy, for the soul cannot evolve its supreme power where there be any taint of evil or where fear lingers.

By the art of creation or sex-interaction and in accordance with divine principle, man will demonstrate and manifest greater life, perfect health, larger power, exquisite happiness in all sexual fulness. Without an established principle and by the observation of it, there can be but a relative pleasure in communion between the sexes. Infinitely observed the exchange of sex-fore is a most sacred and holy relationship.

Perhaps the time has come for the modern nations when, ceasing to be children, they may even try to learn it." 25c.

TOKOLOGY. A book for every woman. By Alice B. Stockham, M. D. Illustrated. Tokology teaches possible painless pregnancy and parturition, giving full, plain directions for the care of a woman before and after confinement. The ailments of pregnancy can be prevented as well as the pains and dangers of childbirth avoided, and women need not go down to death giving birth to children. English, German or Swedish. $2.25.

HILDA'S HOME; A Story of Woman's Emancipation. Rosa Graul. With Macaulay, Rosa Graul would say, "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman will be less loving and lovable, or that man will be less manly and honorable. On the contrary, she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish. 424 pages. Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

THE NEW HEDONISM. Grant Allen. The opening paragraph says: "The old asceticism said: 'Be virtuous and you will be happy.'" The new Hedonism says: "Be happy and you will be virtuous." In another place the writer says: "In proportion as men have freed themselves from mediæval superstitions have they begun to perceive that the unclean and impure things are celibacy and asceticism; that the pure and beautiful and ennobling thing is the fit and worthy exercise of the reproducing function." Paper covers; 30 large pages; twelve copies, 50c; single copy, 5c.

VICE; ITS FRIENDS AND ITS FOES. Edwin C. Walker. Contents: Brotherhood of Man; The Recognition of Facts; Folly of "For Men Only"; Definition of Vice; Horrors of Prostitution; Abnormal Sexuality; Errors of Fathers, Mothers and Teachers; Persecution Does Not Reform; Prostitution and the Crusaders; The "Spoiling of the Heathen"; What Are the Effects of Raids and Crusades? The Economic Side of the Problem; Party Politics in Vice Crusading; In What Does Prostitution Consist? Some Causes of Prostitution; Two Kinds of Prostitution Compared; The Opponents of Divorce; "Purifying" the Tenements; Action for Advanced Women. With appendix: The Wanderings of a Spirit; Our Fair Civilization, the Folly and Cruelty of It All. 15c.

OUR WORSHIP OF PRIMITIVE SOCIAL GUESSES. E. C. Walker. Contents: Love and Law; The Moloch of the Monogamic Ideal; The Continuity of Race-Life, and Tyranny; Food and Sex Fallacies, a Criticism; When Men and Women Are and When They Are Not Varieties; The New Woman; What Is She? What Will She Be? The State Hiding Behind Its Own Mistakes; Bishop Potter's Opinion of Divorce; Love; Its Attraction and Expression; Is She an Honest Girl? Lloyd, Platt and the Pitiful Facts; Social Radicals and Parentage; Anthropology and Monogamy Love and Trust Versus Fear; Reflections upon Reading William Platt's "Women, Love, and Life." 15c.

LOVE'S COMING OF AGE. Edward Carpenter. This is a book with which few will wholly agree, but which nearly every one can read with profit and enjoyment. The subject is the relation of the sexes in the past, present and future, and it is treated with absolute frankness and fearlessness by a writer who unites a broad outlook, a strong grasp of his subject and a charming literary style. The following table of contents will indicate the line of thought followed by the author: The Sex Passion; Man, the Ungrown; Woman, the Serf; Woman in Freedom; Marriage, a Retrospect; Marriage, a Forecast; The Free Society; Some Remarks on the Early Star and Sex Worships. Notes on the Primitive Group Marriage; Jealousy; The Family; Preventive Checks to Population. The book is printed on extra book paper and handsomely bound in cloth. $1.

KAREZZA. Ethics of Marriage. Alice B. Stockham, M. D., author of Tokology. Karezza gives a high ideal to parental functions and pleads for justice to the unborn child. Karezza is really a supplement to Tokology and elucidates a theory of marital relations, which leads to individual growth and a closer bond of union, the practice of which at all times gives complete control of the fecundating power. Karezza controverts the prevailing ideas of baseness and degradation associated with the sexual nature, makes a plea for a better birthright for the child, for a controlled and designed maternity and aims to lead individuals to a higher development of themselves, through a knowledge of their creative powers. Karezza is the product of knowledge and experience, and is presented to the world with a deep abiding faith, that its teachings will lead individuals to purer lives, to right understanding and appreciation of the sex functions, to intelligent control of propagation and finally through right adjustment in most sacred relations, to the ideal marriage. Levant cloth, prepaid, $1.

THE RIGHT TO BE BORN WELL.

[As very suitable and pertinent to the question how to secure the best results in creating new human beings, the following paragraphs, selected from Dr. Alice B. Stockham's "Tokology," are herewith given a place in LUCIFER and in our forthcoming pamphlet with the above title. The selections were made for our use by Mrs. Bertha Moore, of Portland, Oregon.—M. H.]

PAINLESS CHILDBIRTH.

Pain in childbirth is not natural.

It is an abnormal condition, caused by an unnatural manner of living.

Lower animals, in their free, natural condition, do not suffer in bringing forth young.

The women of many foreign nations have no pain in childbirth.

Pain in pregnancy and childbirth is unnatural and can be prevented and entirely avoided by all who are not too greatly diseased or deformed, and even in cases of disease or deformity the pain and danger may be greatly lessened.

The majority of women will have very little suffering in pregnancy and childbirth if they will observe the following rules:

Food and drink should be chosen that lack in bone-forming material.

The fruit and rice diet prevents the diseases of pregnancy and the sufferings of parturition.

Feast on fruits and outdoor air, should be the pregnant woman's motto, and it is a most excellent rule for every one, at all times.

Rice contains no bone-forming material. Rice and fruits should be the main articles of food during pregnancy.

Lemons, oranges, apples, pears, peaches and plums are the best of fruits.

Garden vegetables, excepting beans, can be used freely.

Potatoes, corn, milk, butter and sugar can be eaten in moderate quantities.

Wheat bread and eggs can be partaken of very sparingly.

Lean meat is the very worst food that a pregnant woman can eat. It contains a large percentage of bone-forming material.

Beans come next and should never be eaten at this time.

Also oatmeal, barley and rye should be entirely excluded from the diet.

If pregnancy is several months advanced before the fruit and rice diet is begun, the juice of at least one lemon should be taken daily. Two or three would be better.

The object of this is to dissolve, as much as possible, the bony material which has already been built up in the child.

Do not fear that the fruit and rice diet will have a detrimental effect on the child. On the contrary, the effect of this diet is very beneficial to the child. Children thus treated are more graceful, athletic and strong, as they grow up, than are those whose bones are harder.

The dress of every person at all times should be supported by the shoulders and perfect looseness, lightness and freedom be secured.

It is very essential that the pregnant woman have this hygienic dress.

The "union" undersuit should be worn and the "princess" underskirt and dress. (A princess garment is a union of skirt and waist). Let no article of dress in the least interfere with and waist). Let no article of dress in the least interfere with perfect respiration, digestion and circulation. To accomplish this, one must do away with all bands, bones and unsupported petticoats. It is better to sew the underskirt to the waist instead of using buttons. The waist may be made sleeveless and open at the back, if you choose, with one button at the top and another at the waist line, and with or without darts. The underarm seams are sufficient.

Comfortable shoes should be worn, with broad soles and low heels. A garter made of wide tape or ribbon, put twice round the leg just below the knee and tied as loosely as possible, is much more healthful than the patent stocking supporters. No corset of any kind should be worn, either loose or tight.

Full and deep breathing is necessary. Oxygen is a food. Never uplift the shoulders and chest in breathing, but expand the ribs, chest and abdomen. Live much out of doors and keep the house full of outdoor air both night and day. You must have oxygen, both for yourself and child. Open the windows and doors wide and give a cordial welcome to outdoor air.

The corset is an instrument of torture, bringing misery to millions, both born and unborn.

Face a draft and it will not harm you.

Bad air is more to be feared than burglars.

Frequent bathing is very beneficial to the pregnant woman. The sponge or towel bath, taken with a little good vinegar in the water, is very refreshing. The sitz bath is one of the most desirable baths, during gestation. Tepid water should be used, unless for the relief of pain or inflammation, when hot water should be used.

For the relief of pain in any part of the body the hot water bottle is the best little doctor known.

The pregnant woman should have an abundance of congenial and moderate exercise. General housework is desirable, if washing, scrubbing and heavy lifting are avoided.

Light gardening is good, also free, easy walking in common sense shoes and common sense garments.

Exercise should not be carried to actual fatigue. Excessive toil robs the child of vitality and is often the cause of nervous, puny children. It also robs the woman of needed vitality, and if a woman toil beyond her strength during pregnancy, she will not return to her normal form as nicely as she otherwise would.

Excessive galeties of fashionable life are as bad as overwork. They deprive both mother and child of vitality, but an idle, dependent life is not desirable and must be avoided. Keep the mind occupied with some pleasant employment and as free as possible from anxieties.

Rest as frequently as the need of it is felt. Lie down and relax every voluntary muscle and nerve in the body. This is perfect rest.

"It is natural and reasonable that the mother should be exempt from the sexual relation during gestation."

Sexual intercourse at this time exhausts the mother and impairs the vitality of the child. It also causes abnormal sexual development in the child.

The mother's mind should be free from the subject. For this reason separate sleeping apartments would be best.

Much of the suffering during pregnancy and much of the pain at parturition are caused by sexual indulgence during gestation. Entire continence during pregnancy must be preserved, if the best conditions for mother and child are desired. Disastrous consequences inevitably follow the practice of sexual indulgence at this time.

Such is the intimate connection between mother and unborn child that the exercise of any faculty of her mind or organ of her brain and body stimulates and develops in proportionate degree the corresponding faculty, or organ, in the child.

Therefore, it is plain that sexual intercourse during gestation is a crime, for truly it is a crime to cause a person to be burdened for life with an abnormal sexual appetite. It is as bad as to burden a person with an abnormal appetite for intoxicating drink, or an abnormal appetite for murder.

After parturition, at least two months should pass before sexual intercourse is allowed.

That sexual intercourse during pregnancy is not natural may be proved by observing the manner of life of natural animals. The female never admits the male during gestation, and the male never attempts to force the female at this time, nor at any other time.

If force ever occurs, it is a violation of nature—a result of some abnormal condition. Among natural animals sexual intercourse never occurs except for the purpose of reproduction. This is Nature's way, and it is dangerous to disobey, and use this function for other purposes, as abnormal sexual appetite is apt to be the result.

Whoever claims that the reproductive function should be used for other purposes is either possessed of an abnormal sexual appetite or is more sentimental than sensible.

However much or little this abnormal sexual appetite is indulged, the indulgence of it must be strictly excluded from the time of prenatal influence.

FROM A LAWYER'S STANDPOINT.

Moses Harman has been convicted again, and unless the Circuit Court of Appeals reverses the sentence of the District Court, he will probably serve a year in the Joliet Penitentiary.

The statue under which he was convicted prohibits lewd, lascivious and obscene publications. Articles which have a tendency to stimulate erotic emotion can with some certainity be classified as lewd and lascivious. It is, however, extremely difficult to designate in any terminology that which is obscene. Judges vary greatly in defining it, perhaps depending upon their neuropathic conditions.

Dr. Stockham's "The Wedding Night" was sold at $3 a copy; it omitted no details. Its publication was largely a commercial proposition. It was, from a conventional standpoint, exceedingly more suggestive, lewd and lascivious than the most suggestive portions of Venus and Adonis.

Dr. Stockham was found guilty and fined $250.00. Moses Harman, for a less offensive article, is sentenced to the penitentiary. This discrimination in fixing a sentence is void of all reason and justice and only has a tendency to increase the already very great disrespect for the law.

Moses Harman, in a sense, was trapped into prison. In discussing the subject of sexology, it is impossible for Harman to go to a lawyer or judge for assistance or guidance.

The Police Gazette and the Elite are admitted to the mails and there seems to be no Judge Landis or Bethea or public prosecutor startled into action. That Richard K. Fox is a man of great means cannot be the reason, but the fact remains that they send through the mails, coarse, smutty and suggestive pictures and paragraphs.

In Russia there is a censorship. It not only prohibits but points out what can be published or printed with impunity. If you violate the instructions, you take your chance in prison or Siberia.

In "my own, my native land" we have a censorship, the postal authorities and the other officials have the authority to stop non-mailable matter and to confiscate the same by sending it to the Dead Letter Office; they prefer not to confiscate, but to permit the offense then prosecute and convict.

Harman could go to the United States authorities, submit his paper, and they refuse to answer. He could go to a lawyer, and the lawyer may misinform him. He only learns his right, or rather his privileges, within prison walls.

A lawyer to venture an opinion, must compare his knowledge of what is ordinarily permitted to go through the mails with the the two articles which were published by Harman, which have absolutely no tendency to excite the passions, and passing a favorable opinion, pass his client into the penitentiary.

For instance, the following poem appeared in the Literary Supplement of a Chicago Daily.

It was written by Gilder, editor of the Century Magazine and is also to be found among his "Poems and Inscriptions." The Chicago Daily was circulated indiscriminately among young, old and infants. With some trepidation I suggest its publication in LUCIFER, feeling that as it passed through the mails that precedent will not be broken for the purpose of sending an old man to jail.

I ask Judge Landis, the prosecuting attorney and the readers of this paper to read this poem:

"If lest thy heart betray thee,
Thou to one lover would not constant be,
And yet thou would love me—
This boon I pray thee:
Divide the dark from light,
Love me by night.

"If thy sweet thought would find me,
Not through the garish day Oh, Give it wing.
In shadows clasp and clasp and cling.
And bless and blind me!
When stars are still and bright—
Love me by night.

"In longing dreams I'll name thee;
In secret hours when breathes the midnight rose,
Thy heart in mine shall close—
Great love shall claim thee,
O mine in dark and light,
In day and night."

Now eliminate the beauty of the style and considering only by comparison the articles in LUCIFER with this poem, does it not appear more suggestive and inviting than the cold bald statements appearing in Harman's paper?

The indictment was a myth, the trial a farce and the cause of imprisonment an equivocation. A paper with only two or three thousand circulation is not racy; a racy paper would have 100,000. Harman's crime is that he opposes the present marriage system and publishes a paper in opposition thereto. Without monogamy, without inheritance through the father to the legal child, the present property system would fall into shreds. Harman is attacking the institution of private property, the property of the man; of the man holding capital in the ox and in his wife.

The state—the capitalists—will not care for children; the woman cannot; so man must individually be made to care for them. Love, affection, compatibility do not enter into present society ethics. The absence of any one of these elements will not justify separation or divorce. Monogamy will only exist when the women insist upon it, and they can do so only when they are economically free.

With sincere hopes that no over-susceptible reader will discover any unusual stimulation of his cerebellum and paralysis of the cerebrum, I remain sincerely.

SEYMOUR STEDMAN.

THE REAL CAUSE OF LUCIFER'S OFFENSE.

Mr. Stedman errs, it seems to me, in his characterization of Dr. Stockham's judicially condemned work. Shakespeare's "Venus and Adonis," if I remember correctly, is a glorification of physical love. Dr. Stockham's "Wedding Night" is a clearly worded letter of instruction to the married, written apparently with the purpose of teaching them the laws of health in marriage in order that both man and woman could live happy, healthy lives, and pass on a heritage of health and happiness to their children. To Oliver Wendell Holmes, I believe, is attributed the assertion that "To reform a man we must begin with his grandmother." Dr. Stockham realized that it is impossible to reform the grandparents of the present generation; but she evidently believed it both possible and desirable to properly instruct the potential grandmothers of future grandchildren. I believe that "The Wedding Night" is a work of great value in the hands of young women who seriously desire to so live that their offspring may be healthy, strong, happy, intelligent.

In asserting that the articles on which the editor of LUCIFER'S prosecution and condemnation were based were "less offensive" than Dr. Stockham's "Wedding Night," Mr. Stedman does not take into account, for the moment, the real cause of LUCIFER'S offense. That cause is LUCIFER'S advocacy of self-ownership and self-control in the intimate relations between men and women, and its ignoring of the man-made rules which nominally attempt to regulate such relations. This real cause of offense was plainly stated by Mr. Hull, the superintendent of second-class mails at the Chicago postoffice, when he told the editor that in his opinion every issue of LUCIFER is "unmailable," and gave as his reason not that every issue contains obscene and indecent language, but his belief that "If your [the editor's] ideas were to prevail, society would be in a state of chaos." In this view of the case, and when due consideration is given to the fact that Dr. Stockham does not oppose the present marriage system but simply informs people how they may live in marriage in a way to insure their health and happiness, it is not surprising that the sentence of the editor of LUCIFER was the heavier; rather, is it surprising that Dr. Stockham was not let go free, and the editor of LUCIFER given the extreme penalty of ten years' imprisonment. But though courts may emulate the example of the old lady who tried to sweep back the sea with her broom, they will as signally fail as did she; for they cannot stop the advancing tide of thought even though they should succeed in suppressing LUCIFER and imprisoning its editor for life. Fortunately progress does not depend entirely on the life of one paper or of one man; though each individual, even though in himself weak, may be a factor in the progress of the race.

The father of Judge Landis fought, and, if I mistake not, died, in the battle of Kenesaw Mountain in the so-called civil war. Thence the judge received his name—Kenesaw Mountain Landis. Had the judge's father, I wonder, "formed the eccentric habit of courting" death in battle? Surely it would be as fair to so assert as it was for Judge Landis to assume that the editor of LUCIFER had "formed the eccentric habit of courting imprisonment." It is probable that the soldier did not really desire to be killed; perhaps he thought that in risking death he was being of service to humanity. Certainly the editor of LUCIFER, like other men, prefers freedom to imprisonment, life to death; but, like the conscientious soldier he willingly risks liberty and life in the endeavor to be of assistance to his fellow men. WHAT OUR EXCHANGES SAY ABOUT IT.

"The people's Press," a small but very much alive weekly paper, published at 111 Blue Island avenue, Chicago, has this to say in regard to the late sentence against LUCIFER'S editor:

"Moses Harman, publisher of LUCIFER, the ablest paper published on the sex question and woman's freedom, has been sentenced to one year in the penitentiary for obscenity in publishing an article by Dora Forster. This article was too far advanced and too broad for the narrow minds of Christians (?) Any one who has heard Mr. Harman lecture or who knows him personally can have nothing but respect for that grand old man, over 70 years old, and we hope that all lovers of freedom of speech and press wil contribute to raise a fund to appeal his case. Send contributions (be they ever so small) to 500 Fulton street."

Many thanks, Brother Lenau, for manly protest and for kind words of appreciation. Though mainly devoted to industrial or economic freedom, the "People's Press" recognizes the importance of the agitation to which LUCIFER'S pages are mainly devoted. For many months it has carried an advertisement of our "Son of the Morning," and has long shown a bravely fraternal spirit toward us in many ways. It is published at the low price of fifty cents per year of fifty-two issues, or less than one cent per copy. It is the determined foe of all slaveries, all superstitions, and well deserves the earnest and liberal support of all lovers of freedom and of justice.

And here is what a much older and much larger reform journal, the "Truth Seeker," New York, has to say:

"Both of the Chicago prosecutions under the Comstock law have resulted in conviction. On June 6 Judge Bethea of the Federal court directed a subservient jury to bring in a verdict of 'guilty as charged in the indictment' against Dr. Alice B. Stockham, author of 'Tokology' and other works of that nature, and against Edward B. Beckwith, Dr. Stockham's business manager. On June 15 a similar verdict was returned against Moses Harman, the publisher of LUCIFER. In both cases an appeal will probably be taken. Dr. Stockham and her friends, it is said, are well able to 'make a fight to the finish,' but the case is different with Mr. Harman, who needs all the financial assistance he can get. Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., 120 Lexington avenue, New York, will receive contributions for the defense. A strong protest should be made against these prosecutions. Though it may not be fully effective, it will influence the public mind against further proceedings of the same nature. Communicate with Dr. Foote, learn the facts in the matter, and then, if you believe in it, do something to help vindicate the liberty of discussion."

The "Truth Seeker" is published weekly at $3 per annum. If any reader of LUCIFER has never seen a copy of this, the largest, and, as I think, the oldest, of the American Free-thought journals, I would advise such reader to send ten cents for a sample copy. The thanks of all lovers of truth and human progress are due to the editor of the "Truth Seeker" for his fearless championship of freedom of speech and of press.

THE CRIME OF INFANTICIDE.

[The following article is written by Ella Wheeler Wilcox as a comment upon the case of Clara Adler, a young girl arrested and to be tried for murder on the charge of infanticide.]

Before any jury decides to execute the girl who has slain her fatherless baby, in terror of the world's scorn, let all the wives of the land who have slain their unborn children because they did not want to be bothered with their care and expense be brought up for trial.

Child murder is murder whether the invisible child's heart beats under the mother's or visibly moves the cambric robe lying in her arms.

Fashionable women whose attendance at fashionable churches is unremitting, aided by fashionable medical accomplices, commit the crime of murder of unborn children all over our Christian land, and walk abroad unmolested by law. Were any physician, in any community, to state the number of respectable women and wives who appeal to him for such criminal collaboration, the world would be astonished at his reply.

Many of these women go about their project in cold blood, with no reason save selfishness and love of pleasure as incentives. This poor crazed girl committed her dreadful act in a frenzy of shame and terror—shame at her loss of self-respect, terror at the world's hand lifted against such offenders of established laws of civilization. She had loved as primitive woman loved, and followed the will of her lover, believing all he promised. She forgot self-protection in her love, and sacrificed pride, but there was no thought of sin in her mind. She was in God's sight, more truly the man's wife than many a woman who walks down church aisles, while the organ peals forth the wedding march, with hatred and disgust in her heart for the man whose gold bought her.

The child born of love of the mother for the father alone is legitimate in the sight of the Great Creator of All Things. No legislature, no court, no marriage laws can make the children conceived in hatred or indifference legitimate.

But the world needs laws and marriage. Imperfect and crude as our social conditions are, they are the best for the maintenance of order and decency which have yet been formulated.

The woman who fails to give her child the seal of love has wronged it for time and eternity. The woman who has failed to give her child the sanction of church and law has wronged it for its earthly span of life.

And she has wronged herself by descending from the standards set by the world and society for her to maintain. God made love, and man made marriage, and woman must follow the dictates of both before she brings a well born child into existence. Unfortunately, public opinion ignores the violation of God's law, and gives all its condemnation to the violator of man's law. The worst devil conceived by superstition never fashioned a hell so terrible as this world of church-going people provides for an erring woman.

It was the thought of her suffering and of the suffering of her fatherless child in this earthly hell which drove Clara Adler to her awful crime.

God pity her, and all like her; and God speed the day when the world will remodel its ideals of what constitutes illegitimacy and true motherhood. Progress speed the day when the man who deserts the mother of his child will share whatever punishment may be meted out to her by society, or courts of justice, for any desperate act. Childless wives, who hide dark secrets under lace covered breasts, as you sit in divine service next Sunday, send up a prayer to God for poor Clara Adler.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox, in "Chicago American."

A PROPHECY.

The great Swedish botanist, LINNAEUS, saw his works burned by an ignorant mob a little over one hundred years ago, because they treated of the sex of plants. Now every student of botany is familiar with the reproductive functions of the vegetable kingdom, and Mr. LUTHER BURBANK of Santa Rosa, California, is astonishing the world with the use he is making of such knowledge. Now, I predict that some day—maybe another century hence, judging from present indications—school children will be so thoroughly educated in regard to the human reproductive functions that the most perfect specimens of the human family ever born into the world will appear on this planet—not by chance, but by wise propagation. With the present discouraging indications, my prediction may look decidedly dubious, but it is sure to be realized some time, and the martyrs of to-day are preparing the way. You and Dr. Alice B. Stockham and others engaged in this educational work must suffer the penalties for your crimes (?) and misdemeanors (?).

LOVE'S PROTEST.

Taking a hint from the many calls for Lucifer containing the article "Love's Protest," by Lady Florence Dixie, we have printed several thousand leaflets of that article and of "Radical Drama," by Jonathan Mayo Crane—the review of "Ellabelle." This leaflet will be sent to any address for 10 cents per dozen or 50 cents per hundred, in postage stamps. Some of our friends have adopted the plan of dropping Lucifer leaflets on the seats of street cars, in R. R. stations or enclosing them in letters, etc., after the methods found effective by propagandists of all schools. That these methods of sowing Lucifer seed has already produced fruit we have good reason to believe.

LUCIFER: ITS MEANING AND PURPOSE.

LUCIFER—The planet Venus; so called from its brightness.—Webster's Dictionary.

LUCIFEROUS—Giving light; affording light or the means of discovery.—Same.

LUCIFIC—Producing light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing, and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

CONGRESS SHALL MAKE NO LAW RESPECTING AN ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, OR PROHIBITING THE FREE EXERCISE THEREOF; OR ABRIDGING THE FREEDOM OF SPEECH, OR OF THE PRESS; OR THE RIGHT OF THE PEOPLE PEACEABLY TO ASSEMBLE, AND TO PETITION THE GOVERNMENT FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES.—First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

ANOTHER EDITION CONFISCATED.

Wednesday, June 21, 365—1895—there was deposited in the general postoffice at Chicago, an edition of LUCIFER numbered 1042, for mailing to subscribers. It was a double number, 16 pages instead of the usual eight.

Much time and labor had been expended on this edition, to say nothing of money. We had promised our readers something of a history of the "Postal Inquisition," both as to origin and practical working. We had asked for orders for extra copies of this edition for free distribution, or for sale among the friends of subscribers, hoping in this way to get some help towards defraying extra expense. To this request some of our old-time friends and helpers had responded promptly and liberally.

Several subsequent or supplementary bundles of this edition, in answer to calls, were deposited for mailing within the next seven or eight days following the first deposit, never for one moment suspecting that the first and main deposit had not gone to the subscribers.

After a week of anxious waiting, having received many complaints from subscribers of the non-arrival of LUCIFER, I decided to investigate. Calling at the office of Mr. Paul Hull, Superintendent of Second Class Matter, Chicago, I was informed by him that the edition had not been sent to subscribers, giving as a reason that the paper contained "unmailable matter."

When asked for the articles or paragraphs objected to I was shown the letter of Sarah Stone Rockhill, and a selection signed Nancy McKay Gordon, both printed on the last page of the paper except one.

In reply to further inquiries Mr. Hull said the edition would be held till word could be received from headquarters at Washington, when, if the decision should be that these articles are not obscene the edition would be sent to subscribers; if the decision should be adverse, the papers would be held subject to orders from the postmaster general's office.

* * *

Next day I received the following notice:

General Postoffice, Finance Division, Chicago, Ill., office of Second-class Matter. P. H. Chicago, June 30, 1905.
Moses Harmon, Publisher LUCIFER THE LIGHT BEARER, Chicago, Ill.

Sir—The Postal Department at Washington has ruled that the issue of your publication of June 22 contains obscene matter and is unmailable.

Respectfully,
P. E. COYNE.

Accompanied by my lawyer, Seymour Stedman, I immediately called on Mr. Hull and asked for the return of my property, maintaining that the P. O. department, having refused to send LUCIFER No. 1042 through the mails, has no further right, duty or concern in the matter. That the postoffice department is not part of the judicial branch of the government, but simply part of the executive branch and that until condemned by the judiciary my property cannot lawfully be confiscated.

In reply Mr. Hull said, "this is a question with which I have nothing whatever to do. I simply obey orders. My orders are to send the paper to the dead letter office at Washington. I have done this. The papers have already gone.

We then, Stedman and I, went to the Assistant Postmaster, Mr. Hubbard, and received similar answers. He said our only hope for recovering the edition lies in writing to the First Assistant Postmaster General at Washington.

In reply to a question in regard to the right of the P. O. to confiscate my property without any judicial proceedings Mr. Hubbard said, "Such things are done by the police department, as when they destroy 'chips' and other furniture of the Chicago gambling houses"—forgetful, apparently, that the police have a warrant from the city government to destroy the furniture of gamblers of a certain class, but that no warrant has been issued, so far as known to this deponent, to any one to destroy the property of LUCIFER'S office without first bringing the publisher into court and giving him a chance to defend himself against the charge of printing and trying to mail unlawful literature.

I asked Mr. Hull if he would read "the proof sheets" of my next issue of LUCIFER and decide whether the matter is mailable before the edition goes to press.

"No, I will not," said he.

"Do you read copies of all the papers published in Chicago before you allow their several editions to go into the mails?" I asked.

"Certainly not," said he.

"Then why should my paper be discriminated against? You say you read a copy of each edition carefully before allowing it the privileges of the mail," said I. "Why this discrimination?"

"You know the answer to that question as well as I do," said Mr. Hull, with a meaning smile.

As I write these lines there comes to my ears the continuous roar of burning gun-powder, the offerings of a grateful people for the blessings of liberty, of justice to all alike, and of special privileges for none.

How much reason have the publisher and the patrons of LUCIFER for thankfulness that we are living in the United States of America and not in England, France or Russia?

M. HARMAN.

WHAT OF THE FUTURE?

That is, what of the future of LUCIFER, THE LIGHT BEARER—sometimes called "Son of the Morning," "Herald of the Dawn," and other synonyms of the grand old name Lucifer—one of the oldest, most beautiful, most expressive, most honored and honorable of all the names connected with the most ancient, most noble and ennobling of all the purely physical sciences, the science of astronomy—science of the stars.

Yes, what of LUCIFER'S future? Our Son of the Morning has passed through many critical periods, many trying times, in the twenty-five years, nearly, of its existence, but in none of these critical periods did there seem to be such combinations of adverse forces as at the present moment. Never before have we faced judicial rulings so thoroughly hostile to freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom of discussion upon the subject that of all subjects needs the light of free investigation, of fearless, honest, untrammelled investigation, as does the subject of SEX, involving and including as that subject does the right of woman to self-ownership—ownership of her creative powers and functions, and the right of the child to be born well, if born at all.

Out of the sex-enslavement of woman—as can be easily shown, grows all other slaveries, including economic or financial slavery, industrial slavery, political slavery, religious slavery, intellectual or mental slavery, and so on to the end of the chapter of slaveries. As so forcibly argued by Grant Allen, Walt Whitman and other independent thinkers and writers, "Sex contains all!"

Hence all other reforms must wait upon sex-reform. Hence all ologies are subsidiary to Sexology; all sciences secondary or third-rate in importance to Sexual Science.

Looking for causes, is it not because of their knowledge of these basic facts that "the powers that be" are now so thoroughly bent upon silencing all inquiry—through the public press and by private letters even—into the morality or the immorality of our present sexual and marital codes?

Do not these ruling powers instinctively feel and know that freedom of discussion on sex-lines would, in the end, destroy the present division of mankind into the two divisions of rulers and ruled, of robbers and robbed, of masters and slaves? and that sex-freedom, including freedom of womanhood and motherhood, would make an end to the power and privileges of these ruling classes?

As stated elsewhere in this issue the Superintendent of Mails at Chicago has given LUCIFER'S editor plainly to understand that in his opinion no edition of LUCIFER should be allowed to pass through the mails. This was said after declaring that he has no personal feeling against said editor, but that, on the contrary he has uniformly tried to construe the postoffice rulings favorably to that individual.

If these utterances mean anything at all they would seem to mean that any future edition of LUCIFER is liable to be held up in the mails, confiscated and sent to the "Dead Letter" office, there to be destroyed, as was done with number one thousand of that publication, and as it now appears probable, the much larger and much more important number 1042 will share the same fate.

Facing this contingency I now ask LUCIFER'S subscribers, "WHAT SAY YOU ALL?"

Yours for the fight for the right of free discussion.

M. HARMAN.

ELECTED FOR A FOURTH TERM.

The following City Press Dispatch, of June 28, is self explanatory:

"Moses Harman, 74 years old, was sentenced to one year at hard labor in the penitentiary by Judge Kenesaw M. Landis of the United States District court, this (Thursday) morning. The court allowed the man the privilege of bail in $1,500 so that he may take his case to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals. He made no demonstration when he learned of the sentence and feels confident that the upper court will reverse the findings of the jury in Judge Landis' court.

"Harman is an advocate of liberalities in married relations and publishes the magazine known as LUCIFER THE LIGHT BEARER. He has served three short terms in a Kansas penitentiary for persisting in publishing this paper. His publications strike at the base and sacredness of marriage on scientific grounds, and lengthy discussions on this subject are carried on in the publication from various writers. A motion for a new trial and an order in arrest of judgment were denied by Judge Landis yesterday (Wednesday)."

The reporter was quite correct in saying, "when he (Harman) learned of the sentence," for I did not hear the sentence delivered by Judge Landis, although sitting within a few feet of his chair. Partially deaf I tried hard to follow what he was saying, but his tones were low and weak, for the most part, and must have been particularly so at the close of his talk, else I would have heard enough to understand that he was sending me to prison for a year.

I had come to the court-room prepared to make a little talk, in view of a possible sentence. Not for one moment did I suppose the judge would fail to ask if I had any thing to say why sentence should not be entered against me, in case he should decide not to grant me a new trial. He had denied me the citizens right to address the jury in my own behalf, which denial was wholly unexpected and wholly without precedent in similar cases, so far as I then remembered, but to deny me my manhood right to say a few words to the judge before receiving such a weighty sentence as a year in prison would be to add outrage to injury—as I then believed and still believe.

Through life I have adopted, as a leading maxim the admonition,

"Judge not, that ye be not judged."

That is to say, I have habitually declined to sit in judgment upon or to condemn the motives of those from whom I may differ. We can take cognizance of the word and the act of our fellow human beings and approve or condemn, but the motive that prompts the act and the word must always, more or less completely, elude our ken.

But while this is true we all very naturally seek for the causes of all phenomena, including, of course, all human acts and words. Very naturally we seek to know the hidden springs of human conduct. We all seek to know, as far as possible, the whys and the wherefores—in accord with, or because of, that other well known principle or maxim, "By their fruits ye shall know them," and "The tree is known by its fruits."

Why, then, should I be denied the right—or privilege, if the reader prefers that term—of addressing a few explanatory words to the jury that was to determine the question of my guilt "or innocence," and why should I be denied the right or privilege of addressing a few words to the judge whose official duty it becomes to affix the penalty, in case the jury decides that I am guilty of violating the man-made statute concerning what is technically known as "obscene" literature?

Imprisonment for one year at hard labor is a punishment so serious that no sane and humane man, it would seem, would or could inflict it upon a fellow human being without very grave reasons for so doing.

The question of motive, of probable motive, is always a factor, if not the chief factor, in determining the guilt or innocence of any act. To ascertain the motive of human actions the most important method, as well as the most natural and rational method of procedure, is to hear what the actor himself has to say in explanation of his act. No one can know what the real motive underlying any act was, or is, so well as the individual who performs the act, and in the absence of overwhelming evidence to the contrary the testimony of such actor should be accepted as conclusive.

So much impressed with the truth of this principle were the sturdy, the truth-loving and liberty-loving old Romans, during the earlier and better years of that great nationality, that it was accepted by them as a fundamental principle of jurisprudence that no one should be condemned until heard in his own defense. Civil laws and customs in England and her colonies—of which colonies the United States are part—are supposed to date back to ancient Roman laws and customs for their authority.

While wishing to give Judge Landis the benefit of the doubt—while remembering that he is comparatively a young man and that he is one of the later appointees to a chair in the Federal court, and therefore liable to make unintentional mistakes, I simply cannot escape the inference, the mental conviction, that he did not want the defense of my motives in publishing the indicted articles to be heard in the Federal court room, because of the possible effect of such defense upon the minds of the hearers, upon the minds of those who have hitherto paid but little attention to such subjects, and especially that he did not want the jurors to hear my motives defended.

Several utterances of Judge Landis seem to confirm this inference. As when he said in summing up, that "While the defendant claims to be conducting his paper in the interest of scientific investigation alone, an examination of the paper itself does not confirm such claim"—or words to that effect, and yet he utterly failed to point out or quote anything in the copies of LUCIFER, held in his hand, to prove the truth of such statement.

Again when my friend Stedman was presenting his exceptions to the rulings of court, and asking for a new trial, Landis used words like these:

"Your client, Mr. Stedman, has apparently formed the eccentric habit of seeking imprisonment"—thus plainly indicating that he considered me a fanatic on the sex question, and that to gain notoriety as an apostle of sexology I court incarceration in the penitentiaries.

If I correctly understand the meaning of these and of similar utterances it is not strange that Kenesaw M. Landis should think it useless, or worse than useless, to give me a hearing in my own behalf, and that he agrees substantially with Judge Bethea that sex, or sexology, is not a proper subject of discussion, public or private.

Judge Bethea, who with Landis, is a recent appointee to the Federal "bench," in his ruling in the Stockham case, took the ground that sex is not a proper subject of discussion, either in public or private, and we all know that courts have the habit of following precedents, instead of trying each case on its merits alone. By this method courts are tied back to the past; they become ultra conservative, reactionary, non-progressive, non-humane if not inhuman.

In other words, by depending on precedents the tendency is always to make a fetich of the letter of the law. The law is magnified and made honorable at the expense of justice, at the expense of humanity, of manhood, of womanhood, until the opinion or doctrine seems to prevail that human beings are created for the law, for the honor and glory of the law, and for the honor and glory of the officials who expound and enforce the law, rather than the doctrine that laws are made for man, for woman, for the use and benefit of human beings; not for the honor, glory and emolument of law-makers, of judges, of sheriffs, prosecuting attorneys and other officials connected with the administration of human law.

The quoted press dispatch gives correctly my present status before the Federal courts in this city. M. HARMAN.

Once more sincerely thanking all our co-operators in this line of work, since last credit, we ask all who have not yet ordered books or papers to be used in educational work, to the amount of their cash contributions, to do so as soon as convenient. In this way the good results of their contributions will be cumulative.

TO "FREE SOCIETY" SUBSCRIBERS.

We have now been sending you LUCIFER for some three months, or more. While a comparative few have answered our request to let us know whether they want LUCIFER, a large majority of F. S. subscribers still remain silent. Once more we earnestly request an early answer to this question:

Do you want to be considered subscribers to Lucifer, and are you willing to help win the fight for freedom of speech and of press on ALL lines of reform?

If you do NOT want LUCIFER it will cost only one cent to so notify us on a postal card.

Hopefully yours for the right, M. HARMAN.

BOOKS ORDERED.—Friends who have ordered and not received books will please write again. Some of these orders have been mislaid, overlooked or neglected because of absence and press of other work. Some have not been filled because the supply of certain books was temporarily exhausted. Now the prospect is that orders for books and pamphlets will be more promptly attended to in future, whether the editor and publisher goes to prison or not.

A red or blue cross means, your subscription has expired, and you are respectfully requested to renew, or at least to let us know whether you wish the paper continued to your address.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Full name and address of writers in this department can generally be obtained on application to the editor.

We are always glad to receive calls from friends visiting the city. Take the Lake street elevated, stop at Ashland avenue, walk one block east, then one block north. Or take Fulton street electric car west and stop at St. John's place, alighting in front of our house. The Lake street electric and Paulina street cars also pass within a block of our residence.

Otto Wettstein, La Grange, Ill.: LUCIFER No. 1042 has not reached me. What's the matter? Are we living in Russia or in the country founded by Washington, Jefferson and Paine?

O. L. Harvey, W. Lafayette, Ind.: No LUCIFER has arrived yet. One reason I subscribed for your paper was to learn about your trial and its outcome. I am still in ignorance; but I see you are not in the penitentiary.

T. Sakai, editor of "Chokugen," Tokio, Japan, May 23, 1905.—"Dear Comrade: I have received your letter and 'Sex Radicalism.' Am now reading the book with great interest. Thanking your kindness, I am yours fraternally."

F. H. Bergman, Chicago: Find inclosed $3. Credit my subscription one year; send LUCIFER six months to inclosed address, and use balance for your defense fund in your gallant fight for free thought and free motherhood. With great esteem and fraternal greetings.

Mattie Day, Philadelphia, Pa.: LUCIFER No. 1042 has not reached me. Is it a postal hold-up? I want to receive LUCIFER whether the postal officials think it is best for me to have it or not. I can decide that matter for myself. My heart's best wishes to you and yours.

H. C. Hanson, Aurora, Ill.: We have not received LUCIFER No. 1042 [the suppressed number] yet. Find inclosed $1 to apply on my subscription and 25 cents for trial subscription to accompanying address. With emphatic protest against the postal inquisition, I sign myself your friend and comrade.

H. Scott Bennett, State Parliament House, Melbourne, Australia.—"I strenuously object to the suppression of free speech under almost any conceivable circumstance. Will send subscription later. Yours in the cause of mental and economic freedom. . . . Would be glad to have correspondence with readers of your paper."

Elmer Ellsworth Carey, [associate editor and manager of "Suggestion," Chicago.]—"Dear Mr. Harman: Just a line to tell you that your work will some day be appreciated. You have the consolation of knowing that while you are punished for daring to express your thoughts, you have a long line of goodly company extending back even to Socrates."

B. F. Cheney, Chicago, Ill.—"I am very sorry to hear that you are again sentenced to go behind the bars for trying to enlighten people in regard to social relations, and in truths relating to sex. But the sex relations and all matters pertaining to sex are under the ban and woe to him who does not obey orders and keep quiet in regard to such things."

O. N. Bancroft, Bartow, Florida.—"I enclose a mite, $2.50, to assist in your successful (as I hope, forever) defense of free speech, and a free press, as constitutionally provided. . . . I hope you will win out in freedom, and may the right prevail. Your paper is very interesting, and I like its present form. Should my time expire while I am absent this summer and fall, keep it coming and I will pay for it all."

Dr. S. A. West, Rock Port, Mo.—"My Dear Brother: Your communication has been received, also the books which you mailed. I have gone through them with you, and I must say the work which you have done is by far the most important ever undertaken and championed by any man in the open field of this great world of mind. . . . It has required a steeled and invincible spirit, and you have certainly ruled this spirit with a rod of iron! You have scattered the fire of truth; you have arranged the records and opened the 'way' for coming generations, who will, in due time, understand your spirit, and call you 'blessed!' Whether a hundred years or as many minutes, life is sweet in the moment in which a duty has been rendered unto ourselves through service to a principle belonging to all! You are father, son and brother to womanhood, and there is no higher estate or reward than this."

Geo. J. Callender, Trinidad, B. W. I.: I herewith inclose $3.11—$2 for the good of the cause, and $1 for LUCIFER to be sent one year to inclosed address. I have received a circular from the Free Speech League requesting aid for your cause, to which I shall endeavor to contribute later. Yours for liberty and progress.

A. B. Fayve, Chicago: I have received but one of your papers since the middle of May. If I wish to read and will pay for as clean and instructive a publication as LUCIFER, I don't understand the right of government to keep back my mail from me. As I understand it, the government is the people. I am one of the people, and I want to receive LUCIFER.

Lady Florence Dixie, Glen Stuart, Scotland: I shall be most anxious to hear the result of your trial. It will be a cruel injustice, indeed, if you are imprisoned or fined for publishing plain-spoken opinion. Why, we are freer in antediluvian Britain than in Rooseveltic America! With sincere good wishes, I am always most truly your friend and sympathizer.

J. F. Paulson, Chicago: Received sad information of your sentence, the meaning of which is understood only by those who love liberty. Not many do we find who appreciate your work in the cause of true motherhood, mankind, and liberty. You are a century in advance of the common understanding, for you to be a target for persecution is certainly most painful to your friends. I should be glad to render some assistance now, but must wait a little longer.

E. B. Foote, Sr., M. D., Larchmont, N. Y.—"Inasmuch as the Junior has been taking LUCIFER right along, I have had access to it each wek, but as every subscriber counts, I think I ought to add my own name. I therefore enclose $3, for which you will mark me up for the time it will pay for. There are no names that I could give you from this place, for it is a very conservative neighborhood. I trust you may come out of your difficulty right side up."

Bertha Moore, Portland, Ore.—"I enclose $2. One is for re-subscription and the other is to help in the cause of free speech. I enclose an article which you can publish if you wish. If published, I want two or three hundred leaflets struck from the same type, perhaps more.

[The article is a good one and will be printed if we can find room. Thanks for present help as well as for many similar favors in the past.—M. H.]

Olivia Freelove Shepard, Home, Wash., June 2, 1905.—"Moses Harman, Dear Friend of Freedom: I have just read Lois Waisbrooker's new edition of "Woman's Source of Power." It is a clear, calm, strong, highly vitalized statement of the greatest need of the age—woman's ownership and control of her own being. Its logic is simply unanswerable, and I wish I had means to put it in the hands of every woman and those of every man who has an awakened conscience concerning his treatment of her."

A. E. Clark, Hecla, S. D.—"If I were big enough, I would have things different. Of course, I think your work has crowded old Mother Grundy off of a considerable portion of her easy seat, but it will take a few generations that are at least well born to entirely knock her out. . . . As long as we have so many pin-headed blatherskites in the country, they will crowd themselves into the offices, as I have not observed any office seeking the man. I do not go much on that old saw, and we find our offices filled with men who never made a success of their own business, and have no capacity. Men who are capable of successfully managing their private business are not looking to the public for an idle teat. . . . So I do not look for much improvement until we get intelligence enough to grade up the whole mass to a higher degree of perfection, and look upon our officers as our servants. Now we elect and appoint men to rule and govern us, and they would be simple, indeed, if they did not give us what we deserve. We are as Bryan says of the Democratic party. . . . The first thing we should do is to deserve success. When we as a people deserve to govern ourselves, we will do it, but until then we will have to be governed by the incapable class, who hypnotize themselves into the belief that they can govern us very much to our advantage. . . . I send you draft for $2.00 to extend my subscription two years. Occasionally I hand out LUCIFER, but it does not seem to tickle the common palate as well as the popular rifraff. . . . I hope your fare in prison will develop your muscle so you can wield the pick with renewed vigor, that you may get a hole through the shell of ignorance and hypocrisy and let in the light of reason, which will right all wrongs."

A. L. Heuple, Hot Springs, Ark.: We send $1 as a trifle to help you in your fight, and would make it more if we could. I cannot see what there is to find fault with in "Sex Radicalism" though I re-read the tenth chapter, which I understand is the one complained of. It is certainly ideas that they are fighting this time. I cannot see how a charge of obscenity could possibly be maintained before any fair-minded person, but where there is so much prejudice everything is possible. Mr. Heuple says he is glad you gave Mr. McAfee an idea of what you thought of his prosecutions. We hope you will come through all right.

Martin Nortvedt, Laurium, Mich.: I did not receive LUCIFER No. 1042. I suppose you were not able to get out your paper on account of your trouble with "Mother Grundy." Hope you will come out of it with flying colors. You know I don't like to miss a single copy; that's why I write to you. Yours for freedom of thought, press, and speech.

[A considerable number of our subscribers have also concluded from the non-appearance of LUCIFER that none was issued; when, on the contrary, a double number was printed and deposited in the postoffice as explained elsewhere in this issue.]

Arthur Wastall, East London, Cape Colony: Have been wanting LUCIFER to take up with the "Round About" correspondence plan, and the R. A. to embrace the wider field of sex ethics which LUCIFER champions, and now comes a woman who promises to do the very thing with a new organ. Well, we shall see what she turns out. I am convinced that both Miss Bacon's journal and yours will be benefited. There is lots and lots of room along these lines. Glad you save your eyes as much as possible, but you mustn't suppose I expect you to reply to my scrawls. You are too busy a mortal for that. Stick to the helm as long as possible and save yourself all possible in order to do this, and we shall all be thankful. With every good thought.

Lucy E. Parsons, Chicago: I have just this minute learned of your sentence to one year in prison. To say that I am shocked and saddened by the prospect of your threatened incarceration is to use language too mild to express my real feelings. It matters not how we may differ as to which must be first secured—economic freedom or sexual freedom—we know that both are necessary and must come, and those who suffer in the cause of either must not be allowed to suffer without enlisting the sympathy and support of the other. I inclose $1 now and will try to do more later on. Dear old comrade in the cause of woman's emancipation, I had hoped that you would be able to pass your few declining years in freedom, but it seems that it must be otherwise.

M. M. J. M., Chicago.—"A shudder runs over me as I realize the purport of your note stating that you have been sentenced to one year in the penitentiary. . . . Possibly it is needless to state that I am not in thorough accord with the utterances of LUCIFER on the marriage question. Probably not one-half of those who subscribe for the paper believe as you do. Still it is the boast of all Americans—and I am proud of my birthplace—that freedom of thought and speech are guaranteed to all. I know there is a free press! The Chicago American is ample proof of that. Or, can it be that I am mistaken; that it is only the fear of what might be done with the glittering hoard of wealth that Hearst controls that keeps the 'law enforcers' at a distance?

"It would appear to one who would see fair play that the punishment is uncalled for. But you are not the only martyr. Joseph Dunlop suffered imprisonment for publishing a line of 'ads.' that had previously been allowed to appear in other papers of Chicago. A similar line has been running in one of the dailies since Dunlep's imprisonment. Why the discrimination? Ella Wheeler Wilcox, in a recent article, practically voices the sentiment expressed in LUCIFER. Yet neither Mrs. Wilcox nor the publisher are prosecuted. One law for all would seem to be fair. I presume the inquisitor concluded I might suffer morally, so he refrained from delivering the last issue of LUCIFER.

"Brother Harman, I trust your days at Joliet may be brightened by your honest belief that you are doing a good work. It seems too bad that you should suffer at your age for a cause that at best can bring you little reward and scant thanks from those whom you seek to benefit."

Tom Swinburn, Charleston, W. Va.—"From my inmost soul I hate tyranny, whether it be in Russia or in the United tSates. I shed my blood for the preservation of this Union. Am crippled for life, and if anything could make me regret the suffering and sacrifice freely laid upon the altar of Union, it would be such damned idiocy and despotism as the postal authorities are displaying to please a set of ninnies. They show the quality of their bravery and magnanimity by jumping with both feet on a poor little sheet like LUCIFER, while they never disturb the powerful dailies nor large magazines. . . . I am paid up and intend to keep paid up as long as LUCIFER interests me as it does now, no matter whether I agree with it or not, and I will get as many more to subscribe for it as I can."

Frank Kremer, Chicago: Inclosed find $2, for which send LUCIFER three months to each of inclosed eight names. The last number of LUCIFER which I received was 1039, and I thought it was suspended until you got through your trouble. I will not express my sympathy to you in regard to your sentence. I suppose you get enough of that, because it is cheap; and what you really need for your fight—that is, money—it is something of which I can send but little.

[One of the best ways to help LUCIFER—if it is not really the best—is to send trial subscriptions; but we hope our friends will let us know if the names are sent with the consent of the trial subscribers. If consent is not given when names are forwarded, we wish to be notified so that we may write and ask if papers are desired. Such assistance in the circulation of LUCIFER is gratefully appreciated.]

S. Gelus, Worcester, Mass.—"Enclosed find $5.10, for which credit me one year on subscription. I hasten to renew, since I appreciate the contents of LUCIFER better than any literature received by me. Send me the following: 'Woman's Source of Power,' 25c; 'Law of Population,' 25c; 'Curse of Maternity,' 25c; 'Prodigal Daughter,' 25c; 'Creative Life,' 25c; 'Strike of a Sex,' 25c; 'Woman in Her Relation to Church and Canon Law,' 10c; photo of M. Harman, 25c. For the rest send me 'Wedding Night,' by Dr. Stockham. Sorry I cannot contribute more to the Free Speech fund. Must do something later, for it is my liberty as well as yours that is assailed."

["Wedding Night" cannot be obtained for love or money. The fine exacted from the author, Dr. Alice B. Stockham, by the United States authorities, in obedience to the demands of the postal inquisition, closes the sale of this very excellent educational document until a wiser and better administration of public affairs comes into power.—M. H.]

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS.

BOOKS AT HALF PRICE.

To encourage our friends who are buying books for free distribution or for circulating libraries, we have decided to offer the following books at half price for the next three months. Part of these books are of our own publication; others have been either donated to us to help our work along or they have been purchased by us at rates that will justify the reduction named.

The prices named are the common retail prices. We offer them postpaid at one-half these rates.

ANOTHER EDITION CONFISCATED.

Wednesday, June 21, 1905—1895—there was deposited in the general postoffice at Chicago, an edition of LUCIFER numbered 1042, for mailing to subscribers. It was a double number, 16 pages instead of the usual eight.

Much time and labor had been expended on this edition, to say nothing of money. We had promised our readers something of a history of the "Postal Inquisition," both as to origin and practical working. We had asked for orders for extra copies of this edition for free distribution, or for sale among the friends of subscribers, hoping in this way to get some help towards defraying extra expense. To this request some of our old-time friends and helpers had responded promptly and liberally.

Several subsequent or supplementary bundles of this edition, in answer to calls, were deposited for mailing within the next seven or eight days following the first deposit, never for one moment suspecting that the first and main deposit had not gone to the subscribers.

After a week of anxious waiting, having received many complaints from subscribers of the non-arrival of LUCIFER, I decided to investigate. Calling at the office of Mr. Paul Hull, Superintendent of Second Class Matter, Chicago, I was informed by him that the edition had not been sent to subscribers, giving as a reason that the paper contained "unmailable matter."

When asked for the articles or paragraphs objected to I was shown the letter of Sarah Stone Rockhill, and a selection signed Nancy McKay Gordon, both printed on the last page of the paper except one.

In reply to further inquiries Mr. Hull said the edition would be held till word could be received from headquarters at Washington, when, if the decision should be that these articles are not obscene the edition would be sent to subscribers; if the decision should be adverse, the papers would be held subject to orders from the postmaster general's office.

* * *

Next day I received the following notice:

General Postoffice, Finance Division, Chicago, Ill., office of Second-class Matter. P. H. Chicago, June 30, 1905.
Moses Harmon, Publisher LUCIFER THE LIGHT BEARER, Chicago, Ill.

Sir—The Postal Department at Washington has ruled that the issue of your publication of June 22 contains obscene matter and is unmailable.

Respectfully,
F. E. COYNE.

Accompanied by my lawyer, Seymour Stedman, I immediately called on Mr. Hull and asked for the return of my property, maintaining that the P. O. department, having refused to send LUCIFER No. 1042 through the mails, has no further right, duty or concern in the matter. That the postoffice department is not part of the judicial branch of the government, but simply part of the executive branch and that until condemned by the judiciary my property cannot lawfully be confiscated.

In reply Mr. Hull said, "this is a question with which I have nothing whatever to do. I simply obey orders. My orders are to send the paper to the dead letter office at Washington. I have done this. The papers have already gone.

We then, Stedman and I, went to the Assistant Postmaster, Mr. Hubbard, and received similar answers. He said our only hope for recovering the edition lies in writing to the First Assistant Postmaster General at Washington.

In reply to a question in regard to the right of the P. O. to confiscate my property without any judicial proceedings Mr. Hubbard said, "Such things are done by the police department, as when they destroy 'chips' and other furniture of the Chicago gambling houses"—forgetful, apparently, that the police have a warrant from the city government to destroy the furniture of gamblers of a certain class, but that no warrant has been issued, so far as known to this deponent, to any one to destroy the property of LUCIFER's office without first bringing the publisher into court and giving him a chance to defend himself against the charge of printing and trying to mail unlawful literature.

I asked Mr. Hull if he would read "the proof sheets" of my next issue of LUCIFER and decide whether the matter is mailable before the edition goes to press.

"No, I will not," said he.

"Do you read copies of all the papers published in Chicago before you allow their several editions to go into the mails?" I asked.

"Certainly not," said he.

"Then why should my paper be discriminated against? You say you read a copy of each edition carefully before allowing it the privileges of the mail," said I. "Why this discrimination?"

"You know the answer to that question as well as I do," said Mr. Hull, with a meaning smile.

As I write these lines there comes to my ears the continuous roar of burning gun-powder, the offerings of a grateful people for the blessings of liberty, of justice to all alike, and of special privileges for none.

How much reason have the publisher and the patrons of LUCIFER for thankfulness that we are living in the United States of America and not in England, France or Russia?

M. HARMAN.

WHAT OF THE FUTURE?

That is, what of the future of LUCIFER, THE LIGHT BEARER—sometimes called "Son of the Morning," "Herald of the Dawn," and other synonyms of the grand old name Lucifer—one of the oldest, most beautiful, most expressive, most honored and honorable of all the names connected with the most ancient, most noble and ennobling of all the purely physical sciences, the science of astronomy—science of the stars.

Yes, what of LUCIFER'S future? Our Son of the Morning has passed through many critical periods, many trying times, in the twenty-five years, nearly, of its existence, but in none of these critical periods did there seem to be such combinations of adverse forces as at the present moment. Never before have we faced judicial rulings so thoroughly hostile to freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom of discussion upon the subject that of all subjects needs the light of free investigation, of fearless, honest, untrammelled investigation, as does the subject of SEX, involving and including as that subject does the right of woman to self-ownership—ownership of her creative powers and functions, and the right of the child to be born well, if born at all.

Out of the sex-enslavement of woman—as can be easily shown, grows all other slaveries, including economic or financial slavery, industrial slavery, political slavery, religious slavery, intellectual or mental slavery, and so on to the end of the chapter of slaveries. As so forcibly argued by Grant Allen, Walt Whitman and other independent thinkers and writers, "Sex contains all!"

Hence all other reforms must wait upon sex-reform. Hence all ologies are subsidiary to Sexology; all sciences secondary or third-rate in importance to Sexual Science.

Looking for causes, is it not because of their knowledge of these basic facts that "the powers that be" are now so thoroughly bent upon silencing all inquiry—through the public press and by private letters even—into the morality or the immorality of our present sexual and marital codes?

Do not these ruling powers instinctively feel and know that freedom of discussion on sex-lines would, in the end, destroy the present division of mankind into the two divisions of rulers and ruled, of robbers and robbed, of masters and slaves? and that sex-freedom, including freedom of womanhood and motherhood, would make an end to the power and privileges of these ruling classes?

As stated elsewhere in this issue the Superintendent of Mails at Chicago has given LUCIFER'S editor plainly to understand that in his opinion no edition of LUCIFER should be allowed to pass through the mails. This was said after declaring that he has no personal feeling against said editor, but that, on the contrary he has uniformly tried to construe the postoffice rulings favorably to that individual.

If these utterances mean anything at all they would seem to mean that any future edition of LUCIFER is liable to be held up in the mails, confiscated and sent to the "Dead Letter" office, there to be destroyed, as was done with number one thousand of that publication, and as it now appears probable, the much larger and much more important number 1042 will share the same fate.

* * *

Facing this contingency I now ask LUCIFER'S subscribers, "WHAT SAY YOU ALL?"

One of three things, it would seem, will have to be done:

First. Cease the discussion of the Sex question in LUCIFER'S columns, or,

Second. Make this discussion subordinate to, secondary to, the discussion of other questions of human interest, or,

Third. Give up the struggle and LET LUCIFER DIE!

Fourth. Fight it out to the bitter end, if bitter it must be!

That our readers may be the better able to make up their minds on this question of LUCIFER'S future, we herewith republish the two articles that the censor at Chicago and the authorities at Washington have declared "unmailable"—the one entitled "As Seen by an Old Time Friend," and the other, "Extracts from Majesty of Sex." Whether the publication of these articles are the real cause of the "hold up," or only the pretext, I certainly do not know, but judging from reasonable probability it is far more likely that the real cause is the four pages of history of the "Postal Inquisition" which pages cannot be reproduced in this issue, and the editorial comments upon the farce of a trial that resulted in conviction and sentence of LUCIFER'S editor—part of which comments are reproduced in this fragmentary and disjointed number—a number that has no number, and no title page.

One more question and I will close for this time: While you are making up your minds as to what should be done, please let us know how many of LUCIFER'S subscribers are willing to pay letter postage, or two cents postage on every issue that is denied the use of the mails?—as were numbers 1000 and 1042?

Please answer by letter and not by postal card.

Yours for the fight for the right of free discussion.

M. HARMAN.

AS SEEN BY AN OLD-TIME FRIEND.

DEAR LUCIFER: Often do I see ideas expressed that I would like to either commend or condemn, but I think there are others who can better teach or criticize than I. So I let it go, and yet we are all needed in this great struggle to free woman from sex serfdom.

I want to emphasize what Mrs. Loomis says in regard to Ella Wheeler Wilcox's position on the sex question, as shown in the quotation from the New York "World." What a grand opportunity Mrs. Wilcox has. Being above reproach, enshrined in the hearts of all intelligent, progressive people, as worthy to be heard on any subject, how she could cover herself with glory if she would throw herself into the work of woman's sexual emancipation.

Dear Sister Ella! have you not a commission for the work? If you have not, we cannot expect you to do more than you are doing, or will do.

I well remember when H. W. Beecher had the opportunity to do great good in the cause of social freedom, by declaring that all is not sin outside of conventionalism—that love can be pure outside of institutional marriage, and that the "grand passion" waits not for man-made laws to open a channel for expression.

I would like to give my thought upon another subject, touched upon by "Nemo" in the same issue, April 27, and to thank him for what he says in regard to young girls and elderly men and surgeons. To me, the idea is utterly repellant that people should try to assist nature in her most holy and sacred work—should try to help the young to sexual experiences. To my mind, love is the only sanction for the sex act, and I think this truth should be taught to the young of both sexes—and perhaps some older people might profit by the thought—and that the selection of a sex mate in accord with their needs of affection and companionship is the most important event in their whole lives; and that promiscuous sex relations—before or after they have found their own—would be a great obstacle in the way of their present or future happiness.

So I would like to emphasize the thought that the young should wait for the approval of the God within—wait till they feel certain that they make no mistake, before they enter into such relations, a mistake that would leave its baleful effects upon all their after lives.

It seems to me that to conserve the vital force for the development of the noblest, highest, sweetest and best in manhood and womanhood is far better than to dissipate it for the pleasure of a moment. It seems to me, moreover, that sex reformers do not make it plain enough that their effort is not for more license, but for the release of the sex slave, and to provide conditions for an improvement in all that goes to make for a better manhood and womanhood in the present and future life of the race.

Alliance, Ohio. SARAH SYMONS ROCKHILL.

EXTRACTS FROM "MAJESTY OF SEX."

Both Man and Woman must be free in concept regarding the purity and holiness of sex relationship, or it will become a consuming fire producing diseased results, restlessness and unhappiness in all conditions.

Any undue attempt or inducement to coerce either man or woman breaks in upon the harmony of interaction, throwing everything out of equilibrium, be it household or business affairs. In itself sex-interchange is pure, but of all passions most likely to be abused. This renders perfect purity of concept absolutely necessary; and if this cannot be attained to, it is better to debar one's self entirely and lead a life of celibacy, for the soul cannot evolve its supreme power where there be any taint of evil or where fear lingers.

By the art of creation or sex-interaction and in accordance with divine principle, man will demonstrate and manifest greater life, perfect health, larger power, exquisite happiness in all sexual fulness. Without an established principle and by the observation of it, there can be but a relative pleasure in communion between the sexes. Intimately observed the exchange of sex-force is a most sacred and holy relationship.

NANCY MCKAY GORDON.

ELECTED FOR A FOURTH TERM.

The following City Press Dispatch, of June 28, is self explanatory:

"Moses Harman, 74 years old, was sentenced to one year at hard labor in the penitentiary by Judge Kenesaw M. Landis of the United States District court, this (Thursday) morning. The court allowed the man the privilege of bail in $1,500 so that he may take his case to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals. He made no demonstration when he learned of the sentence and feels confident that the upper court will reverse the findings of the jury in Judge Landis' court.

"Harman is an advocate of liberalities in married relations and publishes the magazine known as LUCIFER THE LIGHT BEARER. He has served three short terms in a Kansas penitentiary for persisting in publishing this paper. His publications strike at the base and sacredness of marriage on scientific grounds, and lengthy discussions on this subject are carried on in the publication from various writers. A motion for a new trial and an order in arrest of judgment were denied by Judge Landis yesterday (Wednesday)."

The reporter was quite correct in saying, "when he (Harman) learned of the sentence," for I did not hear the sentence delivered by Judge Landis, although sitting within a few feet of his chair. Partially deaf I tried hard to follow what he was saying, but his tones were low and weak, for the most part, and must have been particularly so at the close of his talk, else I would have heard enough to understand that he was sending me to prison for a year.

I had come to the court-room prepared to make a little talk, in view of a possible sentence. Not for one moment did I suppose the judge would fail to ask if I had any thing to say why sentence should not be entered against me, in case he should decide not to grant me a new trial. He had denied me the citizens right to address the jury in my own behalf, which denial was wholly unexpected and, wholly without precedent in similar cases, so far as I then remembered, but to deny me my manhood right to say a few words to the judge before receiving such a weighty sentence as a year in prison would be to add outrage to injury—as I then believed and still believe.

Through life I have adopted, as a leading maxim the admonition,

"Judge not, that ye be not judged."

That is to say, I have habitually declined to sit in judgment upon or to condemn the motives of those from whom I may differ. We can take cognizance of the word and the act of our fellow human beings and approve or condemn, but the motive that prompts the act and the word must always, more or less completely, elude our ken.

But while this is true we all very naturally seek for the causes of all phenomena, including, of course, all human acts and words. Very naturally we seek to know the hidden springs of human conduct. We all seek to know, as far as possible, the whys and the wherefores—in accord with, or because of, that other well known principle or maxim, "By their fruits ye shall know them," and "The tree is known by its fruits."

Why, then, should I be denied the right—or privilege, if the reader prefers that term—of addressing a few explanatory words to the jury that was to determine the question of my guilt "or innocence," and why should I be denied the right or privilege of addressing a few words to the judge whose official duty it becomes to affix the penalty, in case the jury decides that I am guilty of violating the man-made statute concerning what is technically known as "obscene" literature?

Imprisonment for one year at hard labor is a punishment so serious that no sane and humane man, it would seem, would or could inflict it upon a fellow human being without very grave reasons for so doing.

The question of motive, of probable motive, is always a factor, if not the chief factor, in determining the guilt or innocence of any act. To ascertain the motive of human actions the most important method, as well as the most natural and rational method of procedure, is to hear what the actor himself has to say in explanation of his act. No one can know what the real motive underlying any act was, or is, so well as the individual who performs the act, and in the absence of overwhelming evidence to the contrary the testimony of such actor should be accepted as conclusive.

So much impressed with the truth of this principle were the sturdy, the truth-loving and liberty-loving old Romans, during the earlier and better years of that great nationality, that it was accepted by them as a fundamental principle of jurisprudence that no one should be condemned until heard in his own defense. Civil laws and customs in England and her colonies—of which colonies the United States are part—are supposed to date back to ancient Roman laws and customs for their authority.

While wishing to give Judge Landis the benefit of the doubt—while remembering that he is comparatively a young man and that he is one of the later appointees to a chair in the Federal court, and therefore liable to make unintentional mistakes, I simply cannot escape the inference, the mental conviction, that he did not want the defense of my motives in publishing the indicted articles to be heard in the Federal court room, because of the possible effect of such defense upon the minds of the hearers, upon the minds of those who have hitherto paid but little attention to such subjects, and especially that he did not want the jurors to hear my motives defended.

Several utterances of Judge Landis seem to confirm this inference. As when he said in summing up, that "While the defendant claims to be conducting his paper in the interest of scientific investigation alone, an examination of the paper itself does not confirm such claim"—or words to that effect, and yet he utterly failed to point out or quote anything in the copies of LUCIFER, held in his hand, to prove the truth of such statement.

Again when my friend Stedman was presenting his exceptions to the rulings of court, and asking for a new trial, Landis used words like these:

"Your client, Mr. Stedman, has apparently formed the eccentric habit of seeking imprisonment"—thus plainly indicating that he considered me a fanatic on the sex question, and that to gain notoriety as an apostle of sexology I court incarceration in the penitentiaries.

If I correctly understand the meaning of these and of similar utterances it is not strange that Kenesaw M. Landis should think it useless, or worse than useless, to give me a hearing in my own behalf, and that he agrees substantially with Judge Bethea that sex, or sexology, is not a proper subject of discussion, public or private.

Judge Bethea, who with Landis, is a recent appointee to the Federal "bench," in his ruling in the Stockham case, took the ground that sex is not a proper subject of discussion, either in public or private, and we all know that courts have the habit of following precedents, instead of trying each case on its merits alone. By this method courts are tied back to the past; they become ultra conservative, reactionary, non-progressive, non-humane if not inhuman.

In other words, by depending on precedents the tendency is always to make a fetich of the letter of the law. The law is magnified and made honorable at the expense of justice, at the expense of humanity, of manhood, of womanhood, until the opinion or doctrine seems to prevail that human beings are created for the law, for the honor and glory of the law, and for the honor and glory of the officials who expound and enforce the law, rather than the doctrine that laws are made for men, for women, for the use and benefit of human beings; not for the honor, glory and emolument of law-makers, of judges, of sheriffs, prosecuting attorneys and other officials connected with the administration of human law.

The quoted press dispatch gives correctly my present status before the Federal courts in this city. M. HARMAN.

LETTER FROM NEW ZEALAND.

"Okataina," Foxton, Manawatu, New Zealand, April 14, 1905.

Dear Mr. Harman: I have your letter of January 30, for which many thanks. Many thanks also for the twenty copies of Mrs. Dora Forster's splendid pamphlet. I have got my friend the Danish missionary at Potacamund, India, to write a pamphlet about the Todas (a copy of which I enclose), which I think will be useful in the propaganda for securing the freedom of women. I think the marked paragraphs will be useful as showing that women can advantageously be allowed a degree of freedom altogether undreamed of in any civilized nation, except that the sentence I have underlined on page nine shows that, unless suitable precautions are taken, there may be a danger from the point of view of Darwinian "survival." I assure you that if you had lived in India, within a mile or two of these people, as I have, you would appreciate the contrast between the frank, happy, and self-respecting countenances of the Toda women, and the crushed, hunted appearance of the women-folk among the three hundred million monandrous Hindoos of the Plains. I understand that among the Nairs, whom I unfortunately could not visit, the women have an even greater amount of freedom (though it is—alas!—being crushed out by the pressure of the surrounding civilization) than among the Todas, and are even more happy and self-respecting.

I am just getting out a second and enlarged edition of my "Ultimate Problems," and in a few days will send you a copy and one for your daughter. The theological views expressed are very far removed from those of Orthodoxy, but also from those of most opponents of Orthodoxy.

I am glad you like "Jeannette" on a second perusal. I have not yet come across the review of it in Lucifer, but have seen an advertisement of it containing a short extract from the book, illustrating the infamy and blackguardism of the white races towards "hetairai." This ought to be coupled with the classical paragraph on the subject in Lecky's "History of European Morals." Yours very cordially, F. W. FRANKLAND.

[The pamphlets came all right, and have been hoping soon to find time to give them a careful review and to print extracts from same in Lucifer, but so far other things have prevented.—M. H.]

THE FREE SPEECH LEAGUE.

Editor LUCIFER: Secretary Mrs. Irwin, having only recently come into the league, is mistaken as to its name. It is not "The New York Free Speech League"—simply "The Free Speech League." So far, at least, as America is concerned, it has no geographical limitations. It is a national, perhaps more correctly, an international, organization, welcoming co-operation in its work from all parts of the continent, as it does from all men and women, regardless of their differences on other issues, who stand for freedom of investigation and expression.

Now is an opportune moment—now, when the enemies of free utterance are so perniciously active—to say that the league needs hundreds, thousands, tens of thousands, of new members. The membership fee is only one dollar a year, and no case can be taken up and fought out before the bar of public opinion or in the courts unless we have the aggregate of many more annual dues than we have now.

Reader, will you not send your name and address and your dollar to the Treasurer of the Free Speech League, Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., 120 Lexington avenue, New York City?

I enclose copies of the League's "Declaration," its Constitution, and Objects, together with letters from well-known men, for which I hope the editor may find room soon.

LUCIFER: ITS MEANING AND PURPOSE.

LUCIFER—The planet Venus; so called from its brightness.—Webster's Dictionary.

LUCIFEROUS—Giving light; affording light or the means of discovery.—Same.

LUCIFIC—Producing light.—Same.

LUCIFORM—Having the form of light.—Same.

The name Lucifer means Light-Bringing or Light-Bearing, and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

CONGRESS SHALL MAKE NO LAW RESPECTING AN ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION, OR PROHIBITING THE FREE EXERCISE THEREOF; OR ABRIDGING THE FREEDOM OF SPEECH, OR OF THE PRESS; OR THE RIGHT OF THE PEOPLE PEACEABLY TO ASSEMBLE, AND TO PETITION THE GOVERNMENT FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES.—First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

THE TRIAL.

Another trial in the United States court. Another pitched battle between the forces of suppression, of repression, of retrogression, on the one hand, and the forces of free expression, of untrammelled investigation, of human progression on the other, has been fought—and LOST!

Lost, temporarily and locally at least. Lost to the cause of human liberty and of human progress, of science versus superstition and ignorance.

Once more the cause of womanhood and motherhood has been defeated. Once more the demand of womanhood and motherhood for self-ownership, as represented by LUCIFER and its leading writers, has been nailed to the cross of legality, the cross of ignorant and despotic man-made law; crucified in the federal court room in the five-million-dollar temple newly erected in Chicago, and now being dedicated to the worship—of what?

Dedicated to the worship and service of Truth and Enlightenment?

Dedicated to the worship and service of Justice? of equal justice to all and special favors to none?

Dedicated to the worship and service of Liberty? liberty of speech and of press, the palladium or guardian of all other liberties?

Dedicated to the pursuit cultivation of Knowledge—of Science—the only savior of mankind? Dedicated especially to that part of Science called Anthropology?—the science of man? the science which teaches all that is known or can be known of the human organism? the science of life, of creative life? the science which teaches how to create a race of human beings so well born that they will need not to be born again?

On the contrary, is it not apparent, from the history of the case of Dr. Alice B. Stockham and of her business manager, Dr. Beckwith, as well as from the history of the trial of LUCIFER'S editor, that this costly temple—built and paid for by the labor of the ruled and robbed masses, and not at all by the labor of the ruling classes, is it not apparent that this temple is being dedicated to the worship and service of the fetich called "government"?—government of man by man? government of the many by the few? government of the masses by keeping them in ignorance of the basic facts of life, knowledge of which facts would enable them to be self-governing to the extent that they would need no rulers to keep them from invading the rights of others?

After various delays and postponements, causing loss of time to myself and friends who wished to testify in my behalf, and in behalf of the work that LUCIFER is doing, on Thursday morning of last week a jury was impanelled to try the case of "The People vs. Moses Harman"—a most palpable falsehood to begin with. The people of Illinois and of the United States know nothing of the complaints against Moses Harman; but few of them know that such a person exists, and if they did know what he is accused of, I venture to say that not one out of ten, perhaps not one out of a hundred, would ever think of trying to punish him for publishing and mailing the indicted matter, unless or until prompted to do so by the meddlesome and power-loving officials of church and state.

After the jury was sworn—a childish and meaningless ceremony connecting the administration of modern jurisprudence with the ignorant and superstitious past—I was called to the witness chair and told to stand up and take an oath to "tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth."

"I affirm," said I—as much as to say, "I can tell the truth without calling on your God, your fetich, to 'damn' me if I should tell a lie."

Hoping to get the stenographic report of my examination before we go to press, I will not attempt to repeat the questions and answers at this place, but instead will reproduce the Associated Press report sent out by its agent from the court room, but which report was materially shortened by most, if not all, the papers that inserted it at all:

"In a burst of enthusiasm while a witness in his own defense before Judge Kenesaw M. Landis in the federal court this (Thursday) morning, Moses Harman, advocate of liberal ideas in marriage, declared that the one great fault of the public school system is that the science of (sexual) life is not taught to the children. The aged editor of the magazine, LUCIFER, was testifying in defence against indictments charging him with circulating through the mails undesirable literature on questions of sex. He is 74 years old and has served three terms in the penitentiary in Kansas on similar charges. The court room was crowded with women and men who are followers of the teachings of the editor, and much interest was shown in the words of the old man. He wears a flowing beard of iron gray and long curly hair brushed back from his high forehead. He is somewhat enfeebled by age and a crippled leg.

"The hearing was concluded at the noon adjournment and went to the jury in the afternoon. Judge Landis instructed the jury not to discuss the matter during the noon adjournment.

"In answer to questions of Assistant District Attorney Marston, Harman said: 'I have objected to legislation which places a contraband upon this sort of literature because the legislators set up their judgments against that of all the world. I have been in the public schools in certain parts of the country for thirty-five years, and I want to say that I have found the teaching defective. I have protested against it. I believe the questions of sexual physiology and science should be taught in the public schools. That is the greatest question of all because it has to do with the production of life. It should be the first and foremost scientific study in the schools.'

"Harman declared he has studied sexology the greater part of his life. 'The thought has constantly been in mind since I was a youth. I have taken it upon myself to teach that subject and have written concerning it for twenty-five years,' said the aged defendant. 'I don't consider what has been printed in my paper as obscene. There is no such thing as obscenity. How can there be such a thing in connection with the teaching of nature to man.'

"The counsel in the case completed their arguments in the afternoon, after which Harman requested permission from the court to address the jury in his own defense. The court took the request under advisement and dismissed the jury until to-day, when he will deliver his charge to them and decide upon Harman's request."

When court convened Friday morning my request to address the jury was denied. Then the judge charged the jury in a speech of perhaps thirty minutes' length. After about one hour in the jury room, the "twelve men, good and true," filed into the court room and in answer to the usual question replied that they "find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment." Immediately my counsel, Mr. Steadman, made a motion for a new trial. In reply the judge named eleven o'clock Saturday morning as the time for hearing arguments for same. Meantime, instead of going home as usual, I was taken into close custody by the United States deputy marshal until the question of bail could be decided, pending arguments for new trial. At 2 o'clock the judge decided the old bail bond sufficient, and permitted me to go until Saturday morning.

At the hearing of arguments for new trial Mr. Steadman made what appeared to me a very able plea, on the ground of errors in the charge to the jury and in the rulings of the court while I was under cross-examination. The arguments were not concluded at the hour of noon adjournment, when the court named eleven o'clock, Wednesday, June 21, as the time he would decide whether or not to grant the motion for new trial.

M. HARMAN.

OUR DOUBLE NUMBER.

No. 1042 has sixteen pages instead of the usual eight. The cost of doubling the reading matter is something of a strain upon LUCIFER'S slender resources, but in order to correctly show the animus of the forces arrayed against the freedom of the press, and to show the nature, the breadth and scope of the defense we are trying to make, it seemed necessary, temporarily at least, to increase the size of our Son of the Morning.

To help defray the added expense of this temporary enlargement, also to help defray the expenses of the court trial forced upon us by the postal inquisition, we have asked, and again ask, our friends to send us what they can conveniently spare for this purpose, and receive in return extra copies of the double number at ten cents each, for distribution—for placing upon news stands, upon the tables in public reading rooms, in hotels, in barber shops, etc., etc., wherever men and women do congregate for recreation, amusement, entertainment or instruction, and by this means help to arouse the public conscience from its indifference, its torpor, in regard to the perils that threaten human liberty and progress so long as the agents of the postal censorship are allowed to arrest, and to fine and imprison those who fall under the ban of these meddlers, these self-constituted guardians of public and private morals.

M. HARMAN.

THE SPIRIT OF THE OPPOSITION.

Commenting on Dr. Stockham's fine the "Chicago Daily Journal—Oldest Daily Newspaper in Illinois"—has this to say:

"Judge Bethea observes [deserves?] the thanks of the community for punishing Mrs. Alice B. Stockham and her partner in the publication of erotic books.

"Though Mrs. Stockham insisted that her motives were pure, Judge Bethea did not allow that plea to extenuate her offense against decency. Whatever her motive, there was no denial that she had violated the law, and the judge very properly imposed a considerable fine.

"If any newspaper should publish Mrs. Stockham's writings it would be thrown out of the United States mails, the offending edition would be destroyed by order of the court, and the editor would undoubtedly be imprisoned in Joliet. Quite right, too, for the matter Mrs. Stockham's mind runs upon is most filthy, disgusting and pernicious.

"It is possible that this woman really thinks other women ought to be instructed by her in her own peculiar way. But that would only prove not that she is right, but that she is suffering from erotomania.

"However that may be, there is no doubt that Mrs. Stockham's books are dangerous to public morals. They should be suppressed and, if her fine is not enough to force the author to desist from circulating them, sterner methods should be employed.

"Either the prison or the asylum is the proper place for people who can't stop thinking and writing about sex."

Is it because of its great age—sixty-one years—that the "Chicago Daily Journal" is so nearly on the plane of the old heresy-hunters of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries of the Christian Era? So long as the leaders of public opinion talk in this way, is it strange that the agents of the postal inquisition find it easy to secure indictments by grand juries and verdicts by trial juries? M. H.

FREEDOM FOR GROWTH, AND ITS DEFENSE.

We are told to beware of entrance to a quarrel, but having been drawn or forced into one, the same admonisher bids us so to conduct ourselves that our foe shall know we are there.

Towards the deniers of the opportunity for freedom of expression, our attitude is one of persistent affirmation of the right to such expression of thought as we are impelled to make, this expression being essential to growth. This is the most important principle involved in all our quarrels with the Censorship. When it attacks, we are bound to defend, regardless of our mental attitude towards the incriminated matter.
